Statecraft, it is true, has been a most potential factor in bringing society to its present high state of civilization, while the arts of war have in the past, perhaps, been a necessary adjunct and evil to our development. But who can say that the man who gave us letters, the man who provided us instrumentalities by which we might record our thoughts and acts and transmit them to living friends and generations yet to come, is not at least on an equal plane in his contribution to society with the greatest statesmen, authors, or warriors, either living or dead.

Sequoyah was the first resident of that section of the country now known as Oklahoma to prominently and permanently engage the attention of the public. An untutored, unlettered, non-English-speaking Indian, yet his genius invented one of the greatest alphabets that the world has ever known. A phonetic alphabet, with a character representing every sound in the tongue of his tribe. The genius of this primitive man gave to an uncivilized and benighted people the means of conveying thought by letters, which contributed so largely toward bringing them from beclouded ignorance and superstition, until within a remarkably short time after the official acceptance of his alphabet almost every member of the tribe—man, woman, and child—was able to read and write.

Oklahoma has abundant reason to feel proud of her contribution to Statuary Hall, not only on account of the appropriate choice of the great character which represents her here, but for the further reason that this wonderful piece of art was conceived in the brain of one who loved our young State and always delighted to claim it as her home—the lovable and talented Vinnie Ream Hoxie.

The statue of this aboriginal American in the Hall of this Capitol typifies and symbolizes the magnanimous spirit of the white citizens of Oklahoma, who have always granted to the American Indian more rights, more liberties, more privileges, and more honors than any other State in this great Republic. [Applause.]

The next thing on the program is the unveiling of the statue by Miss Ahnawake Hastings, a Cherokee.

Miss AHNAWAKE HASTINGS. In behalf of the State of Oklahoma, I unveil and give to the Nation this statue of Sequoyah, selected as that of one of the State's distinguished men, the inventor of the Cherokee alphabet. [Applause.]

Chairman CARTER. We will now be favored with an address upon the life and character of Sequoyah by a man of the Cherokee Tribe which produced the great Sequoyah. He is one of the foremost Senators in the United States Senate and will present the statue on behalf of Oklahoma—Senator ROBERT L. OWEN.

ADDRESS BY SENATOR ROBERT L. OWEN.

Senator OWEN. Ladies and gentlemen, in this National Statuary Hall, containing the statues of the great men and women of the various States of the Union, Oklahoma presents to the United States this heroic statue of one of her most honored sons, Sequoyah, a native American—a Cherokee Indian—who was every inch a man and worthy to represent Oklahoma in the Capitol of the Nation.

Sequoyah had courage, generosity, perseverance, great industry, a wonderful intelligence, and, best of all, a strong desire to serve his fellow men. No man ever rendered a nobler or a better service to his people than did Sequoyah, who, out of a heaven-born genius, was able to invent a syllabic alphabet of 86 characters with which a Cherokee child might learn to read and write the Cherokee language within a day.

The 86 symbols of this alphabet were each a syllable, except the letter "S," and with these symbols every Cherokee word could be written.

Sequoyah spelled his name Se-quo-yah, with three syllabic symbols.

It was impossible to misspell words with this alphabet, and a Cherokee had but to know the alphabet in order to read anything written in Cherokee or to write anything in Cherokee.

This alphabet opened up to the Cherokee people the doors of knowledge without requiring them to go through the painful process of learning a foreign language.

The Cherokees, with elaborate ceremonies, did notable honor to Sequoyah as an expression of their appreciation of his masterful work. They presented him with a great silver medal in token of the esteem with which he was held by the Cherokee people, and passed resolutions in his honor.

The Cherokee Nation established a printing press, had type made, and printed the news of the day in the Phoenix and in the Cherokee National Advocate with Sequoyah's letters. They printed the laws in this language. They printed the Gospels and the New Testament and many other books useful and interesting to the Cherokee people, and in this way the Cherokee people made rapid advance in knowledge and in civilization.

Sequoyah could not read English. He used the letters of the English alphabet and of the Greek alphabet, and invented other letters of his own, to each one of which he gave a syllabic meaning. The framing of this alphabet showed a talent of the first magnitude.

It is a strange thing that no alphabet in all the world reaches the dignity, the simplicity, and the value of the Cherokee alphabet as invented by Sequoyah. The European alphabet goes too far in providing analysis of sound and permits such large variations in spelling that it is a task of years to learn how to spell correctly in any of the European languages. With the Sequoyah alphabet a Cherokee could learn to spell in one day.

Thus the labor of years was saved to the student. So great an intellectual accomplishment was this that Canon Kingsley named the great red cedars of California, which towered as high as 400 feet into the air and which were 25 feet through at the base, "Sequoias," because they were typical of the greatest native North American Indian.

It must not be imagined that Sequoyah was able to frame his alphabet in a few days or a few weeks. Sequoyah was a natural mechanic. He loved to build. He loved to draw and paint. He made himself, with the crudest appliances, the best silversmith in all the regions around, and he made himself a die representing his name in English which he printed on all the silverware he made with his hands.

He finally determined to undertake the alphabet, and it was a continuous labor for over two years before he finally completed it and demonstrated its value by teaching the young people of his tribe to write and to read. It required, therefore, the most persistent, determined purpose, that would not consent to any denial, an inflexible resolution, patient thought, day after day and week after week; but his triumph was complete, a triumph of courage, determined purpose, continued intense thought.

When the State of Oklahoma came to choose the first statue to be presented to the Government from Oklahoma it chose Sequoyah almost without a dissenting voice, because of the heroic qualities of the man as a human soul, surrounded with difficulties, but overcoming every obstacle and rendering the most signal service any human being could render to his fellow men by opening the fields of all knowledge to his people through the invention of a perfect alphabet.

Oklahoma, when it determined to present the statue of Sequoyah, chose as the artist a woman greatly beloved in Oklahoma, Mrs. Vinnie Ream Hoxie, the wife of Gen. Richard Leveridge Hoxie, of Washington City. Vinnie Ream's people were closely identified with Oklahoma through Robert Ream, her brother, who lived in eastern Oklahoma near McAlester. Her house in Washington was a rendezvous for many years for the best talent representing Oklahoma in Washington, but it was not her charm of manner, her great social talent, which led Oklahoma to place this commission in her hands. It was her magnificent ability as a sculptor of the first rank. After receiving the commission from Oklahoma to execute this work, failing health compelled her to seek the assistance of another artist, and as one great genius is able best to perceive the talent of another so she selected Mr. George Julian Zolnay, the eminent sculptor of Washington, trained in Vienna and Paris, and well known in New York, Chicago, and St. Louis, to take over and complete this labor, which, with Vinnie Ream, was a labor of love, for she always loved the Cherokees and the Indian people.

As to the splendid manner in which this work has been finally completed by Mr. Zolnay on the model outlined by Vinnie Ream, I think no one can raise a question. The nobility of the pose, its grace, its strength, the firm characteristic Cherokee Indian face, all show the highest form of human art.

Sequoyah is entitled to rank as the ablest intelligence produced among the American Indians, and Oklahoma takes pride in presenting to the Capitol of the United States this statue of Sequoyah in memory of an honored son of Oklahoma, a native American of the first rank, a man distinguished by the chief of all virtues—an earnest desire to serve his fellow men.

Without great opportunities, he made wonderful use of the small opportunities he had. In character, in nobility, in spiritual and mental worth he well deserves a place in the glorious company of Statuary Hall in the Capitol Building of the greatest Republic of the ages.

On behalf of Oklahoma and in the name of Hon. Robert L. Williams, governor of Oklahoma, acting for the State, I present this statue of Sequoyah to the Government of the United States and to Statuary Hall. [Applause.]

Chairman CARTER. The next upon the program is an address of another Cherokee Indian, Hon. T. A. CHANDLER, Member of Congress from the first Oklahoma district.

ADDRESS BY HON. T. A. CHANDLER.

Congressman T. A. CHANDLER. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen: Writers of fiction and the drama are disposed to preserve for posterity the mystic and tradition of the American Indian rather than to exploit the facts of his true progress.

There is no race of people that has shown more progress in civilization than the North American Indian. It could not be expected that this son of the forest would entirely change, in a brief period of time, the habits he had followed for hundreds of centuries; and while we may read with horror of the warring deeds of him while defending his lands and country and call him savage, we can to-day sorrowfully point to the ravages of Belgium and northern France, to the Armenian slaughter by the Turks, and find consolation in the fact that the so-called Indian on the warpath in comparison was indeed tempered with mercy.

Those crimes mentioned above were committed by people who had the advantage of thousands of years of civilization, while the Indian had practically none.

Yet we find to-day thousands of North American Indians, with tribal relations abandoned, who have not only adopted the white man's ways—which we are pleased to term the ways of civilization—but in many ways improved upon them. We find the Indian in the pulpit, in the bank, in the factory, on the farm, in the arts and crafts, in literature—in every avenue of usefulness, surpassing in many instances his white brother. We find him in the forum of legislation, from the country legislator to the higher toga of the United States Congress, where he has not only brought honor to the race, to his tribe, to the white man, to his country, but his ideals are world renowned.

It is needless to here deal with the numberless crimes against the Indian—crimes which enforced a belief in his primitive mind that in order to exist he had to fight and defend—crimes committed in the name of civilization and progress, but, in fact, crimes committed in selfishness. It will gain nothing at this late day nor will it serve to permanently enlighten to relate the cost the North American Indian paid for civilization. A mere reference to these crimes will serve the purpose to bring reflection on the extent of progress the North American Indian might have made had he not been interfered with by the white-man civilization.

Of course, that belongs to the realm of the mystic, but it would be interesting to know just what the early-day explorer of America would have found had Columbus delayed the sailing of the Viking for 400 years.

Columbus found the North American Indian growing corn and building houses; he found him working in the arts and crafts, in pottery, and even in gold and iron.

Cortes found him in Mexico with a democratic kingdom, with merchants and money and art, and the Spanish missionaries of California and Arizona found the Christian cross and republican forms of government with a purer democracy than any civilized country on the face of the globe enjoys to-day.

Among all the tribes of Indians, it is conceded that those of the Five Civilized Tribes have made the greatest progress, and I trust I am not paying too high a compliment to my own tribe, the Cherokees, when I say that that tribe shows slightly further advancement than any other. Looking back over this progress, one almost shudders when he recalls that slightly more than three-quarters of a century ago a proud sovereign State of the South, boasting of its high ideals of civilization and chivalry, wrote upon its statutes a law providing that an Indian's word should be held for naught when a white man was involved in court. In this connection and in other connections affecting and pertaining to the Cherokees, it would be well to bear in mind that they were not a warring people at that time and had not been for years before. Instead of this proud sovereign State attempting to give well-earned equality to the Cherokee, it called upon the great Federal Government to transplant the tribe from the field of civilization to a barren wilderness beyond the Father of Waters, where they would be compelled to work out their own salvation, existence, and civilization as best they could from nature's foothold, green verdure of the field. To make a long story short, the Cherokees were bundled up, bag and baggage, and at the point of a bayonet marched to 300 miles west of the Mississippi. If the martyred Cherokee of that one trip ever comes into his own, and the unknown graves are marked, there will be a row of headstones from central Georgia to eastern Oklahoma, less than 1,000 feet apart, to show to future generations the number who perished on the enforced journey of 1838. More peaceful, peace-loving Indians starved to death on that trip than there have been United States soldiers killed in all the Indian wars since the discovery of the North American Continent. The Cherokee rose to a mighty nation not by the aid of sovereign States or Federal Government but in spite of the countless wrongs, discrimination, and crimes.

It was this tribe that gave to the world Sequoyah.

Indeed, he was a Cadmus—a true product of primitive nature, yet carved from the antique. The Athenians had their Socrates; the Cherokees, their Sequoyah. He was the Confucius of his time; a Moses to his people.

Christians point to the lowly birth of our Savior; and patriots to the humble surroundings of where Lincoln first saw the light of day.

Christ had the advantage of a mother of education, and counsel of the wisest men of his age. Lincoln had Plutarch, Shakespeare, and the Holy Bible for his early-day text books. Sequoyah got all his learning and all his inspiration from the academy of nature.

Christ was surrounded by people eager to accept philosophy; Lincoln's life was surrounded by people who craved freedom and liberty, while Sequoyah was forced to overcome every temptation, confronted with continuous taunts of his fellows, who looked upon his digression from the pathways of warfare and the dance as an act of mystic sacrilege. Christ and Lincoln had encouragement from every hand; Sequoyah was given in turn ridicule and contempt. Former philosophers had the advantage of Christianity and civilization; Sequoyah was fenced in with superstition and suspicion. The only voice of advice or learning that came to Sequoyah was the sound of nature. As the phonograph records the songs of the impressario and the tenor, Sequoyah recorded the songs of the birds, the clap of thunder, the roar of the beasts of the forests, the music of the zephers, combining these with the myths, he recorded them into an alphabet, as communicative to his primitive people as the phonograph of to-day.

From flittering noises in the dark, reaching him from the mystic unknown, he created a medium of understanding transmission from the ear to the eye.

Receiving nothing from inheritance—born to be shiftless, to dance and not work, to frolic and not think, he left to posterity a heritage that did more to advance his people than all the efforts of all mankind and civilization up to that time and marked the beginning of a new era in a human race. Deserted, even before birth by a worthless low-born father, he was set adrift among the other flotsam and jetsam on the sea of life with no guiding hand other than that of the primitive poverty-stricken mother.

No man ever started with less and attained more than Sequoyah.

He overcame age-old tribal and racial tradition and mystery among people who thought it criminal to change the habits of life. He was not a vision-seer; he believed not in the spirits of the air, further than that they furnished him things for material use. Learning the crude hammering of virgin iron, he acquired the delicate touch for silver filigree work. Distinguishing colors from a truly artistic point of view as emblems of animated being, he transferred to animal-skin canvas nature's teachings so perfectly that all could see and learn.

Experiencing to his own sorrow the effect of strong drink on the delicate nerves of a race that lives out of doors, he conquered will and defeated temptation, and from the lessons of his experience became truly temperate and preached the gospel far and wide with saving grace and happy effect.

Grasping almost immediately a broad interpretation of the Christian religion he became a missionary among the lowly.

After days and months and years of silent musings and communion with nature he conceived his alphabet. He formed out 85 combinations. In his mind he could denote their meaning, but it taxed his ingenuity to put them into concrete form for transmission to others. This sad spectacle worried him for 10 years, until by chance he secured an old English spelling book, which furnished him the types only—mere figures to make compact and to perfect his own characters. Being unable to read a word of English, to his simple mind the letters meant nothing more than different marks on paper. He added some of them to those he had conceived in his own mind, and with this combination made up the alphabet of 85 characters. To his uneducated mind the English spelling book meant nothing more than an abracadabra of queer forms.

Yet when completed, his alphabet (his "talking leaves") was so perfect in every detail that in three hours' time the primitive mind of the uneducated Indian could learn to read and to write.

We wonder, then, what would have been the progress of the North American Indians—of the Cherokees in particular—with nothing more than their alphabet, with schools, with training, and so forth, had they never seen the white man and his civilization.

In honoring Sequoyah to-day we honor the whole Indian race, and no more appropriate tribute could be paid to that race than to place the figure of one of its greatest philosophers in the Hall of Fame of this Government.

Oklahoma is really the land of the Indian, and one-fifth of her million and a half people are of that race, the greater number of whom are enjoying the pursuits of business and social equality of the white man.

Among the leading musicians, artists, educators, professional and business men of the great State of Oklahoma the Cherokees number many.

They laid the foundation to a State that has rapidly grown into one of the greatest and most resourceful Commonwealths of the Nation. They blazed the trail and overcame the obstacles that secured safety to those who followed as the fleet of progress winged westward; and the artist's conception of Sequoyah is but a fitting monument in bronze contributed by an appreciative State of the Union to the unsung martyrs of a vanishing race. [Applause.]

Chairman CARTER. The next on the program is a speech by a Cherokee Indian, too well known to need any introduction to Oklahoma Indians. Mr. HASTINGS comes from the second congressional district of Oklahoma.

ADDRESS BY HON. W. W. HASTINGS.

Congressman HASTINGS. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, Oklahoma was admitted to statehood on November 16, 1907, less than 10 years ago. At the time of admission the State had greater resources than any sister State when admitted. It has developed wonderfully since that time, and now has a population of about two and one-half million, with a healthful climate, splendid railroad facilities, immense agricultural possibilities, and inexhaustible supplies of minerals, including zinc, lead, coal, oil, and gas. Her citizenship was drawn from every State in the Union, her constitution and laws are the most progressive, and her educational system is unexcelled. Her cities and towns have had a remarkable growth and are modern in every respect. However, it is not of her resources that I want to speak. They are already well known throughout the length and breadth of this Nation. It is to one of her distinguished sons that I invite attention at this time.

Oklahoma when admitted to statehood had the Five Civilized Tribes in the eastern part; Cherokees, Choctaws, Chickasaws, Creeks, and Seminoles, each occupying separate and distinct areas and each with their own tribal government, with a constitution and laws modeled in part after that of the United States and the surrounding States. Each nation, however, was unique in that the lands occupied were held in common, no individual member having a title to the same, but only had a right to occupy, improve, and use his pro rata part of the surface. A number of other tribes had lands throughout the State, including the Osages and the Quapaw Reservation.

In 1911 the legislature of the State provided that a statue of Sequoyah should be placed in Statuary Hall as one of Oklahoma's distinguished sons, in recognition of his services and genius in inventing the Cherokee alphabet.

Sequoyah was born about the year 1770, of a full-blood Cherokee Indian woman and a white trader named Gist, who abandoned his mother before the birth of her distinguished son. His English name was George Guess, a corruption of Gist, and Sequoyah means in Cherokee "Guessed it." In order to fully appreciate and properly estimate Sequoyah it must be remembered that he was born prior to the Revolutionary War; that the tribe of which his mother was a member had no schools or churches, and that but few, if any, Cherokees could read or write the English language. Sequoyah was born in a tent, grew up without educational advantages, and never learned to read or write the English language. His attention was invited to the fact that white people communicated with each other by letters, which he called "talking leaves." He accepted the challenge to accomplish the same in his own language. This great work was begun about the year 1809 and it was not until 1821 that it was completed.

In his younger days Sequoyah was one of the most active, progressive, and spirited members of his tribe. He was regarded as a splendid companion, an entertaining story-teller, a leader in all sports, a good shot, and shrewd trader. He accumulated considerable property, cleared up and placed a farm in cultivation, built a modern home, and became a fine silversmith, which trade enabled him to make numerous articles for sale and barter. He was not only active in these pursuits, but he was looked upon as a leader of his tribe, a man of great intellect, a deep thinker, and a philosopher.

During the 12 years he was engaged in forming the Cherokee alphabet he withdrew from active pursuits and participation in public affairs. When his great work was accomplished it was looked upon with suspicion and reluctantly accepted. It was with difficulty that he convinced the members of his tribe of the genuineness of his invention and its great usefulness to them. He conquered all obstacles and set about to teach it to them. Within two years the Cherokee Council recognized his genius and great worth, voting him a medal and passing resolutions expressive of the deep appreciation of the members of the tribe.

In the meantime Sequoyah, with some of the other members of his tribe, had gone West, first to the Territory of Arkansas and later to the Indian Territory, now a part of Oklahoma. He came to Washington as a representative of the Cherokees west in 1828, where his services were recognized by Congress and an appropriation was made in his behalf. Money was furnished by the Government of the United States to establish a printing plant, upon which the first newspaper ever published in any Indian language, The Phoenix, was printed at New Echota, Ga., February 21, 1828. The civilizing effect of this alphabet resulting in a printed language, not only upon the members of the tribe of which Sequoyah was a member, but upon all the surrounding tribes, can never be estimated.

Prior to that time there were no schools or churches, and the missionaries among the Indians had accomplished but little. From that press, not only the newspaper containing useful and valuable information of every kind was printed, but parts of the New Testament, tracts, hymns, and books, resulting in a great awakening in educational work, the establishment of schools, the adoption of a written constitution and laws, and a government modeled after the government of the surrounding States.

The newspaper was dincontinued about 1835. The Cherokee Advocate was established in its place in the Indian Territory in 1945, but discontinued during the Civil War. It was reestablished in 1870, and published until 1905, at which time the Government of the United States, under prior legislation, practically assumed control of the affairs of the Cherokee Indians.

Sequoyah was a representative of the western branch of Indians when the act of union between the Eastern and Western Cherokees was signed in 1838, cementing the Cherokees, east and west, into one body in the Indian Territory, now Oklahoma. He was also a member of the constitutional convention which framed and adopted the constitution in 1839, providing a form of government regarded as a model for a body of people holding their lands in common, with all the protection and personal safeguards contained in the constitutions of the several States.

More fully appreciating the work of Sequoyah, the Cherokee Nation, after moving west in 1843, voted him a literary pension, the only act of the kind ever passed by the legislative body of the tribe. Upon his death this pension was continued to his widow.

While in Washington City as a representative of the tribe Sequoyah met many Indians of other tribes. In the early forties he started on a trip west with the double purpose of searching out the members of the Cherokee Tribe who, according to tradition, had moved to the far Southwest and visiting other tribes to become acquainted with their customs and usages. He wished to compile the same in a book and invent an alphabet by means of which all Indian tribes could communicate with each other in a common language. However, he suffered much with rheumatism, which sapped his vitality and left him unable to endure the hardships encountered in his western journey across the Rocky Mountains and through the valleys of New Mexico in an oxcart with a lone companion. Tradition has it that somewhere near the sweep of the great Colorado River he was seized with a fever, and in an unknown cave, watched over by his attendant, this philosopher, teacher, inventor, genius, and dreamer fell asleep about the year 1844.

Congress had recognized his services and the Cherokee Council had done likewise in commendatory resolutions. He was rewarded with a pension by his tribe, and his name was given to the district in which he resided, which name was continued for that county by the convention which framed the constitution for the State of Oklahoma.

The log house in which he lived still stands in the hills of Sequoyah County in the district represented by me. Considering the time of his birth, the manner in which he grew up, his environment, his rearing by a widowed mother, his not being able to read or write the English language, his invention was marvelous. I am glad to be able to take part in these exercises to-day.

Eighty-nine years ago the man whose memory we seek to honor to-day came here as a representative of his tribe. Almost a century afterwards the great State of Oklahoma further recognizes his services to mankind and honors his memory by directing that his statue be placed here among the statues of our most distinguished men. No man exhibited a greater genius, and no man's work had a more immediate and lasting influence upon the people among whom he lived. He richly deserves the honor which we show him to-day and which the State of Oklahoma confers upon him.

Only a few centuries ago the American Indians were the sole inhabitants of the Western Hemisphere. How appropriate that we should place in the Nation's Capitol, as a gift from Oklahoma, which means the home of the red man, formed by a union of vast areas of land occupied by Indian tribes, making them citizens of the State, combining the seals of the several tribes into one representing the State, indicating that it was a friendly assimilation and not a destruction of them, the statue of one representative not only of our great State but the Nation and Indian race as well, and that from among them was selected one representing the forward thought of his time—the Cadmus of his race. [Applause.]

Chairman CARTER. We will now have the acceptance of the statue of Sequoyah by the most lovable man in the United States, Hon. CHAMP CLARK, Speaker of the House of Representatives.

ADDRESS BY HON. CHAMP CLARK, SPEAKER OF THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES.

Speaker CHAMP CLARK. Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I am making this speech a little out of time, because you know I must call the House to order in a few moments. Two other gentlemen are going to speak after I get through, so you need not think this is the end of the performance.

I am delighted to do anything that contributes to the pleasure and happiness of the State of Oklahoma. [Applause.] I went down there in 1890 and spent two happy weeks hunting and fishing, and for a long time was considered a sort of delegate from the Indian Territory. Oklahoma is "Beautiful land" and immensely rich in natural resources. Next to Missouri it is the finest State in the Union. [Great applause.] From the very first it has been splendidly represented in the House and Senate.

Some people may not know anything about this group of statues. This Hall used to be the Hall of the House of Representatives. The last speech made in it was delivered by Sunset Cox, of Ohio, in 1857. He started the speech but did not finish it that night. He finished it in the new Hall the next day and was the first to speak in that magnificent Hall.

The way I came to be connected with this ceremony is this: As Speaker of the House, I have jurisdiction over the Capitol from a line running through the middle of the rotunda east and west—all on the south side of the line. All the Capitol on the north side of the line is under the jurisdiction of the Vice President.

You people have contributed the statue of a great Indian here. There is the original American. The history of the Cherokees, if written, would be as interesting as a novel. I spent a half hour yesterday listening to CHARLIE CARTER tell one small episode of the Cherokees.

Now, a great many of you have listened to Senator OWEN tell about Sequoyah's invention of the alphabet. It is one of the greatest performances ever conceived by the human intellect. Cadmus invented different letters. Guttenberg invented movable type. Sequoyah invented the only sensible alphabet ever invented in the world.

When I was a boy, my father believed in phonetics and I believe in phonetics. Sequoyah invented simply a large and complete phonetic system in which everything is spelled by sound, which is the correct way. If he had lived 2,000 years ago and had invented his alphabet and had got people to use it, one-fifth of the time of the usual life could have been saved. [Applause.] On the average, we spend one-fifth of our lives learning how to spell, and we don't know yet. [Laughter and applause.]

What is the philosophy of this alphabet? It has one letter for each and every sound the human throat can make. That is precisely what it is. You stand a child up on the floor and give out the word "owl." The chances are it will be spelt "ou"-l, because "ou" is a specific sound, and the child will spell it better than the teacher pronouncing it.

I have thought about the phonetic system in the United States, and the other half of the system is shorthand writing. Suppose a child did not have to learn to spell and learned to write shorthand. It would save another one-fifth of human life. It is easy to learn to write shorthand, and it ought to be used in place of long hand [applause] and taught in the schools.

Sequoyah was one of the greatest Indians that ever lived. A man who can do a thing like he did deserves well of the whole human race, and children here to-day may live to see the phonetic system taught in every school in the United States.

Senator Morrill, of Vermont, introduced a measure setting aside this Hall forever as a place where each State could place two statues of its famous men, and here they are. The law provides that only two can be placed here, but Missouri has five: Benton, Blair, Shields, Kenna, of West Virginia, and Austin, of Texas. I am glad to be here and help to accept this statue to-day on behalf of Oklahoma, and especially these Indians, who amid the hardest circumstances made themselves great and useful American citizens. They rejoice in their advancement and we rejoice in their advancement. [Great applause.]

Chairman CARTER. I now have the pleasure of introducing Hon. T. D. MCKEOWN, Member of Congress from the fourth Oklahoma district.

ADDRESS OF HON. T. D. M'KEOWN.

Congressman MCKEOWN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, yesterday was the anniversary of the birth of Socrates, the great Grecian philosopher; twenty-three hundred and thirty-seven years ago, he was born in the city of Athens. He won fame by talking to the young men of Athens in the market places, upon the public walks, and in the gymnasia. His philosophy elevated the Greeks to a higher plane in civilization, although it cost him his life at the hands of a government obedience for which he had always taught.

It is evident that nature throughout the centuries has created giant intellects to serve the purpose of an all-wise Creator in shaping the destinies of the human race. The accomplishments of these great minds stand out upon the pages of history like the snow-capped peaks of the lofty mountain ranges upon the wide expanse of continents. Master minds have not been confined to any one race, but have been scattered throughout the races of men in all parts of the world.

Among the Mongolian people Confucius, of China, molded the sentiment and progress of his nation for 4,000 years.

The Patriarch Abraham is yet wielding his influence through millions of his descendents, who now inhabit every country and speak the language of every race.

The Arab, Mohammed, is living to-day in larger measure than when he walked and talked with men. His suspended casket has a stronger, more magnetic power than was accomplished even by the eloquence of his tongue.

The great Mogul of India lives in the peculiar customs and rites of the natives of that mystic land, and thus perpetuates his memory long after the marble mausoleums for which his country is famed shall have melted away.

Napoleon Bonaparte, of Corsica, is still worshiped in the trenches of France, and his genius as a general is to be seen again in the heroes of the Marne and the Somme.

George Washington, of Virginia, is still loved and revered by all free peoples, his influence is felt to-day by many millions, and his name shall never perish from the earth. The "Spirit of '76" is rapidly returning in the "Spirit of '17" to the hundred millions of God-fearing people of the United States.

So, in the course of events, Sequoyah came into the world through the Cherokee Tribe of the American Indian. While he gained high rank as a warrior, yet he immortalized himself by the invention of his Cherokee alphabet.

Napoleon said of himself that his greatest contribution to the human race was not the battles he won, but his "code"; likewise, we can say of Sequoyah that his greatest achievement was his alphabet.

Those of the Oklahoma delegation in Congress who are members of his proud and magnificent race are best fitted to dwell more at length upon the history and character of this great man.

It is hardly possible to realize the wonderful changes that have been wrought in Oklahoma since Sequoyah gazed upon its unbroken prairies, its primeval forests, and its swift-running streams. On his long journey to the wild tribes of the West, from which he never returned, he undoubtedly passed over the historic Spavinaw Hills and down through and along the beautiful valleys of the Grand and Verdigris. No doubt he traveled across the rich, beautiful prairies between the Cimmaron and the Arkansas and over the salt plains of western Oklahoma.

Like the tread of Midas was the route of Sequoyah's journey. His footsteps turned the hills into rich lead and zinc, the highlands into coal, oil, and gas, and the prairies into fields of fleecy cotton and golden grain, where the corn tassels nod to the beckoning wheat and the alfalfa vies with the clover in furnishing aroma for the bees.

Where the buffalo once fed white-faced Herefords now graze, and the scampering antelope has given place to browsing sheep. Trackless prairies are now pierced by modern highways, and the bucking broncho has been supplanted by the automobile.

The places where he staked his tent for the night have sprung into magnificent cities, with broad streets and beautiful parks and towering buildings.

Sequoyah journeyed to the wild tribes of the West to teach them the common tongue. No doubt he was actuated by that high motive which caused the missionaries in the early days to carry the story of the Cross to his people. It is fair to presume he looked forward to the time when that people could read for themselves the life story of the "lowly Nazarene." Fate decreed otherwise, however, and he never returned to the Cherokee Tribe. Thus was that beautiful and instructive career closed on earth. Like Moses of old, the angels dug his grave, and no man knoweth the place thereof.

There is a tradition among the Seneca Indians that if you catch a singing bird, and to it bind messages of love and affection for your departed friends, and set it free over the graves of your loved ones, it will not fold its wings or close its eyes until it has reached the spirit land and delivered the messages to the adored and missing ones.

Then, friends, let us bind a message to the birds of joy, singing in our bosoms and release them here to-day to bear the message of our appreciation to the loved and missing Sequoyah.

Somewhere in the far-away West, back of the setting sun, his tired spirit went out at the close of day. And like the beauty of the flowers that fade on earth to reappear in the rainbow of the sky (the heaven of flowers) appears the spirit of Sequoyah in the golden rays of the glorious orb as it drops behind the horizon.

As we pay this tribute here to-day we can say of Sequoyah:

To live in hearts we leave behind
Is not to die.

[Applause.]

Chairman CARTER. Ladies and gentlemen, we shall now have the privilege of hearing another Oklahoman who has been signally honored by his State in being continued in Congress since statehood. I now introduce Hon. SCOTT FERRIS, Member of Congress from the sixth Oklahoma district.

ADDRESS OF HON. SCOTT FERRIS.

Congressman FERRIS. Mr. Chairman, Speaker CLARK, ladies, and gentlemen, Sequoyah, a Cherokee Indian in whose honor we are this day installing this statue, was born in 1760; died in 1843; born in Tennessee; resident of territory now comprising Oklahoma during the last 20 years of his life; died in Old Mexico; born 16 years before the Republic of the United States was born; inventor of Cherokee alphabet; foremost American Indian; died 64 years before Oklahoma was admitted into the Union. No member of the Cherokee Tribe, no citizen of the State now knows his last resting place. His greatness and his genius have survived it all. Oklahoma to-day honors herself by honoring him. His right to be thus honored is both unquestioned and undoubted.

Oklahoma this day installs in Statuary Hall of America's Capitol the first statue of an American Indian to be given place here. Oklahoma honors not alone Sequoyah, not alone the Cherokee Tribe of which he was a member, but the American Indian of all tribes. Oklahoma honors the Nation in affording this recognition to the original occupant of the American soil which now seems destined to feed and lead the world. [Applause.]

Sequoyah's place in history was vouchsafed to him by his genius that invented the Sequoyah alphabet and thereby imparted education, religion, civilization, and hope to his tribesmen. Sequoyah's place in history was vouchsafed to him without the art of the artist, the resources of the treasury, or the ceremonies performed here this day. Little can we add; nothing can we detract from the glories attained by the genius of this most remarkable primitive man. His contribution to history, to civilization, to Christianity, and the stimulus and hope afforded his tribesmen in their primitive state of long ago will not tarnish, corrode, or efface with the close of this day or the generation. [Applause.] The memory of Sequoyah stands out to-day among his tribesmen as the foremost Indian of all the Republic. The installation of this statue in Statuary Hall this day gives but tardy recognition to his genius and achievements.

The primary purpose of this great historic Statuary Hall in which we are assembled to-day is to honor the memory of the two most distinguished citizens of each of the respective States. Sequoyah's right to this first honor stands on firm ground, unquestioned, unattacked, undisputed.

How proud it makes me feel, how proud it must make the 2,000,000 citizens of the bright, new State of Oklahoma feel, to know that they were the first to give belated, tardy recognition to the American Indian. The historic Hall in which we are assembled this day is sheltered by the most attractive, substantial Capitol in all the world. Its architecture and grandeur is being copied by all the republics of the world. We are first in architectural beauty and grandeur; we are first in freedom, liberty, and justice. We are the proudest and freest Republic in all the world. [Applause.]

On July 4, 1776, when our timid, modest, and almost tottering child Republic was born, there was in all the world but the one frail Republic of Switzerland. How proud must we all feel to-day that there are now 26 Republics where men are free; where liberty is the property of every man; where free men dare to think, to speak, and to write their convictions; where every man dares to go from any schoolhouse to any church house; where every man is peer and no one dares to wear a crown. [Applause.]

The Nation with its teeming hundred million citizens was at peace in March—at war in June. War not of our choosing, but forced upon us by the iron hand of militarism, Prussianism, and maltreatment. Peace has always been a controlling passion with me; it has been my hope by day, my dream by night. Peace has been the one hope of this Nation. But it has been peace with honor, not dishonor, that we have sought. We are still the sons of honored sires; patriotism is not dead. [Applause.] Pacifism, anarchy, and disloyalty shall not be the only dim lamp to lead the hopes, the destinies, and the welfare of this magic Republic. [Applause.]

Shall we succeed? The question asked is the question answered. But it must be no timid warfare. Justice will supplant injustice; democracy will uproot autocracy; love of country will outstrip fear of country; liberty will supplant Prussianism and militarism; freedom will prevail; America will win; victory shall be ours. [Applause.]

Statue of Sequoyah! We honor you as an inanimate emblem of a genius of the long ago; we install you to stand in this historic Hall for all time with Washington, with Lincoln, and the others. May the Capitol that this day shelters us and the statues of our honored ones not alone shelter us from the summer's blazing sun and winter's blast, but may it shelter us and those that follow us against tyranny, militarism, and oppression, and preserve inviolate our liberty, our freedom, and the glories of a matchless Republic. [Prolonged applause.]

Chairman CARTER. The next on the program is a reading by by a young Cherokee lady, Miss Anne Ross. [Applause.]

Miss ANNE ROSS (reading)—

ODE TO SEQUOYAH.

[Written by Alex. Posey, the Creek Indian poet.]

The names of Waitie and Boudinot—
The valiant warrior and gifted sage—
And other Cherokees may be forgot,
But thy name shall descend to every age;
The mysteries enshrouding Cadmus' name
Can not obscure thy claim to fame.

The people's language can not perish—nay,
When from the face of this great continent
Inevitable doom hath swept away
The last memorial, the last fragments
Of tribes, some scholar learned shall pore
Upon thy letters, seeking ancient lore.

Some bard shall lift a voice in praise of thee,
In moving numbers tell the world how men
Scoffed thee, hissed thee, charged with lunacy!
And who could not give 'nough honor when
At length, in spite of jeers, of want and need,
Thy genius shaped a dream into a deed.

By cloud-capped summits in the boundless West,
Or mighty river rolling to the sea,
Where'er thy footsteps led thee on that quest,
Unknown, rest thee, illustrious Cherokee!

Chairman CARTER. I have been requested to read the following poem, by Mr. J. S. Holden, of Fort Gibson, Okla.:

THE CHEROKEE CADMUS.

The Cadmus of his race,
A man without a peer,
He stood alone, his genius shown
Throughout a hemisphere.

Untutored, yet so great,
Grand and alone his fame—
Yes, grand, great, the future State Should bear Sequoyah's name.

In ages yet to come,
When his nation has no place,
His memory shall live in history's page,
The grandest of his race!

Chairman CARTER. I now have the pleasure and the privilege of introducing Hon. H. B. Teehee, Register of the Treasury, who will represent Hon. R. L. Williams, governor of Oklahoma, in presenting the statue of Sequoyah.

ADDRESS OF HON. H. B. TEEHEE.

Mr. TEEHEE. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is with a feeling of genuine pleasure, not unmixed with a pride common to the citizenship of Oklahoma and a joy peculiar to those through whose veins course the blood not of a dying race but of an amalgamated people, that I respond on this occasion for and on behalf of the State of Oklahoma to present to the Government of the United States the statue of Sequoyah and to join in paying tribute to this illustrious character.

When these proceedings shall have been disseminated through the medium of the press and have been brought to the notice of the Indian of America, he, too, will be thrilled with a peculiar pride and will join us in according to a member of his race a rightful place in the history of his country. This day, indeed, will be an eventful one to the original American, and doubly so to the noble Cherokee.

It is significant that that State, intended to have been the great mobilization camp and home of the red man, should have chosen as one of her sons for this signal honor one who had made it possible for that element of her citizenship, considered as semi-savage or barbarian less than a century ago, to join the Caucasian element to maintain and increase the brilliancy of her star ever since the morning of the 16th day of November, 1907, when it flashed in meteoric splendor across the emblazonry of our Union. From that day to this good and eventful hour this representative people has contributed, by both brain and brawn, to keep the forty-sixth star in the ascendency and ever increasing in luster until its soft light, with the light of the others of the constellation of States, now radiates over the entire American Nation, lighting the path of her citizens and enabling them to progress with complete security of life and liberty, in continued enjoyment of freedom and happiness, and in the assured stability of her cherished institutions and ideals. In the pride of the history of our country, interwoven with the lives of our foremost men and women, with its beautiful legends and rythmic names of towns, cities, rivers, valleys, mountains, and States which form a part of the warp and woof of our annals, the red man vies with the white man and yields to none.

The man whom we this day honor had the good fortune to have lived in the days when our forefathers, amid shot and shell, laid the foundation of the American Republic, that to-day stands as the champion of freedom and liberty—the common heritage of mankind.

From the story of his life we learn anew the lessons of self-reliance and obedience and the inspiring power of nature. It was the principle of self-dependence, made a part of his nature through the patient and insistent instruction of his mother, fortified by a mother's love that was idolatrous, that formed the basis upon which was builded his illustrious career.

Being without the elementary training of the schoolroom, he necessarily became sagaciously observant of the things with which he came into contact. The application of this rule naturally inculcated in him an ambition to excel in whatever he engaged, whether it was in the chase of the wild fox or sleek antelope, the sports of the day, the pursuit of artisanship, or the grim game of war, which seems to have been popular in his day, and is not without its popularity in this enlightened age in which we live. Everything he saw and heard furnished a challenge to his untrained mind to evolve a scheme by which his people, when that inevitable day came, were enabled to claim and receive the privileges and assume the burdens and responsibilities of full-fledged American citizenship.

Sequoyah ranks as one of the benefactors of the human family. The immediate effect of his invention of the Cherokee alphabet was amazing. The Cherokee abandoned the chase and the warpath and literally "beat their tomahawks into plowshares and their scalping knives into pruning hooks." The hunting trail and the warpath were turned into avenues of peaceful pursuits. The zeal and excitement of the chase and strife were supplanted by enthusiasm and a thirst for knowledge. Letters and learning flourished notwithstanding the difficulties that beset the Cherokee on all sides by the encroachment of the ever-aggressive Anglo-Saxon, who ever sought to wrest from him his happy hunting grounds, then being made to blossom like the rose. Schools and churches sprung up as it were out of the earth at the touch of the magic wand. The government of the Cherokee took the form of a republican government, patterned after that of the neighboring States, and was, indeed, "a government of the people, by the people, and for the people." Before many moons had passed their manner of living had covered the whole range from that of everyday custom to the highest conventionalities that a capricious fashion forces into the more extravagant forms of social life.

Sequoyah preceded the first general migration of his people toward the setting sun, whence a part had gone 20 years before. He saw his people there in what was the old Indian Territory set up anew the government they had abandoned in the East and continue the pursuit of the arts and industries of peace, though not without untold hardships and privations, and there, with other kindred tribes, lay the foundations of what was destined to become one of the greatest States of the Union, a full realization of which it has been our pleasure to behold, and which to-day pays him homage. Noting the wonderful progress his people had made in the arts of civilized life by his invention, this master mind conceived the idea of inventing a common alphabet for all the tribes of the Indian race of America. He undertook the execution of this laudable task in the old oxcart of bygone days—the vehicle that was hitched to the "star of empire" that westward wended its way and brought to the western plains the germ of civilization—and for two years this master mind journeyed from tribe to tribe until that fate common to us all befell him and left his task to be finished by the processes of time.

Sequoyah was indeed a child of the forest, with the great outdoors as his playground and storehouse of his inspiration. In the words of his biographer, Foster:

> The first music that greeted this Indian child was the sighing of the forest, the musical rustle of leaves, and the song of nature, which he loved through life, which seems to have been the inspiration of his genius and the key to his grand achievement.

The inspiring power of nature has been made manifest frequently, even from the beginning of the world's history, for the God of Nature "moves in mysterious ways His wonders to perform." It was amid the thunderings and lightnings on the summit of Mount Sinai where Moses was inspired by the God of Nations to give voice to the Ten Commandments and other laws of upright conduct and honesty in human relationship that have formed the bases of all human law from that inspiring day to this eventful age in which we live. It was on the summit of Mount Horeb, amid the roaring storm and the tremors of the earthquaqe, where the Prophet Elijah implicitly obeyed the "still small voice" to the end that the judgments of the Great Jehovah should be proven to be more enduring than the everlasting hills. It was on the summit of Mount Olivet, amid the glory of all the kingdoms of the world, where the Father of all inspiration, through the voice of the lowly Nazarene, gave utterance to the beatitudes of literature which have furnished themes for thought of poet, of statesman, of philosopher, and of orator, with a message ever increasing in hope and cheer, courage, and faith to mankind, enabling men to walk toward the mark of high calling with complete confidence and security of a sure reward in the eternal beyond, from whence no traveler has returned.

So, too, it was on the summit of the blue mountains of Georgia, amid all the matchless scenes of nature's artist, where this untutored Indian, Sequoyah, was inspired to invent the instrumentality through which the Cherokee were enabled to read in their own language the wonderful story of Christ and Him crucified, and gain a clearer conception of the Great Spirit in whom they believed. And, like the great Lawgiver, Sequoyah was led into the mountains of the Great Western Divide and saw all around him the lands of his kindred tribes, to whom he had gone to find the missing link in the common language, bathed in the gorgeous colorings of the setting sun, and there, enraptured with these scenes of fadeless tints, he fell asleep and found his sepulcher—the place of which to this day no man knoweth, and no man in all America like unto him has since arisen. But somewhere on the southwestern plains, unburied by the hands of man, commingling with the dust of mother earth, lie the bones of him whom we this day commemorate. With each recurring year methinks the shades of his race wend their way through the trackless air to do homage to this patron saint of the Cherokee, and there at that sacred spot with spirit hands lay their laurel wreaths of memory and sing the praises of the American Cadmus.

Heretofore when the red man, accompanied by his pale-faced brother, entered this marble home of our Nation he would note over the east dome hall entrance a sculptural representation of the landing of the Pilgrims—the Old World coming to the New. One of the Pilgrims stepping ashore meets an Indian, who extends to his stranger visitor an ear of corn, symbolic of succor to the needy. Indeed a happy welcome, extended in that simplicity of Indian character and received by a grateful company of Pilgrims. Over the north entrance he would note a representation of William Penn in the act of making his treaty with the Indians, whereunder land was ceded to William Penn and his followers for such articles of commerce then having value in the Indian eye, though in fact of no intrinsic worth, and with felicitations and security of peace as additional compensation.

Doubtless there was no red tape to unwind or roll up in those days that in later years and still in the memory of man attended subsequent transactions, in which there was wanting the element of felicitation, this having been displaced by the substitution of autonomy as long as "grass grows and water runs." Over the west entrance he would note the representation of Pocahontas, the Indian maiden, saving the life of Capt. John Smith at the risk of her own. A beautiful nature picture of the Indian's simple and instinctive belief in and knowledge of that eternal truth that "whosoever shall lose his life shall save it." This act sacrificial at once brought into notice this maiden of the forest, which resulted in a tie of human relationship that should have immediately bridged the Atlantic Ocean. It should have forever secured the Indian fortune, but evidently in the light of subsequent history, it did not fully serve as efficacious a purpose in the field of conservation as the Indian of that day had anticipated, but happily it was a link in the golden chain that now binds the descendants of that union in standing shoulder to shoulder battling for the common cause of mankind. And over the south entrance the red man would note a representation of Daniel Boone, of historic fame, coming into deadly conflict with two Indians, portrayal perhaps of the subjugation of the virgin forest and the boundless prairie to the spirit of civilization. These representations the red man, would think, too sadly tell the story of the effort of the Indian to live on his native soil. He would think they too correctly interpret and define the policy pursued by the Federal Government in its dealings with the Indian, which has been the subject of caustic criticism.

But thenceforth when the red man sees in this historic Hall of Fame a figure of his race, standing erect as of yore and touching elbow with elbow with the most noted of the pale face, with poet and patriot, orator and philosopher, statesman and soldier, he will forget these artistic decorations and rising to his full stature, in exultant joy, exclaim to his pale-faced brother "At last my people are no longer strangers to their native soil, 'the land of the free, the home of the brave.'" He will clasp the hand of his companion and in firm, solemn, and sincere tones say, "I join you in unmeasured love of our country, in unreserved devotion to her fundamental principles, in complete consecration to her lofty ideals, and will lay my life by the side of yours upon the altar in maintaining these attributes of American character whereon hang all the laws of freedom and liberty."

In the name of the Hon. Robert L. Williams, governor of the State of Oklahoma, and on behalf of that State, I present to the Government of the United States of America the statue of Sequoyah, the American Cadmus. [Applause.]

Chairman CARTER. Following is an address by the Hon. DICK T. MORGAN, Member of Congress from the eighth Oklahoma district:

ADDRESS OF HON. DICK T. MORGAN.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Chairman, ladies, and gentlemen, it is altogether appropriate that the American Indian should be represented in the Hall of Fame of the Capitol. The placing of a statue of Sequoyah in Statuary Hall therefore is a very fitting and appropriate recognition of the Indian race. Furthermore, it is especially appropriate that Oklahoma, more than any other State, should give this recognition.

Many years ago, through treaties with the Indians, a number of Indian tribes were transferred to the Indian Territory. The Indian Territory has developed into the great State of Oklahoma, with a population of approximately two and one-half millions of people. About 125,000 Indians reside in the State. This number constitutes in round numbers one-third of the entire Indian population of the United States. Unfortunately the percentage of our Indian population is comparatively small, and will grow less in the future. Still, the Indians of Oklahoma will be in the future, as they are now and have been in the past, conspicuous in the history of the State. For one I approve of the action of the Legislature of Oklahoma in giving to Sequoyah the great honor of a statue in Statuary Hall among the renowned and great of our Nation.

Sequoyah's fame rests upon his achievement in inventing an alphabet for the Cherokee Indian Nation. This was a remarkable achievement, in view of the fact that Sequoyah was an unlettered man and possessed no education whatsoever. One of the evidences of the real greatness of Sequoyah developed early in his life. It is said that ordinarily Indian boys of his time did not have much respect or love for their mothers, but in this connection Sequoyah differed from the usual Indian boy. Early in his life he devoted much time in trying to invent and construct various things about the home that would contribute to the happiness and welfare of his mother. Later on Sequoyah, through his unusual ability and industry, became a silversmith—an expert artisan. He continued in this business for some time, giving more or less attention to the art of drawing.

A further mark of evidence of the greatness of Sequoyah is the fact that he was popular with his own people. It is said that he was "amiable, accommodating, and unassuming. He displayed an industry uncommon among his people and a genius which elevated him in their eyes into a prodigy."

After all, Sequoyah succeeded like most men succeed; his success was largely due to his industry, for he was always at work. Furthermore, his accomplishments were largely due to his power of concentration. For several years he withdrew himself almost entirely from the outside world and devoted himself exclusively to inventing and perfecting an alphabet for his race. Like Whitney, Howe, McCormick, Edison, and practically all other great inventors Sequoyah succeeded in his invention by industry, perseverance, and concentration. After accomplishing this great work, he then endeared himself to his people through his devotion to service in teaching them how to read and write. The General Council of the Cherokee Nation passed a resolution awarding Sequoyah a silver medal as a token of their gratitude for his great services.

It is remarkable how few men attain historical fame. Of the many schools and the thousands who graduate from our colleges and universities, and who have the highest opportunities in the line of education, very few make for themselves a place in history. Sequoyah without education, without intellectual training, and during his life having been associated with an unlettered people—with all of these handicaps—he still made for himself a place in the history of our Nation. He accomplished something worth while. His life and achievement should be an inspiration to the youth of the Nation.

Chairman CARTER. The following is the Lord's Prayer in Cherokee, using the English alphabet and not the alphabet of Sequoyah:

LORD'S PRAYER IN CHEROKEE.

Au-g R-dau-dah goh-lv-lah-de ha-hi, qha-lv-quv-de-yu ya-sa-sed-ga-sv gah-nah-nov-gau-e-ga-sv gah-nah-nov-gau-e. Chairman CARTER. The exercises will be concluded by Rev. Henry N. Couden pronouncing the benediction:

BENEDICTION.

And now, O God our Heavenly Father, let Thy blessing attend the exercises of the hour; that the spirit which pervaded them may remain in our hearts and be an inspiration to those whose lips were fired with eloquence and those who listened to the thrilling message pertaining to the great man whose statue has been unveiled; that they may go with them to their homes and be an inspiration to true and noble sacrifices in the spirit of the Master. Amen.

Sequoyah.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES V. McCLINTIC,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, July 14, 1917.

Mr. McCLINTIC. Mr. Speaker, on account of being appointed a member of the committee from the House of Representatives to attend the funeral of the late Senator Lane at Portland, Oreg., it was necessary that I be absent from Washington on the day set apart for the unveiling ceremonies of the statue of Sequoyah. The House of Representatives having given me permission to extend my remarks, I am pleased to add to what has been already said a few observations relative to this great inventor.

I am glad to pay tribute to one of the greatest characters that ever resided in that section of the country which is now known as the State of Oklahoma. I consider this occasion to be a remarkable one for the reason we are paying tribute to a representative of the original race of people who inhabited this country as far back as history makes mention. I also feel that a worthy tribute is being paid to the great Cherokee Tribe of Indians. The history of Oklahoma shows that other representatives of this Nation have taken an important part in every movement that sought to improve conditions in the section of country where they were residents.

In the legislative halls of my State and in the United States Congress the same tribe of people that gave birth to this great character have been honored by having representatives who have always played an important part in dealing with the various subjects that were of interest to the American people. It has been demonstrated to the satisfaction of the citizens of this country that the Cherokees and certain other tribes are fully capable of shouldering the responsibilities of life, and I feel that no more fitting tribute can be paid to this great race of people than to have unveiled in the Capitol of the United States a statue of one of their representative citizens.

I remember some seven years ago, when a member of the Oklahoma Legislature, that the work of Sequoyah was first brought to my attention by certain members of the Oklahoma Legislature who were affiliated with the Cherokee Nation. When it is taken into consideration that history tells us that Sequoyah, wholly uneducated, conceived the idea of transforming his native language into an alphabet, and that he was successful in doing this I feel that it was indeed a remarkable accomplishment. By this method books were published, newspapers were edited, and it was probably the greatest incentive to cause his associates to have a desire to acquire sufficient knowledge to be able to gain an education.

Inasmuch as his tribe was the first to learn how to read and write their own language, it is only natural that a desire was created for additional knowledge, and this invention stands today as a monument in their history, being the beginning of a period of enlightenment that has caused their people to occupy a high ranking position in the estimation of all the people. Sequoyah must have had a divine inspiration that caused him to seek a solution of the greatest problem that confronted his people, and it is very remarkable to me that under the circumstances he was successful in doing that which no other representative of his people had done.

History tells us that later on, after being successful in this work, that he conceived the idea of inventing a universal alphabet, to be used by all of the Indian tribes of America. Some may have doubts as to whether or not this could have been done, yet when it is taken into consideration there is a universal sign language that is used and understood by every tribe, it can be very easily seen that there was a sufficient understanding between the various Indian races to have made this possible. It is very unfortunate that he came to an untimely death and that the work he sought to do was never completed.

I am proud that Congress in its widom has recognized his remarkable accomplishments in behalf of his people by giving him a special medal and monetary reward. We are told that very little is known of his last days and that there is no authentic record of his last resting place. It is said that when he started on his last mission that he left his home for the purpose of visiting other Indian tribes, traveling in a southwestern direction.

Inasmuch as no positive statement can be made as to his last work and where he died, I feel that it will not be out of place for me to place in the record a statement I made when speaking as a member of the Oklahoma Legislature in support of the legislation which made it possible for these exercises to be held in honor of this character. In the Wichita Mountains, some three hundred miles southwest of the Cherokee Nation, there was established in 1858, close to the present town of Snyder, a Government fort for the purpose of corralling and quieting the warlike Comanche Indians. Among the soldiers stationed there who afterwards played an important part in the history of this country was Fitzhugh Lee, the nephew of Robert E. Lee. Probably the greatest Indian battle ever fought was the one in which Lee received an arrow wound in his right breast and which nearly took his life. There was also connected with this campaign Maj. Loeffler, the only living survivor that participated in the capture of the white mother of Quanah Parker, the chief of the Comanche Indians. Very close to the location of this old fort in the year of 1903 a farmer by the name of E. E. Fancher, while exploring a depression under a huge rock or small cave, found the skeleton of a man. With the bones of this body was found an old rifle, a powder horn, a bullet mold, and a medal which I have been informed was used by the sculptor in modeling the reproduction that appears around the neck of the statue of Sequoyah. Many believe this is the same medal that was given him by Congress. However, there is no authentic way to corroborate this statement.

History tells us that Sequoyah at one time had a broken leg. An examination of this skeleton showed that the same leg corresponding with Sequoyah's injury had been broken. I do not know if the facts connected with this discovery throw any particular light on the disappearance of this great character, but there are some that believe he started his work among the Indians that inhabited this section of the country and that this incident covers his last resting place. I desire to congratulate the citizens of the Cherokee tribe for the contribution they have given to this nation in the person of Sequoyah. I am very glad that the State of Oklahoma has been the first in this Union to pay tribute to a representative of the Indian race. My experience in dealing with the representative citizens of the various Indian tribes in Oklahoma proves that their representatives are possessed with excellent qualifications and that they are performing valuable service in every occupation and walk of life.

To my mind Sequoyah was an unpolished diamond. His memory should live on forever in the hearts of his people, as his accomplishments will stand as a monument as to what can be done by the person who tries. As a citizen and a representative of the State of Oklahoma I am very proud that this honor has been conferred in this manner, and I am pleased to see a representative of the Indians be given a place in the Hall of Fame of this great Government.

The Cummins-Smoot Amendments.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM GORDON,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, July 14, 1917.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, on Friday, July 13, a colloquy occurred upon the floor of the House between the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS] and the gentleman from Texas [Mr. SLAYDEN], in which the former yielded to the latter for a question:

Mr. SLAYDEN. Is it honest to take property without compensation?

Mr. FESS. It was honest to take and destroy human slavery during the Civil War, because the destruction of that property was necessary to perpetuate our type of government as we understand it.

Thereupon the gentleman from Texas declined to discuss the slavery issue, because, being from the South. he was at a disadvantage.

I do not labor under the sectional disability of the gentleman from Texas, and have therefore obtained leave to reply to some of the observations of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS], who, in his remarks and in the matter printed under leave to extend the same, goes into a general defense of the Cummins and Smoot amendments, both of which are palpable violations of the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution, and seeks to justify such legislation by referring to the emancipation proclamation issued by President Lincoln during the Civil War.

The emancipation proclamation only applied to those States and parts of States in which the inhabitants were in open and armed rebellion against the Government of the United States, and the sole authority for the issuance and execution of the proclamation was that the persons to whom it applied were public enemies when the proclamation was issued, on September 22, 1862, and continued to be when it became effective. It was provided:

That on the 1st day of January, 1863, all persons held as slaves within any State, or designated part of State, the people whereof shall then be in rebellion against the United States, shall be then, thenceforth, and forever free.

Under the terms and conditions of the proclamation itself the people of those States and parts of States then in rebellion might, by laying down their arms and submitting to the authority of the United States, have retained their slaves. They lost their property by and because of their continued rebellion and, by the express terms of the proclamation itself, by refusing to surrender. Their slaves were freed by the authority of the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, upon exactly the same ground and for the precise reason that their horses, mules, and cotton were taken without compensation, to wit, on the ground that they were public enemies, and it was perfectly lawful to despoil them of anything that could be used to carry on the war. They were in open and armed conflict with the people and the Government of the United States.

But the people whom it is proposed to despoil of their property by the Cummins and Smoot amendments are citizens of the United States, living under and entitled to the protection guaranteed by its Constitution, which provides, among other things, that—

No person shall be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law, nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

The Cummins amendment provides that—

No distilled liquor or spirits now in bond in the United States shall, during the existing war, be withdrawn to be used as a beverage.

This provision was an open and flat repudiation of the terms and conditions of the statute and contract under which these liquors were deposited and a breach of faith on the part of this Government, and no one who understands the meaning of the English language will contend that under the language of the Constitution which I have quoted Congress has the power to deprive a person of the use of his property for an indefinite period without compensation. A majority of the Senate had sense enough to see this, and finally to reconsider and defeat the Cummins amendment.

But the Smoot amendment which was adopted in its stead is no better, because it just as clearly violates the provision of the Constitution above quoted as did the Cummins amendment. It provides for the taking of the property referred to and authorizes the payment to the owners therefor of "the actual cost of the same plus a profit not exceeding 10 per cent." Congress has no authority to fix the price it will pay for property which it authorizes to be taken. If Congress could do this, it could as well authorize the taking of property without any compensation whatever; neither is due process of law, and both methods violate the provision of the Constitution above cited.

Congress may in time of war authorize the taking for public use of any private property, but when it does so and fails to make provision for payment of the value of same to the owner before the property is taken it thereby pledges the public faith and credit and power of the Government to pay the owner of same its true value in money, and this true value must be determined by "due process of law." If Congress had the power of prescribing an arbitrary rule for determining the value of property so taken, it could indirectly do what everyone concedes it can not do directly. Jefferson guarded against this specific thing in the fifth amendment to the Federal Constitution.

The public degradation of the American Congress by an impudent and insolent lobby, which has apparently controlled the action of a majority of the Members during the pendency of this food-control bill, regardless of the oath of office which each has taken, was made known to the world by the President of the United States in a letter to the head of this lobby, made public on June 29 last and embodied in the remarks of the gentleman from Ohio [Mr. FESS]. That it should become necessary when the Nation is at war for the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy to make a public appeal to legislative agents, who are under no official responsibility, to remove their clutches from the throats of the Members of the law-making branch of the Government and permit it to proceed in an orderly way in the transaction of the public business, with some regard to their oath of office, is little short of a public scandal and disgrace to the Nation.

In his first inaugural address Lincoln said:

I have no purpose, directly or indirectly, to interfere with the institution of slavery in the States where it exists. I believe I have no lawful right to do so; those who nominated and elected me did so with full knowledge that I had made this and many similar declarations, and had never recanted them. And, more than this, they placed in the platform for my acceptance, and as a law to themselves and to me, the clear and emphatic resolution, which I now read:

"Resolved, That the maintenance inviolate of the rights of the States, and especially the right of each State to order and control its own domestic institutions according to its own judgment exclusively, is essential to the balance of power on which the perfection and endurance of our political fabric depend. And we denounce the lawless invasion by armed force of the soil of any State or Territory, no matter under what pretext, as among the gravest of crimes."

I now reiterate these sentiments, and in doing so I only press upon the public attention the most conclusive evidence of which the case is susceptible, that the property, peace, and security of no section are to be in any wise endangered by the now incoming administration.

Lincoln then quoted at length from the Constitution, and called attention to the oath which all Members of Congress take to support all of its provisions. Lincoln's appeal fell on deaf ears; there were men in Congress in those days, as there are now, who for the purpose of pandering to the supposedly dominant sentiment of their districts repudiated their oath of office and "indicted" unpopular things on the floors of Congress for political effect in their home districts; denounced the Constitution, which they had taken a solemn oath to support, as a "covenant with hell," and the result was insurrection and rebellion and the greatest civil war in the history of the human race.

Human slavery is and always was morally wrong, because it involved traffic in human flesh and blood, but it was one of the unfortunate compromises believed to be necessary to secure the adoption of the Constitution that its legal existence, with the lawful right to reclaim runaway slaves, was recognized and protected. No such moral principle is involved in the ownership, manufacture, or sale of spiritous, vinous, or malt liquors, and no such excuse can be pleaded for the confiscation of this class of property; and because we are at war with a foreign nation furnishes no justification or excuse to invade the constitutional rights of our own citizens. It is indeed a "far cry" for men who pose as public educators to invoke the latent hatred of human slavery, which has been extinct over 50 years, in this country, to bolster up and give moral tone to what is little short of a crusade for the malicious destruction of the property of American citizens.

In the case of Ex parte Milligan, Seventy-first United States Supreme Court Reports, page 120, that great tribunal adjudged and declared:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority.

Liability to Military Service in the Case of Aliens.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, July 23, 1917.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following extracts from international law authorities on "Liability to military service in the case of aliens," as follows:

LIBRARY OF CONGRESS,
LEGISLATIVE REFERENCE SERVICE,
Washington, July 16, 1917.

Hon. J. J. ROGERS,
498 House Office Building, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. ROGERS: I am inclosing herewith a compilation of extracts from international law authorities on "Liability to military service in the case of aliens," which was prepared in the Legislative Reference Division three or four months ago. It occurs to me that it may be of interest to you in connection with the matter which you discussed in the House on Friday last. Some of the material included in the appendix to your speech is cited in this compilation also, but I think you will find some additional references which may be useful.

Very truly, yours,

J. DAVID THOMPSON, Law Librarian.

LIABILITY TO MILITARY SERVICE IN THE CASE OF ALIENS WHO HAVE DECLARED THEIR INTENTION TO BECOME CITIZENS.

EXTRACTS FROM INTERNATIONAL LAW AUTHORITIES.

[From Borchard's Diplomatic Protection of Citizens Abroad, 1915, pp. 64–59. See also Moore's Digest of International Law, vol. 4, pp. 51–65.]

SEC. 35. Military service: The denial of political rights involves an exemption from political duties. Being without the privileges, the alien is correspondingly exempt from the responsibilities attaching to membership in the political community. Thus a long series of treaties now in force exempts the alien from compulsory military service and from forced loans or military requisitions, and in some cases this exemption extends to service in the National Guard or Militia. (Hall, A treatise on international law, 6th ed., 205; Despagnet, Cours de droit international public., 4th ed., sec. 343. Treaties of the United States providing for such exemptions are cited by H. T. Kingsbury in Proc. Amer. Soc. of Int. Law, 1911, 218–22.) The treaties of the United States with some countries exempt only consular officers from compulsory military service.

Two treaties typical of those concluded by the United States may be quoted. The treaty of July 27, 1853, with the Argentine Republic (art. 10) reads as follows:

"The citizens of the United States residing in the Argentine Confederation and the citizens of the Argentine Confederation residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether by sea or by land, and from all forced loans, requisitions, or military exactions." (Malloy, Treatise, etc., 1910, I, 23. See also arts. 8 and 9 of the treaty of Aug. 1, 1911, between Great Britain and Bolivia, Treaty Series, 1912, No. 223.)

The treaty with Italy (art. 3) reads:

"They (citizens) shall * * * be exempt from compulsory military service, either on land or sea, in the regular forces, or in the National Guard, or in the Militia." (Malloy, Treaties, etc., 1910, I, 970.)

Whether in the absence of treaty domiciled aliens enjoy such an exemption is somewhat doubtful. The Norwegian military law of 1857 required military service from aliens who had acquired a "fast domicilium." A British subject having demanded the protection of Great Britain against this law was directed to go to the courts, for in the absence of treaty Great Britain could ask for exemption only on principles of equity on the ground that Norwegians were not subject to military service in England. (Mr. Crowe to Mr. Foreman, Report of the Royal Commissioners on Naturalization and Allegiance, 1869, Appendix, p. 71.) The legality of the action of France in blockading the La Plata in 1838 and of France and England in blockading Buenos Aires in 1846 because the Argentine Republic had compelled subjects of these countries domiciled over three years in Argentine to do military service is questionable. (Fiore, Nouveau droit int. pub., sec. 647.) The United States and Great Britain have conceded extensive rights to foreign governments in enlisting their resident citizens or subjects for all purposes of local defense or police duty. Thus Secretary of State Seward said:

"This Government is not disposed to draw in question the right of a nation in a case of extreme necessity to enroll in the military forces all persons within its territories, whether citizens or domiciled foreigners." (Mr. Seward, Secretary of State, to Mr. White, July 10, 1868, Moore's Dig., IV, 52.)

Secretary of State Fish in 1869 assumed the position that "this Government, though waiving the exercise of the right to require military service from all residents, has never surrendered that right and can not object if other governments insist upon it." (Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Redmond, Apr. 3, 1869, Moore's Dig. IV, 57.)

The law officers of the Crown rendered an opinion in 1894 to the effect that by the general rule an exemption from compulsory military service did not exist, but that treaties had largely established it. (Mr. Bayard to Mr. Gresham, Secretary of State, July 19, 1894, For. Rel., 1894, p. 253.) (The admission by Great Britain during the Civil War that those British subjects who had declared their intentions of becoming American citizens and had exercised the elective franchise were properly subject to military duty if they remained resident can not be construed as a consent to the military service of British subjects, but rather as an acknowledgment that by exercising political rights and becoming at least inchoate American citizens, they had subjected themselves to the political obligations of military service.)

Those admissions, however, can not be construed as authorizing compulsory service in the regular army of a nation (i. e., what might be called political service), but only enrollment for police purposes and local protection, especially in times of sudden emergency. Secretary of State Bayard expressed a reasonable view when he declared:

"It is well settled by international law that foreigners temporarily resident in a country can not be compelled to enter into its permanent military service. It is true that in times of social disturbance or of invasion their services in police or home guards may be exacted, and that they may be required to take up arms to help in the defense of their place of residence against the invasion of savages, pirates, etc., as a means of warding off some great public calamity by which all would suffer indiscriminately. The test in each case, as to whether a foreigner can properly be enrolled against his will, is that of necessity. Unless social order and immunity from attack by uncivilized tribes can not be secured except through the enrollment of such a force, a nation has no right to call upon foreigners for assistance against their will." (Mr. Bayard, Secretary of State, to Mr. Bell, minister to the Netherlands, Feb. 3, 1888, Foreign Relations, 1888, II, 1335, quoted also in Moore's Digest, IV, 62; Mr. Fish, Secretary of State, to Mr. Williamson, June 13, 1876, Moore's Digest, IV, 59. Mr. Fish sanctioned the compulsory service of a resident alien to defend a town during a siege. Mr. Fish to Mr. Williamson, July 24, 1874, Moore's Digest, IV, 58. Mr. Wilson, Acting Secretary of State, to Chargé Hibben, May 19, 1909, Foreign Relations, 1909, p. 222.)

So Lord Lyons, during the Civil War, was instructed by the British Government that "there is no rule or principle of international law which prohibits the government of any country from requiring aliens resident within its territories to serve in the militia or police of the country or to contribute to the support of such establishment." (Quoted in instruction of Mr. Davis, Assistant Secretary of State, to Mr. Faxon, Feb. 17, 1870, Moore's Digest, IV, 57. See also Hall, A treatise on international law (6th ed.), 206; Fiore, Nouveau droit int. pub., sec. 649; Bluntschli, Droit int. codifie, sec. 391.)

As a general rule, nevertheless, except in cases of dual nationality or similar possibility of claim, a demand by the home government of an alien compelled to do military service results in his release from service on grounds of comity, if not of law. In one case at least the United States was unwilling to submit the question of such compulsory service of an American citizen in Mexico to the Mexican courts, but demanded an immediate release. (Mr. Evarts, Secretary of State, to Mr. Morgan, Dec. 8, 1880, Foreign Relations, 1881, p. 751, quoted also in Moore's Digest, IV, 60.) The French interventions in the Argentine, above quoted, whether just or unjust, have often been cited as international precedents on the subject. On a later occasion Belgium, heeding the protests of certain powers, relinquished the enforcement of its act of 1907, which imposed service in the civic guard upon aliens. (25 Clunet (1898), 204 and 814; Bonfils, Manuel de droit international (7th ed.), sec. 445, footnote. Numerous treaties confirm this exemption and Despagnet even believes that exists apart from treaty. (Cours de droit int. public (4th ed.), sec. 343.)

At the second Hague peace conference animated discussions took place as to the right of a belligerent to require military service of neutral residents. While some favored an absolute prohibition, the validity of the municipal legislation of some States which on occasion requires such service was recognized. No resolutions on the subject were adopted, but the conference expressed the "voeu," or solemn wish, "that the high contracting powers shall seek to establish, by agreements between them, uniform contractual provisions determining the relations in respect of military obligations of such State with the foreigners established in its territory." (For a brief account of the discussions see Scott's Hague Peace Conferences of 1899 and 1907, Baltimore, 1909, pp. 550–555, and volume III of the official report "La deuxieme conférence internationale de la paix," 179 et seq.)

While many States by municipal law permit the voluntary service of aliens, which in itself raises no international question, some States—for example, France and Germany—expressly exempt foreigners from military service. (Citations in 8 R. D. I. privé (1912), 841.) An exceptional and unusual arrangement is the stipulation of the treaty of January 17, 1862, between Spain and France (art. 5) by which each country agrees to incorporate into its army the nationals of the other, resident in its territory, who have not completed their military obligations in their own country. (14 Clunet (1187), 326; 12 ibid. (1885), 92.)

In the absence of treaty there appears to be no legal reason why the exemption from military service can not be commutated or compensated by a tax. Switzerland, by its law of June 28, 1878, imposed such a tax on foreigners established in Switzerland, unless they are exempted by treaties or belong to a State in which Swiss citizens are liable neither to military service nor to a commutation in money. The treaty of November 25, 1850, did not exempt United States citizens from this tax, although almost all the countries of Europe have by treaty secured exemption from it for their subjects. After some diplomatic negotiation, the Swiss Federal Council adopted a resolution that the tax was only to be levied upon Swiss citizens who were residing in or had returned from the United States (Switzerland does not recognize the unpermitted foreign naturalization of her citizens) and not upon citizens of the United States. (For. Rel., 1894, p. 678–682. See paraphrase in Moore's Dig. IV, 65–66.)

The treaty with Switzerland, by which citizens of the United States are exempted from personal service only, brings up the distinctions between personal military service and the use of the alien's property for military purposes. Unless treaty provisions expressly exempt the property of the alien from all use for military purposes, there is no valid reason why his property should not furnish the same requisitions and be subject to the same servitudes as that of the native inhabitant. In the countries of Europe it is usual to require food and fodder from inhabitants under payment of compensation, and to demand from all landowners shelter and quarter for troops and horses during maneuvers, without compensation, as a public servitude. In the absence of a treaty or unjust discrimination against a domiciled alien as such, it does not seem that foreign governments in such cases have on principle any cause for complaint. (Les étrangers on France et les requisitions militaires, 8 R. D. I. privé (1912), 840–845.)

However willing Great Britain and the United States have been, at times, to concede the justice of the claim of foreign countries to require a limited military service of domiciled aliens, they have vigorously insisted on the rignt of their subjects and citizens to leave the country freely as an alternative to such service. Thus Secretary of State Madison, in 1803, declared:

"The most inviolable and most obvious right of an alien resident is that of withdrawing himself from a limited and transitory allegiance having no other foundation than his voluntary residence itself." (Mr. Madison, Sec'y of State, to Mr. Pichon, French chargé, May 20, 1803, Moore's Dig. IV, 52.)

The claim of the United States during the Civil War to require military service of resident aliens who had declared their intention of becoming citizens and had exercised the voting privilege was not contested after the option was extended of leaving the country within 65 days. (Act of Congress, Mar. 3, 1863. See Halleck, International Law, 1908 ed., I, 613, footnote.)

Many States by statute prohibit their subjects from taking military service abroad, under pain of loss of their nationality or other penalties. In other States such service is prohibited only under the neutrality acts, according to which subjects are prohibited to take service in any foreign State against a State with which their own is at peace. (See, for example, British Foreign Enlistment Act, 33 and 34 Vict., c. 90; U. S. Rev. Stat., sec. 5281 et seq. See also Halleck, Int. Law, 4th ed., 612.)

[From address of H. T. Kingsbury on "The right of a government to impose burdens and limitations upon the alien for governmental purposes; that is, for the benefit of the community as a whole," in Proceedings of the American Society of International Law at its fifth annual meeting, Washington, Apr. 27–29, 1911, pp. 219–223.]

III. MILITARY SERVICE.

This presents perhaps the most difficult and least settled phase of this general question. The view is sometimes taken that military service pertains to the purely political side of government and has nothing to do with its general civil organization; that an alien owes civil duties to the country in which he resides, but not political, since he has, in general, no political rights, and that therefore compulsory military service should not be required of him. This view is supported by the practical argument that an alien rendering compulsory military service might be thus required to join in hostile operations against his own country, to which he still owed allegiance, a situation the evils of which to all concerned do not require elaboration. Bluntschli takes this view and summarizes it very concisely in his codification of international law, as follows:

"SEC. 391. Foreigners can not be required to perform military service. Exception may be made to this rule in cases of necessity to defend a locality against brigands or savages."

The general practice of the countries upon the Continent of Europe, in most of which compulsory military service prevails, is in accordance with this view, that aliens are not subject to conscription; but in the common-law countries, where civil rights and obligations are determined by domicile rather than nationality, and where military service has thus far been usually voluntary and not compulsory, a different rule prevails, and both England and the United States apparently recognize that military service may be required of an alien (especially one who has declared his intention of becoming a citizen or has voted at a State election) without violating international law. Needless to say this question has already arisen, and when it did arise in connection with the "draft" in this country during the Civil War, it was usually adjusted with forbearance on both sides. The United States Government claimed that aliens who had exercised any political rights such as were permitted by the laws of various States should be deemed subject to conscription, and the conscription act of 1863 was made expressly applicable to "all persons of foreign birth who shall have declared on oath their intention of becoming citizens." This seems reasonable enough in itself, but even in the case of such persons it was arranged through diplomatic channels that they should have a certain limited time (65 days) in which to leave the country, if they desired to do so, thus escaping the military service that might otherwise be required of them. The British Government expressly declined to interfere in favor of intended citizens who did not avail themselves of this opportunity.

It is stated that during the Civil War, as a matter of fact, "there was not a single instance in which an alien was held to military duty when his government called for his release." (Mr. Bayard, Moore's Dig., Vol. IV, p. 55.)

At an earlier and less friendly period, however, the activities of the British press gang, especially upon American sailors, furnished one of the causes of irritation which led to the War of 1812, and the question was by no means settled in theory by the result of the war. It is not even mentioned in the treaty of Ghent.

The position of this Government on this question has undergone considerable modification. In 1804 Mr. Madison, as Secretary of State, wrote to Mr. Monroe, minister to England: "Citizens or subjects of one country residing in another * * * can never be rightfully forced into military service." But in 1868 Mr. Seward wrote:

"This Government is not disposed to draw in question the right of a nation in case of extreme necessity to enroll in the military forces all persons within its territories, whether citizens or domiciled foreigners."

And Mr. Fish in 1869:

"This Government, though waiving the exercise of the right to require military service from all foreigners, has never surrendered that right and can not object if other Governments insist upon it."

It may be assumed that where a particular exemption from liability to public burdens is often, but by no means always, expressly provided for by treaty, the liability would be deemed to exist in the absence of the specific exemption. This conclusion is strengthened when the exemption is often made expressly applicable to consular officers only, whose residence is official, and not to alien residents generally. Of the United States treaties now in force, the following provide for a general exemption from compulsory military service:

Argentine Republic, Costa Rica, Haiti, Italy, the Congo, Nicaragua, Paraguay, Serbia, Spain, Switzerland, and Tonga.

And the following for such an exemption in favor of consular officers only:

Austria, Belgium, Brazil, Colombia, Denmark, France, German Empire, Greece, Netherlands, and Roumania.

The provision in the treaty of 1853 with the Argentine Republic may be taken as a good example of the first class and also as illustrating certain other treaty exemptions pertinent to this discussion:

"ART. X. The citizens of the United States residing in the Argentine Confederation and the citizens of the Argentine Confederation residing in the United States shall be exempted from all compulsory military service whatsoever, whether by sea or by land, and from all forced loans, requisitions, or military exactions; and they shall not be compelled, under any pretext whatever, to pay any ordinary charges, requisitions, or taxes greater than those that are paid by native citizens of the contracting parties, respectively."

The provision in the consular convention of 1870 with Austria can be taken as a good illustration of the second class:

"The consuls general, consuls, vice consuls, and consular agents, their chancellors and other consular officers, if they are citizens of the State which appoints them, shall be exempt from military billetings, from service in the military or the National Guard and other duties of the same nature, and from all direct and personal taxation, whether Federal, State, or municipal, provided they be not owners of real estate and neither carry on trade nor any industrial business.

"If, however, they are not citizens of the State which appoints them, or if they are citizens of the State in which they reside, or if they own property or engage in any business there that is taxed under any laws of the country, then they shall be subject to the same taxes, charges and assessments as other private individuals.

"They shall, moreover, enjoy personal immunities, except for acts regarded as crimes by the laws of the country in which they reside. If they are engaged in commerce, personal detention can be resorted to in their case only for commercial liabilities, and then in accordance with general laws applicable to all persons alike."

The application of these treaty provisions is doubtless further extended by the "most-favored-nation" clause in other treaties.

It may be inferred from the frequency of these treaty provisions that in the absence of such a stipulation this country does not claim that its citizens are necessarily exempt from military service in a foreign country in which they may reside, and that it reserves the right to require such service of alien residents here upon a sufficient occasion and as a condition of remaining. Such seems to be the latest view of the State Department, as already shown. While this may appear inconsistent on its face with the continental practice, it is not wholly incompatible therewith or illogical in itself. It is rather an application of the law of necessity. When a sufficient emergency arises, when the very life of the Nation is at stake, then the Nation may call upon all of its own citizens and all aliens who choose to remain within its borders and enjoy its protection, but in normal times it requires military service of no one. On the continent, the reverse is generally true. The normal condition of things there is the requirement of military service, to some extent, of every citizen physically qualified, but only of its own citizens. Thus where compulsory military service is normal, it is also normal not to exact it of aliens, but where compulsory military service is only occasional and abnormal, it does not materially increase its abnormality to include aliens in its requirements.

Since compulsory military service to a foreign country can always be avoided by timely departure from it, there appears to be no reason why, in itself, it should necessarily form an exception to the general rule that a government may, if it chooses, require the same support, whether personal or pecuniary, of aliens whom it permits to reside within its borders as it requires of its own citizens. Discrimination against aliens is doubtless contrary to the trend of modern civilization, but there is no foundation in international law for requiring discrimination in their favor.

HOW FAR A STATE CAN COMPEL FOREIGNERS TO HELP IN MAINTAINING THE PUBLIC SAFETY.

The broad rule has already been mentioned that as an alien has not the privileges, so on the other hand he has not the responsibilities, attached to membership of the foreign political society in the territory of which he may happen to be. In return, however, for the protection which he receives, and the opportunities of profit or pleasure which he enjoys, he is liable to a certain extent, at any rate in moments of emergency, to contribute by his personal service to the maintenance of order in the State from which he is deriving advantage, and in some circumstances it may be permissible to require him to help in protecting it against external dangers.

During the Civil War in the United States the British Government showed itself willing that foreign countries should assume to themselves a very liberal measure of right in this direction over its subjects. Lord Lyons was instructed "that there is no rule or principle of international law which prohibits the Government of any country from requiring aliens, resident within its territories, to serve in the militia or police of the country or to contribute to the support of such establishments"; and though objection was afterwards taken to English subjects being compelled "to serve in the armies in a civil war, where, besides the ordinary incidents of battle, they might be exposed to be treated as rebels and traitors in a quarrel in which, as aliens, they would have no concern," it was at the same time said that the Government "might well be content to leave British subjects, voluntarily domiciled in a foreign country, liable to all the obligations ordinarily incident to such foreign domicile, including, when imposed by the municipal law of such country, service in the militia or national guard or local police for the maintenance of internal peace and order, or even to a limited extent for the defense of the territory from foreign invasion." (Naturalization Commission, Append. to the Report, 42.) The case of persons domiciled or at least temporarily settled in the country seems to have been the only one contemplated in these instructions, and it is not probable that the English Government would have regarded persons who could not be called residents in any sense of the word as being affected by such extended liabilities. But whether the latter was the case or not, and whether if it were so, there is any sufficient reason for making a distinction between residents and sojourners, the concession made to local authority seems unnecessarily large. If it be once admitted that aliens may be enrolled in a militia independently of their own consent, or that they may be used for the defense of the territory from invasion by a civilized power, it becomes impossible to have any security that their lives will not be sacrificed in internal disturbances producing the effects pointed out by Lord Russell as objectionable, or in quarrels with other States for the sake of interests which may even be at variance with those of their own country. It is more reasonable, and more in accordance with general principle, to say, as is in effect said by M. Bluntschli (Le Droit International Codifié, sec. 291), that—

1. It is not permissible to enroll aliens, except with their own consent, in a force intended to be used for ordinary national or political objects.

2. Aliens may be compelled to help to maintain social order, provided that the action required of them does not overstep the limits of police as distinguished from political action.

3. They may be compelled to defend the country against an external enemy when the existence of social order or of the population itself is threatened, when, in other words, a State or part of it is threatened by an invasion of savages or uncivilized nations. (In some treaties the compulsory enrollment of foreign subjects in State forces liable to be used for other than police purposes is expressly guarded against. In the majority of modern commercial treaties the subjects of each of the contracting States are exempted from service in the army, militia, or national guard of the other party to the treaty. In the treaty of 1855 between the Zollverein and Mexico (Nouv. Gen. 16, 2, 257) exemption of their respective subjects from forced military service is stipulated, "mas no del de policia en los casos, en que para seguridad de las propriedades y personas fuerenecessario su auxilio, y por solo el tiempo di esa urgente necesidad." In some cases exemption from military service only is stipulated, perhaps leaving open the question of the extent to which foreigners may be used in case of international disturbance. In May, 1894, the now defunct South African Republic made war against Malaboch, the paramount chief in Zoutspanberg. By no stretch of the imagination could it be contended that a savage invasion was threatened, but the Transvaal Government forcibly "commandeered" some 20 British subjects to join the local forces and placed 5 others under arrest for refusing to serve, eventually sending them compulsorily to the front. This conduct was defended on the ground that British subjects were not exempt by treaty from military service—an exemption possessed by Germany, France, and other nations. Sir Henry Loch, the high commissioner, does not seem to have been instructed to demand the release of the pressed men as of right, and, though his negotiations with President Kruger resulted in an agreement not to "commandeer" any more British subjects, the latter refused to ratify a draft convention by which Great Britain should be placed on an equality with other nations as regards exemption from military service. The abnormal relations then subsisting between the Transvaal Republic and this country are sufficient to deprive this incident of any value as a precedent.)

Foreigners may not be required to perform military service. Exceptions to this rule may be made when necessary for the defense of a locality against bandits or savages:

"1. Military service is essentially a civic and political obligation; hence it can not be dissociated from citizenship of the State. Inasmuch as foreigners are, as a rule, given no political rights, no civil burdens may be laid upon them. If compelled to serve in the army of a foreign State they might be forced to shed their blood for a cause for which they care nothing or for interests hostile to those of their own country. Foreigners residing in a country may be called to the colors only for the purpose of reenforcing local troops in fighting uncivilized tribes or bandits. They may not be enlisted in case of a political war.

"2. Some English subjects having been compelled, in the course of the American Civil War, to enter the militia of the State of Wisconsin, on account of their having exercised the right of suffrage there, Great Britain objected on the ground that they had thereby in no sense become American citizens and that, as foreigners, they were not at all liable to military service. Dispatch of Lord Lyons, November 29, 1862. (Staatsarchiv d' Aegidi and Kleinhold, no. 1941.)

"The validity of the objection was, in principle, acknowledged.

"3. During the siege of Paris the arming of the entire male population and the use of threats by certain inhabitants of the outlying districts of the capital to compel foreigners to join the national guard likewise caused protests to be filed with the Government on the 4th of September."

[From Despagnet's Cours de droit international public, 4th ed. (1910), sec. 343; translation by C. C. Rice.]

Foreigners may not be compelled to do military service, for such service might oblige them to fight against their own country, or, at any rate, would make them share a political duty incumbent upon them in respect of their own State. Therefore England was right in protesting against the Army service imposed upon some of her nationals in the course of the American Civil War in Wisconsin (dispatch of Lord Lyons, Nov. 29, 1863); and the powers were right in protesting to the national defense government against the pressure exerted by the populace of Paris upon certain foreigners to compel them to join the national guard during the siege. Likewise forced army service imposed upon foreigners by the Argentine Republic caused the blockade of La Plata by France in 1838 and by France and England in 1846. On account of the protests of certain powers, Belgium was obliged to abandon the enforcement of her law of 1897 requiring foreigners to serve in the home guard. (Journ. droit internat. privé, 1898, p. 208, 814.) Many treaties mention these principles, which are, however, quite independent of conventions (treaty between France and England, Feb. 28, 1882, art. 4; between France and Italy, Feb. 21, 1868; between France and Switzerland, Feb. 23, 1882, art. 4; between France and Spain, Jan. 7, 1862, art. 4).

Military service may, however, be replaced by a tax, as was done in Switzerland by the law of June 28, 1878, section 1. Moreover, any two States may make an agreement to the effect that each may include in its army such citizens of the other country residing in its territory as do not produce evidence of honorable discharge from military service at home, this being one way of avoiding, by mutual assistance, insubordination which might be harmful to both armies. Such is the French-Spanish convention of January 7, 1862, article 5, according to which Spaniards born in France and Frenchmen born in Spain are liable to conscription if they do not prove that they have complied with this obligation in their country. (See Journal du droit international privé, 1887, p. 326, and 1885, p. 92.) On May 2, 1892 (Journal officiel, July 14, 1892), the time within which Frenchmen in Spain were required to produce evidence of having obeyed the French military law, was extended by proclamation so as to allow them two years instead of one, reckoned from the date of drawing lots for conscription. But this convention and proclamation are no longer in force, and will not be until some new understanding is reached. The young men designated in section 5 of the convention will be governed by the common law (sec. 11, law of Mar. 21, 1905). (Circular of Feb. 9, 1910, Bull. off. du min. de la guerre, part, régl., 1910, 1er sem., p. 227.)

As for foreigners in the foreign legion (France), it is known that they may be employed only outside of the European Continent, so that they may not be obliged to fight against their own country. However, as the Casablanca desertions show, difficulties may still arise.

The Food Bill.

SPEECH

HON. MARVIN JONES,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 24, 1917.

Mr. JONES of Texas. Mr. Speaker, much has been said during the progress of this discussion upon the question of a conservation of our present supply of food and the encouragement of production. Much abuse has been heaped upon the head of the middleman and speculator, and, no doubt, he merits much that has been said about him; but the elimination of the abuses in connection with his activities will not furnish a complete remedy for the present situation. The trouble is a more fundamental one, is of an economic nature, and has been brought about by a condition that has prevailed in this country through a period of years. The reason for the high cost of living and the shortage of food production has been brought about largely by the fact that for many years young men have been lured from the country to the city because of the better opportunities and what appeared to be larger fields of activity. The trend has been away from the open country, away from the farm, and away from the fields of production to the crowded cities and thickly settled districts. Thirty years ago about 65 per cent of our people lived in the country and only about 35 per cent lived in the city. This ratio has gradually changed until now nearly 60 per cent of our people live in the cities. This has been caused by the fact that in the country the hours of work have been long, the character of the work has been burdensome, and the prices have been so low it has been impossible for the farmer to receive the just rewards of his labor.

In the district that I have the honor to represent there are 20,000,000 acres of land that have never been touched by a plow and that are just as virgin as when Columbus first set foot upon American soil. More than 18,000,000 acres of this land are rich, fertile, and could be made productive. The only way to cause it to be cultivated, to cause it to become productive, and cause it to be settled up is for the tillage of the soil to be made attractive by virtue of higher prices and greater opportunities. My father has lived on a farm all of his life, and during my youth I have lived upon the old farm, when prices were so low that only by the most rigid economy could a living be had. Now, for the first time in the history of this great Government, the farmer is coming into his own and prices of farm products are such as to make farm life attractive, and I glory in the fact that the farmer is finally getting a reward for his labors. I hesitate to support any measure that might interfere with his present prosperity, and I shall only support this measure, if at all, after vainly trying to strike out certain features which I regard as objectionable, as war legislation and because of the fact that the Commander in Chief claims it is necessary for the proper conduct of this war. But even as war legislation I think it should be properly safeguarded and the interests of the farm carefully protected.

In my judgment, the interests of the farmer and this country would be best subserved by letting the farmer alone. If you let him have the real price for his products and you make it so his returns are attractive he will produce all the food and food products that are necessary to feed both ourselves and our allies. If there is danger of a food shortage it is well for us to remember that people eat less and waste less when food is high than when it is low in price; that people will use and waste less wheat when it is $2 per bushel than when it is $1 per bushel; and that at the same time there will be a greater effort and a greater resultant production when wheat is $2 than when it is $1 per bushel.

A great deal of wheat is grown in the district that I have the honor to represent in Congress. I would not fear if the farmer were let alone and his wheat prices were left untouched by law, as I think the world-wide demand would insure him a liberal price for that necessity. However, in view of the fact that the President has seen fit to place an embargo upon wheat, and in view of the fact that this embargo may be made more stringent at any time by adding to the countries upon which the ban is placed, and in view of the fact that we are to have a food bill, and in view of the fact that it is determined on the part of those in authority that there shall be a minimum price, it is highly important that that minimum price should be placed high enough to really stimulate production. The food administrator declared in his testimony before the Senate that the power which the administration is asking would enable him by control of the foreign sales to reduce wheat to the price of 75 cents per bushel. Of course he disavows the intention of so reducing it, but I am unwilling to place in any one man's hands the right to reduce the price of so necessary an article below the cost of production.

In view, therefore, of the powers that are being conveyed, I think a minimum price of $2 per bushel should be placed upon wheat, and I think it should be so stipulated in this bill. The testimony shows that with wheat at $2 per bushel flour can be sold at $9.20 per barrel, which is much lower than it is being sold at the present time.

Many things are being done during this emergency that do not entirely meet with the approval of my judgment. For instance, I have not thought, nor do I now think, it wise to send our armies to European soil. When the original resolution was up and it was voted to recognize the existence of a state of war I supported the amendment which would have confined our activities to the defense of our country and to the warfare upon the high seas. In the legislation with reference to the increase of the Military Establishment and the raising of an army I voted for the amendment which would have forbidden this country to send any soldiers, whether of the Regular or the selected army, to foreign soil unless they specifically volunteered for the foreign service. But other and perhaps wiser counsels prevailed. The overwhelming majority of the opinion, both of the administration and of the Members of Congress, was opposed to this attitude, and I willingly submit to their judgment. As our rights had been violated upon the high seas and as the freedom of the seas is all important in view of the fact that the commerce of the world is carried on on that great highway, and as the prices of our products would be reduced to a pitiless minimum if we lost the freedom of the high seas, it was my judgment that our warfare should have been confined to that activity. I voted to authorize the raising of an army, as it takes a long time to train a real army, and since in an hour like this, when the world appears to be insane, no one can tell when an army will be needed for defensive purposes. There is no doubt that the Kaiser dreamed of a world-wide conquest, just as surely as did Napoleon or Alexander. Therefore preparation, both with reference to an Army and Navy, was absolutely necessary. This policy, however, has now been settled and this country, from Lakes to Gulf and from sea to sea, should unite in a common purpose.

Now, in my judgment our allies need munitions and food supplies far more than they need men, and our primary activities should be exercised in the promotion of food production, the building of ships, and the carrying of those food products to the markets of the world.

The policy of this country having already been established, and we having entered the war fully and finally with a declared policy of fighting the same to our utmost limit, I shall vote for every measure that it seems would hasten an early and successful termination of this inhuman strife. The one purpose of this country should be to achieve a victory and to mold that victory into a just and permanent peace.

A great many of the men who have spoken here seem to have had the idea that we should absolutely control the prices of food products and reduce the high cost of living by law. In other words, a great many of those who have the consumers' viewpoint seem to think that the mad rush of the last few years to the cities, and the absurd conditions that have been brought about by reason of that fact, can be remedied by limitations of law. In carrying out our purposes in this war we should not lose sight of our own economic conditions and prices should be high enough to encourage men to move not from the country to the city but from the city to the country, and thus get our population properly apportioned.

I realize that the gambler and food speculator have been guilty of abuses, and I have voted and am still willing to vote to give the President power to force the sale of foods that have been hoarded and where it has been sought to secure a corner on any article of food. But some people seem to have gone wild on the proposition of food control. One Member has introduced a bill to prohibit the sale for slaughter of any "heifer under 6 years of age." This is another effort by some one to regulate the details of a business he does not know anything about. You might as well say you could not kill a chicken until it reaches 3 years of age or a rooster until his spurs were a certain length. However, I shall have more to say about that bill if it is ever reported by a committee. I merely mention it to show the absurd lengths to which men will go when excitement prevails.

Another feature that I think deserves more than a passing attention is the proposal to regulate the prices of machinery, farm implements, and tools which are necessary and essential to the production of our food crops. The American farmer is patriotic. He has always been willing to make sacrifices for his country. He has fought for the rights of this country on every field of battle since its organization. But it is unfair and unjust to expect him to do more than offer his share of the sacrifice. If he is producing an article that is absolutely essential to the welfare of this Nation and to the winning of the war in which we are engaged, it seems highly important that those who are selling him products should come under the same rules and submit to the same regulation to which the producer is asked to submit. It is true that the prices of farm products are high at the present time, but everything that the farmer uses is also high and prices of everything that are being sold both in and out of the country have gone to unheard-of limits, and I am anxious to see the time come when the young men of this country who live in the cities will plan to go to the country for greater opportunities than can be found in the crowded cities.

Another matter I consider of far more importance than the present food bill is the establishment in this country of a thorough marketing system, to the end that the producer and consumer may be brought in closer touch with each other, that there may be greater publicity of prices that the consumer pays and that the producer receives, and that those prices may be more nearly uniform and much nearer the same. In many instances the products of the farm are wasted because there is no apparent market, when at the same time in other sections of the country there may be a very great demand for that particular article or product. By the establishment of a system of licensed and bonded selling agents the country over, together with a thoroughgoing publicity system which would make known the local demands and supplies in various sections of our country, a better market may be had for the products of this country and at the same time a more reasonable price had for the consumer. The food bill is a temporary matter. The establishment of a great marketing system should be a permanent one. Nothing would do more to promote the prosperity of our land than the assurance to producers that they would have the advantage of ready markets and an assurance to the consumers that they would be able to receive those products at the price paid the producer plus only a reasonable profit for distribution. This system would reach the heart of our economic troubles and do much toward prosperity all over the Union.

The tiller of the soil is the most important citizen in this country and has always been. He is the foundation and groundwork of this country's surpassing prosperity. On his primary efforts rest the magnificent commercial superstructure that has been reared in our lands. If he fails, all is lost. "When tillage begins, the other arts follow; the farmer, therefore, is the founder of human civilization." He must feed the world in this crisis. How foolish it would be to hamper his efforts, to discourage his industry, or to diminish the rewards of his labor. How shortsighted would be a policy that would shackle his progress for a temporary advantage to the consumer, when that advantage would mean an ultimate and far greater loss both to the producer and to the consumer. Our hopes, our aspirations, our future as a Nation are dependent upon the efforts and permanent prosperity of the producer. This great country, cradled in liberty and founded in honor, must walk by his side in prosperity as in adversity. How wise that government and how wise its policy which zealously guards the liberties of all its citizens and neglects the rights of none. No prouder boast could any nation have, no surer guaranty of success.

Our Public Schools the Nation's Bulwark.

OF
HON. JOHN I. NOLAN,
OF CALIFORNIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 24, 1917.

Mr. NOLAN. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD on House bill 241 I insert an article entitled "Our Public Schools the Nation's Bulwark," by John T. Murray, at whose instigation the bill (H. R. 421) providing for the utilization of the funds in the postal savings banks for the purchase of public-school bonds was introduced.

The article is as follows:

OUR PUBLIC SCHOOLS THE NATION'S BULWARK, OR PROPER CHILD DEVELOPMENT AND CONSERVATION CIVILIZATION'S ONLY HOPE.

[By John T. Murray.]

In this discussion I shall endeavor to go a bit deeper into fundamentals than writers and speakers generally do.

As no individual will admit his own weaknesses, and as no community will admit its depravities, and direct attack on existing conditions meets with indifference or antagonism, so I beg of you to study very carefully and thoroughly what I say before passing judgment thereon.

Jesus Christ, believed by many to be the Son of the living God, and admitted by all to be the Wisest Man that ever lived, said if we desired our structure to endure we must build on a rock foundation. And we can see the need of such doctrine in our every-day life in dealing in material things.

But as Jesus spoke largely in parable, using such illustration as His hearers could readily understand, and as He was primarily interested in spiritual things, we may well assume that He was speaking of spiritual foundations, of human character building.

NATURAL LAWS SUPREME.

Man's will is changeable, but the laws of nature are unchangeable. Man has free will; devils may entice, angels may implore, but man can act after his own desire. But the thing I want to impress on your mind is that the result of man's every freewill act was foreordained from the beginning of time. Engrave that truth deeply on your mind.

God is not a cruel monster who delights in man's suffering, but He would have to belie Himself and reverse natural law every time man transgressed such law if He kept man from suffering brought about by his transgression of nature's laws.

And so the first stone I would lay in the rock foundation of character building would be to make clear to the mind of every child that the transgression of a law of nature will bring sure and swift results.

The person who obeys nature's laws will live to a ripe old age, hale and hearty, while the person who tramples on nature's laws will, while yet in youth, find himself pain racked and decrepit.

And the institution that defies natural law is multiplying its offenses against humanity. I beg you to study our public-school system with this thought in mind.

Man should know himself. He is of tremendous importance in God's plan. Time and all things therein were created for man. He is the only creature that can join hands with nature and increase God's bounties.

HABIT BUILDS CHARACTER.

The next foundation stone I would lay for character building is habit. Habit is the strongest of human characteristics. Mental habit is more tenacious than physical habit. A drunkard or dope fiend can more readily break away from his habits than an old man can change his politics or an old woman her religion. Right thoughts in childhood are essential.

Community character is the aggregation of individual characters, and the time to build such community character is in the youth of its individual members. Remember our habits are formed by our daily associations.

Adults are but children of larger growth. As the twig is bent the tree inclines. We think, we act, then we are.

As a man thinketh in his heart so is he. Nothing will hold a man, a woman, or a child to clean living as a firm belief in a life beyond the grave where each one is rewarded according to deeds done in the flesh. I believe such a knowledge can be clearly proven if we will only go to nature for our proofs.

I assert that whatever exists was created not by chance but by an intelligence. A child can understand that and no one will dispute it. Again, if there was a creative intelligence before time began, it is logical to assume that such intelligence will still live after time ceases.

Are the movements of the tides by chance? Are the eclipses of the sun and moon by chance? Do the seasons follow each other by chance? Does all flesh and vegetation produce each after its own kind by chance? Men and mothers know the truth, and do not blind yourselves or your children with sophistry.

BROTHERLY LOVE.

"Love the Lord thy God with all thy heart and thy neighbor as thyself, for on these hang all the law and the prophets."

The next foundation stone to lay in character building is to know and make clear to children that selfishness is the seed of sin. As selfishness existed before man was created, it is certainly the strength of hell and the weakness of humanity, and time was established for its eradication.

Fierce competition in business, politics, society, or wage earning is as certain to breed selfishness as stagnant water breeds disease.

The isolation of farm life eliminates this bitter competition. Temptations are not so general nor so severe.

Cities also live a Hyde-Jekyll life. When darkness covers the earth and nature calls all animated creatures to rest, the human vermin that infest all cities crawl from their hiding places, and the rule of licentiousness and vice prevails to the downfall of the youth of the city.

As from the soil comes everything essential to man, it is very evidently a law of nature that man should live on the soil and from the soil. And he who does so is a colaborer with nature and nature's God.

This being admitted the farmer should have a leading place in the councils of State and Nation.

THE MARCH OF CIVILIZATION.

Having seen that full-rounded child development is free government's very life, and having laid the lines of child development along nature's plans, let us look closely into existing conditions. Trying to know what national actions brought good or evil results.

This awful war is going to leave the world civilization in the balance. It will rise to more glorious heights or it will sink to depths heretofore unknown.

The march of civilization has circled the globe. No longer are there other continents to be discovered and occupied by oppressed humanity. The old order and the new order face each other and a grapple for supremacy is inevitable and imminent. And California is certain to be the battle ground. Here will be shed the blood and tears of a dying civilization or here will flower the noblest civilization the world has ever seen.

Destiny has placed the United States in the leadership of the world. There is not a nation on the face of the earth but is looking to us in hope that we may be able to find a way out of the many vexing questions of the times. We can not escape this great responsibility. Are we ready for this supreme test of time as touching man's capacity for self-government? If we fail where shall liberty, truth, and justice find a resting place.

Having dealt with the necessity for a better child conservation and development, and having touched lightly on the march of civilization, I now come to the question of how to bring about a better civilization.

CHEAP MONEY FOR SCHOOLS.

As child development is of supreme importance, and as the public school is the only institution that lays a directing hand on the head of every child, it is self-evident that is where we must look for first aids in child conservation and national character building.

There are 30,000,000 children of school age in this Nation. There are 500,000 public-school teachers and over 1,000,000 school trustees. What a wonderful power it would be for good if its many units were unified and coordinated! What deep thought we should give to this institution that that on-marching, ever-increasing army shall be fitted in every way for the strenuous duties that will soon be theirs!

There is in the Federal postal-savings department over $100,000,000. This money is being reloaned back to the people at 2½ per cent on "bonds secured by the taxing power." Now, school bonds are thus secured and are being accepted by the Federal Government as security for loans from this fund, but only from "banks and trust companies doing a banking business."

Parents and taxpayers, I ask you why shall not the public school, the children's developing institution, get the benefit of this cheap money?

Believing that the children should have every benefit the Government gives to special privilege I prepared an amendment to the present law to the effect that when a school district bonded itself, under proper restrictions, it should have the privilege of taking those bonds to the Federal Government and borrowing the money thereon on the same terms that banks now secure loans from this fund on such school bonds.

California has over $42,000,000 outstanding school bonds on which the average rate of interest is 5.65 per cent. Taxpayers, figure for yourselves what a great benefit my plan would be to the schools of California. And a like benefit would accrue to every school district in every State in the Nation.

Many school districts in this State to get cheap money, 5 per cent, have bonded themselves for 40 yeafs. I now call your attention to possible benefit to the schools if we would give them equal treatment with foreign bond speculators in the matter of school bonds.

LOOKING AHEAD.

Suppose a school district issued $10,000,000 40-year 5 per cent school bonds. Taking these bonds to the Federal Government it borrows the money at 2½ per cent. When the bonds became due the district would have saved $10,000,000. That alone is well worthy your serious consideration.

But, as we desire to get the very best possible results for the district, we will loan this saved 2½ per cent to the farmers and business men at a low going rate of interest, say, 5 per cent. Farmers and business men would be very well pleased to get long-time loans at that rate.

Now, mark you well the wonder workings of compound interest. When the district school bonds became due the district would have cash on hand $10,000,000 saved interest and $20,000,000 accrued interest. Thirty million cash to the credit of the school district without having cost anyone a cent. We simply apply the best known financial methods to our schools.

The bonds are paid off and $20,000,000 left out at 5 per cent. This would give the district $1,000,000 each year so long as Government stood.

As I have discussed this plan with taxpayers, some have suggested that the county should be the unit for handling this matter, while others have thought that it would make less trouble if the Federal Government dealt with the State. Now, I do not care which. All I want is the schools to get the full benefit of this already established cheap money.

WOULD BANKERS OBJECT?

Some people are fearful that bankers would fight this plan viciously. I have talked to many bankers and so far none have offered any objections. Bankers are interested in good government, which only comes through child development.

Furthermore, we are not asking that all bonds "secured by the taxing power" be taken for the children's benefit. We only ask for school bonds, which are but a small part of all bonds thus secured.

Again, when this war closes there will be ample opportunity for organized capital to find fields for investment. Every nation in the world will come to us for money. And such investments will not only be safe and remunerative but they will be a benefit to the nation borrowing, as their natural resources are largely undeveloped.

A CHILD'S VALUE.

I shall not attempt to picture to your mind the depth of depravity and wickedness that exists in our large cities. You must know something of their licentious degradation, and of the large number of young girls and boys who are daily dragged to ruin of body and soul. I simply ask you to consider the value of a soul and to give your aid in saving every child.

Jesus said that the soul of any child, even a ragged, foul-mouthed, guttersnipe, was of greater value than all the land, commerce, money, and business of the world. Get that fastened in your mind.

Jesus also said it were better for a man that a millstone were about his neck and he cast into the sea than he give offense to the least child. Do we not offend if we fail in any way to remove every snare and temptation from the path of the children?

May it not be possible that our lawmakers, judges, teachers, mayors, governors, and leaders in every department of public life shall find their souls smeared with the filth and debaucheries of their times if they do not exert themselves a bit more for child conservation?

HOME INFLUENCES.

In the first of this discourse I said any institution that failed to obey the laws of nature was multiplying its offenses against nature. I now ask you to consider our public schools along that line.

The place to rear children is in the home. Where a man and woman are happily mated is God's idea of the place to rear children. The child needs both the firm hand of the father and the tender love of a mother.

It is a law of nature that we learn best to do by doing; it naturally follows that mothers, having full knowledge of children from the hour of birth are better counselors for children than old maids. And fathers are better guides for children than young men who are making teaching a stepping stone to a profession.

With these thoughts in mind I wish to call your attention to conditions I found in our Indian schools.

At the Pine Ridge Agency, S. Dak., there are 33 day schools. When school opens in the fall each child is given two suits of clothes, two suits of underwear, socks, shoes, hat, gloves, etc. At noon each day every child gets all it can eat of warm, hearty food.

INDIAN DAY SCHOOLS.

Each school is established on a plot of ground 40, 80, or 160 acres. A five or six room cottage is erected. A man and his wife are employed for life. Each is paid a salary; thus in case of the husband's death the wife is provided for. Sickness and old age lose their terrors for people thus employed and they give every particle of their splendid ability and energy to the children under their care.

A three-room schoolhouse, a barn, hogpen, and chicken coop are erected. Thus does each school take on the environment of a well-to-do farm home.

Soon a large, well-grassed lawn, beautified with flowers, shrubbery, and shade trees, surrounds the home and school buildings.

Indian children find so much pleasure on the school grounds that they are loath to leave in the evening, and they hurry there in the morning. Such noticeable child development makes teaching a delight.

At district No. 4 the teachers, Mr. and Mrs. Fischer, very wealthy people, who could live in idleness all their lives, are giving their time and talents to 30 little Indians. It is an inspiring sight to see Mr. Fischer take off his coat and collar, roll up his sleeves, and go into the fields to give the pupils a lesson in physical culture. He leads them with such intelligent enthusiasm that they run to their garden work as our white children run to their playgrounds.

No. 11 is my ideal of a child-developing institution. Mr. Bragance is a capable, enthusiastic farmer, whose instructions have caused every home in the district to have a garden.

Miss Bragance is a fine musician, and leads on the organ—the Federal Government furnishes each school with an organ—the singing, and marching.

But a leader of leaders is Mrs. Bragance. Her heart yearns after the children's welfare, that love begetting love. The children cling to her skirts as to a mother's. Their eyes follow her every motion in adoration; her slightest wish is their law.

POVERTY ABOLISHED.

At Carson, Nev., I saw many small children playing about the school grounds. As it was vacation time, I asked the superintendent, Mr. Mortsolf, why these children were not at home. His reply was that they were orphans and the school took care of every orphan in its jurisdiction as one of the faculty's own.

Listen, Christians and you lovers of children: There are about 225,000 rural school districts in this Nation. Suppose our public schools cared for the white children as the Government cares for the Indian children, would we not at once and to the full abolish child poverty and slavery?

A public school should be as the soil, a man sunshine, and a woman rain, while the children are the crops. Too much sunshine without rain, and you have a desert where growth is scant; too much rain without sunshine, and you have a swamp where growth is rank and fruit scant.

BACK TO THE LAND.

We are developing a Nation of such shallow reasoners that we deceive ourselves. We cry back to the land, but we are doing everything possible to keep our sons off the farm and our daughters out of the kitchen, although we well know that idleness is the breeder of vice and crime.

History plainly shows us that nations are most prosperous when the tillers of the soil live on the land and own their own homes. It also tells us that when landlords lived in cities and had the land tilled by renters or slaves the wealth of the nation flowed into the cities and caused profligacy and licentious living. Soon decay of national honor set in, and other nations, seeing this vast horded wealth, warred on and destroyed the rich nation. Let us avoid the ways that led to the downfall of nations gone before.

MISAPPLIED EFFORTS.

There never was a time in the world's history when so many warm-hearted, brainy men and women were devoting their time, talents, and money to a betterment of human conditions. Why, then, may I ask, is vice and corruption so rampantly triumphant?

Are we like the people who lived on a river just above a high falls. This river was continuously filled with children whose hands were tied and so they could not help themselves. The people did everything possible to rescue the children, but despite their efforts they saved but a small per cent of them. After many generations a woman said, "Let us go up the stream and see if we can not stop the children falling into the river." They did as she suggested and found a lot of people tying the children and pushing them into the river. When these people were chased out of the country the river was soon emptied and all the children were saved with less trouble than the few who had previously been rescued.

Are we not like the retired merchant who purchased a fruit farm? He found thereon thousands of young, straight, thrifty fruit trees and a few old, crooked trees. He spent all his time in a vain endeavor to straighten out the old hulks, and as a result, at fruit-picking time he found most of his young trees with bodies twisted and misshapen, with limbs bent and broken, and all because of his misdirected efforts.

Once there was a gallant knight who went forth to slay the hydra-headed monster. So bungling was his work that every time he cut off one head three other heads grew on. How about our treatment of vice?

INDIAN COLLEGES.

I was sent by the Federal Government into New Mexico to look into the Indian schools of that State. While I was there a meeting of the State Teachers' Association was held at Albuquerque. At that meeting Dr. P. P. Claxton, national commissioner of education, delivered an inspiring, forward-looking address. Seeing an opportunity to get a bit of publicity by comparing the systems, I invited Dr. Claxton to visit the Indian college and the State university with me the following day. He consented. I went to the phone and called up Dr. Boyd, head of the State university; Dr. Perry, head of the Indian college; and Mr. White, State school superintendent, and asked them to go with us. They consented.

We learned that the State university had a registration of 99, with an available fund of $55,000. The Indian college had an average daily attendance of 450, with an available fund of $68,000.

The financial comparison was sufficiently startling to give pause to all. But when we learned that the Indian school fed, clothed, and housed its pupils the comparison lost all comparison.

The Indian college had a girls' dormitory costing the taxpayers $12,000, and I am certain a like building could not be erected on any public school ground for less than $35,000 or $40,000.

Now, parents and taxpayers, do not get the idea that this difference was because of graft. Dr. Boyd is both honest and capable. The difference lies in the systems.

INDIVIDUAL TRAINING.

When a pupil enters an Indian college it is given a thorough examination as to capacity and desire. Several weeks are devoted to this testing. When the faculty finds out the pupil's capacity every attention is given to develop it along that line.

Indian colleges have a farm, dairy, hogpen, and chicken coops, all well stocked. As most of the pupils are best fitted for farming, they do much to feed the school while they are fitting themselves for their life's work.

Those pupils who show an adaptability for mechanics do all the carpentry, plumbing, plastering, etc., while they are fitting themselves for their life's work. All pupils devote half their time to studying theory and the other half is devoted to practice.

While I was at Carlisle, Pa., I was informed that any mechanic leaving that school with a diploma could go to work for the Pennsylvania Railroad at good wages, assured of a life position.

Parents and taxpayers, are not these facts worthy your consideration?

NO FALSE PRIDE.

A most wonderful contrast in character building is in dress and deportment. At all Indian colleges the pupils all dress alike. Usually the girls wear a skirt of some dark material and a waist of some light material. They are as neat in appearance and as pleasing to the eye as soldier boys on dress parade.

It is indeed a most pleasing and hopeful sight to see hundreds of girls wandering over the campus with arms lovingly entwined about each other. None of them ever thinks to ask her companion if her father is a banker or ditch digger. Individual character is what counts.

In such an atmosphere false pride, love of dress, or social leadership dies out for lack of encouragement.

Might it not be well for our high schools and universities to take a lesson from our Indian schools?

The River and Harbor Bill.

OF

HON. GEORGE EDMUND FOSS,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, July 31, 1917.

Mr. FOSS. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote against putting this bill into conference, because I believe this is not the time for Congress to make appropriations for rivers and harbors unless such appropriations are absolutely necessary for war purposes, and from my understanding of this bill practically all of the projects can well wait until the next session of Congress, and especially so in view of the fact that there is an exceptional balance in the Federal Treasury of over $30,000,000 for such purposes. If any of these projects in this bill are indispensable and necessary for military preparedness, then such projects could be easily introduced in a separate measure, and I take it there would be little if any objection to its passage.

We ought to realize above all other things that the great business before the country is to win this war and that all other matters must be subordinate to this predominant purpose, and that at this time when we are calling upon the people to subscribe for our bonds in carrying on this war, to contribute to the Red Cross, and in a hundred other ways to give generously and patriotically to the furtherance of the supreme effort, Congress, as the representative body of the American people, ought above all things to set an example for economy in its appropriations.

Now we are appealing to the housewives of the country to conserve all of their resources in the matter of regulation of food so as to prevent waste and extravagance of every kind, in order that the highest national efficiency shall be reached. How inconsistent it will appear to them when they read that Congress has appropriated thousands of dollars out of the Public Treasury to dredge canals and rivers upon whose surfaces float comparatively little commerce and which will be of no assistance toward the great end which we must all have before us.

To my mind this river and harbor bill is most inconsistent, and the passage of it at this time will bring down the well-merited criticisms from the American people, because they will feel that Congress is not sincere and only trifling with the stern realities of the situation.

Can I repeat that the supreme effort of all our people and the supreme effort of the American Congress should be to win the war, and win it as quickly as possible? Of what use to us are our rivers, harbors, and canals unless this great object is attained, and why should we expend the people's money for unnecessary things when they are called upon to exert every possible economy in their daily living for the conservation of all our national resources? What answer will they make to this unnecessary expenditure of their money and the unnecessary burden which shall be placed upon them when they shall be compelled to bear greatly increased taxation on their property?

I trust that this House will have the patriotism to rise above the local demands of their particular communities and show the American people that they are true, loyal, and faithful to the great national problem which lies before us.

Draft Quota Apportionment.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ROSCOE C. McCULLOCH,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, July 26, 1917.

Mr. McCULLOCH. Mr. Speaker, I ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks in the RECORD, and to have printed in the RECORD a letter which I addressed to Secretary of War Baker July 17, 1917, in which letter I charged that the draft is being conducted illegally and contrary to the express provisions of the conscription law. I also charge that, because of the method adopted by the War Department or the Bureau of the Census for figuring the quotas, which method I contend is illegal and not in accordance with the provisions of the conscription law, industrial States are being discriminated against and are being required to furnish more men than the law would require them to furnish if the quotas were figured according to the law.

I also desire to have printed in connection with my remarks certain tables of figures which have been furnished me by the Census Bureau. These figures will show clearly the inequity and discrimination which result from the method of figuring the quotas adopted by the War Department, which is contrary to the provisions of the law.

On July 18, 1917, I introduced the following resolution:

Resolution by Mr. McCULLOCH, of Ohio.

Whereas the act of May 18, 1917, to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States provides that "Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof"; and

Whereas instead of proportioning the quotas in accordance with the population the War Department is apportioning the quotas in accordance with the registration of June 5, which registration does not present a true indication of the population: Therefore be it

Resolved, That the Secretary of War and the Secretary of Commerce, who, themselves or through their departments, have been responsible for the fixing of the quotas on the basis of registration and not on the basis of population, and therefore illegally, be required to furnish this House with their reasons for so ignoring the express provisions of the conscription law.

JULY 17, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR MR. SECRETARY: The act approved May 18, 1917, to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States, and more generally known as the "conscription act," provides:

"Quotas for the several States, Territories, and the District of Columbia, or subdivisions thereof, shall be determined in proportion to the population thereof, and credit shall be given to any State, Territory, District, or subdivision thereof, for the number of men who were in the military service of the United States as members of the National Guard on April 1, 1917, or who have since said date entered the military service of the United States from any such State, District, or subdivision, either as members of the Regular Army or the National Guard."

It is clear from this provision of the law that it was the intention of Congress that the quotas under this draft law should be determined in proportion to the actual population of the various States, Territories, and their subdivisions.

The Bureau of the Census has furnished official estimates of the actual population on July 1, 1917, of the counties of the several States and cities of 30,000 population and over. These estimates of the Bureau of the Census of the actual population on July 1, 1917, according to my information, were based upon the census of 1910 with the estimated increases as worked out by the Bureau of the Census for each subdivision; so that the figures submitted by the Bureau of the Census were designed and intended to show the actual population of each subdivision on July 1, 1917.

The Bureau of the Census has also made additional estimates of populations for the several States and the District of Columbia for counties and for cities of over 30,000, based entirely upon the registration of June 5, 1917. These additional estimates, according to the statement issued by the Bureau of the Census, were made at the request of the Provost Marshal General of the War Department and were to be used solely as a basis for the apportionment of the forthcoming draft. The Bureau of the Census, in referring to the method used in arriving at these new estimates, says:

"The method employed may be described briefly as follows:

"The total registration as shown by the preliminary telegraphic returns, 9,659,382, was divided by the total population of continental United States exclusive of Alaska, as heretofore estimated by the Census Bureau, 103,635,300, in order to obtain the proportion which the registrants represented of the total population. The resulting figure, 9.32 per cent, was assumed to represent the proportion which the registrants in each geographical unit represented of the total population thereof."

I am informed that it is now the purpose of the War Department to figure the quotas for each State and subdivision thereof on the estimate of the Bureau of the Census, based on the registration and not on the estimate of the Bureau of the Census, of the actual population of each State and its subdivisions. In many States and subdivisions, especially in industrial communities, the estimates, based on the registration, are far in excess of the actual population of such State and subdivision, and in a large number of States the estimates are much less than the actual population. Therefore, the strict letter of the law is nullified by the use of the method of figuring the population on the registration and the quotas will not be made according to the population but according to the registration of the male citizens between the ages of 21 and 30, inclusive, on June 5, 1917.

If the draft should be made upon these last estimates, based upon the registration, it will not be made according to law, for the quotas will not be determined according to the population of the States and their subdivisions; therefore, the draft will be illegal and would not be sustained by the courts. It would seem to me that for that reason alone your department should not permit this method to be carried into effect.

It is doubtless true that very little, if any, question would be raised in regard to the method if it worked out equitably and justly to all the States and their subdivisions, but, unfortunately, the method adopted does not work out equitably and justly to all the States and their subdivisions. On the contrary, it works a discrimination against the industrial communities.

The principal reason why the figuring of the population upon the basis of the registration of male citizens between the ages of 21 and 30 years is unjust is that the registration was general. Everyone between the age limits provided by the act was required to register whether they were liable for military service or not. Therefore, the registration included unnaturalized foreigners, alien enemies, those exempt because of religious belief, as well as those exempt because of physical disqualifications, and otherwise. For this reason the industrial community, which is the principal place of employment and residence of these foreigners and the unnaturalized, while it would have a much larger registration, yet it would not probably have a larger proportionate number of young men liable to military service, as compared with nonindustrial communities, for a large percentage of those registered would be exempt.

If the department decided to diverge from the strict letter of the law and figure the number from the registration, rather than from the actual population, in order to be fair, it should have excluded from the registration at least the unnaturalized foreigners and alien enemies. If that had been done it is altogether probable that a result would have been obtained in regard to which few could have honestly based objection and which would have been perhaps fair, although the fact remains that it would still have been illegal, because Congress intended and clearly provided that the quotas were to be made from the population. If the estimates were to have been made upon a basis of registration, Congress would have so provided. I believe it would be dangerous for the department, no matter how equitable it would appear to be, to figure the quotas upon the registration, when the law specifically provides that the quotas must be figured according to actual population, for there are those who might be only too glad to take advantage of any technicality to attack the law and upset the whole draft as being illegal and unlawful.

The method adopted by your department is, as I have stated, a discrimination against industrial States in favor of nonindustrial States. As a proof that my assertion in that regard is correct, it will be observed that the State of Ohio under this method is called upon to furnish many more soldiers than it would have been required to furnish if the number had been figured from the actual population. If the quotas were filled on the actual population of the State of Ohio on July 1, 1917, as estimated by the Bureau of the Census, my State would furnish a gross quota of 57,150 men, but by the method of figuring the quota on the registration the population of the State of Ohio is inflated almost 1,000,000 persons, or, to be exact, 862,686, which increases Ohio's gross quota to 66,474, or 9,324 men more than the State would have to furnish if the quotas were figured according to the provisions of the law and on actual population.

All nonindustrial States are benefited under this method, have their quotas reduced, and are required to furnish a considerable less number of soldiers than if the quotas were figured on actual population. The Southern States are benefited almost without exception, as the figures show, and the burden is shifted to industrial States like Ohio, Michigan, Pennsylvania, New York, and other Northern States. The following figures, taken from a table prepared by the Bureau of the Census, will indicate the effect of this method on industrial States of the North and the Southern States:

State.	Gross quotas under actual population.	Gross quotas under registration.
Alabama	25,920	21,300
Arkansas	19,367	17,452
District of Columbia	4,048	3,796
Georgia	31,752	27,209
Kentucky	26,250	22,152
Louisiana	20,360	18,481
Maryland	15,061	14,139
Mississippi	21,672	16,429
Missouri	37,604	35,461
New Mexico	4,644	3,856
North Carolina	26,692	23,486
Oklahoma	25,107	19,943
South Carolina	18,016	15,147
Tennessee	25,269	22,158
Texas	49,510	48,116
Virginia	24,253	21,354
West Virginia	15,498	14,848

Compare the following figures for northern industrial States with the foregoing figures for Southern States and it will be plain that the burden of this draft, under the method adopted by your department, is being shifted from the Southern States and is being placed unjustly upon the industrial Northern States:

State.	Gross quotas under actual population.	Gross quotas under registration.
California	33,212	34,007
Connecticut	13,873	18,817
Illinois	68,366	79,094
Iowa	24,393	25,465
Massachusetts	41,402	43,109
Michigan	33,937	43,936
Minnesota	25,355	26,021
Montana	5,184	10,423
New Jersey	33,050	35,423
New York	114,695	122,424
Ohio	57,150	66,474
Pennsylvania	94,956	98,277
Wisconsin	27,709	28,199

I desire to call attention to the effect of this illegal method of figuring the quotas on my home city of Canton, Ohio. According to the estimate of the Bureau of the Census, the actual population of Canton on July 1, 1917, was 62,566. Under the method of figuring the quotas on the registration the population of Canton is inflated over 100,000, and is estimated for the purpose of the draft to be 177,586. On actual population Canton's gross quota would be 798; on this inflated population Canton's gross quota would be 1,943.

The city of Akron, in my State, with an estimated actual population of 93,604, is inflated for the purpose of the draft to 338,348.

The city of Cleveland, with an actual population, according to the Bureau of the Census, of 690,837, has been inflated for the purpose of the draft to 1,125,440.

The city of Youngstown, Ohio, with an actual population of 112,282, as estimated by the Bureau of the Census, is inflated for the purpose of the draft to 228,380.

The towns I have mentioned are all industrial centers, where the foreign population is very large. In the city of Canton it is estimated by competent authority that of the number of young men registered almost one-half are unnaturalized foreigners. It is at least fair to say that a very large number of those registered are unnaturalized foreigners.

Under the plan worked out by your department to fix the quotas on the registration, my home town of Canton, with a population of less than 65,000, will be required to furnish more men than the State of New Hampshire, State of Delaware, State of Nevada, the State of Vermont, or the District of Columbia, twice as many as the State of Oregon, three times as many as Alaska, and twice as many as the State of Wyoming.

I desire to protest against your department arbitrarily changing the method provided by the conscription law of figuring these quotas. I enter this protest for the following reasons:

First. Because it is illegal and not in accordance with the law governing the fixing of the quotas for the several States, Territories, and subdivision thereof.

Second. Because to use the registration as a basis for figuring the population without the elimination of the unnaturalized foreigners and alien enemies will result in the placing of an unfair and unjust burden on many States and communities throughout the United States.

Third. Because I do not believe that the department by the use of any arbitrary method, whether it be illegal or of only doubtful legality, should throw open the door for a contest in the courts of this draft. Any such action is bound to mean unnecessary delay, and I believe that the department owes it as a duty to the country to adhere strictly to the letter of the law in carrying into effect the provisions of this act.

Fourth. Because the arbitrary and illegal method of figuring the quotas adopted will make the State of Ohio furnish 9,324 more soldiers on the gross quotas' estimate than her just share under the provisions of the conscription law, and other States will be relieved of sending these men, which is unjust and unfair.

Fifth. Because the population of my home town of Canton is inflated over 100,000, and 1,145 will be taken unlawfully, because under the actual population my city would only be required to send 798 men; under the inflated population Canton will have to send 1,943.

I desire to say in conclusion that I am sure that the people of the State of Ohio, the people of my home city of Canton, Ohio, as well as the people of every other community in my district want to do their share under the law, but the apportionment of the burdens of this draft should be fair and equitable, and no community should be called upon to furnish men to fill places that should be filled by men from other communities. And, above all, this draft, which is perhaps the most serious action that has been taken by Congress, which means the lives of thousands upon thousands of the young men of this country, should be conducted legally and not illegally.

The taking from any community of any number of young men qualified for military service will have its effect on the business and the industries of that community. The sending of men to war is not only a sacrifice in the home and in the family of those who go, but it is a sacrifice the community makes for the welfare of the Nation, and no community, whether it be an industrial community or otherwise, should be called upon to bear an unequal share of this burden.

I believe that the act requiring that the quota should be taken from actual population is just and fair and should be adhered to by your department.

Very truly, yours, ROSCOE C. MCCULLOCH.

The following tables, prepared by the Bureau of the Census at my request, show the quotas for each State, first, if based upon the Federal census of 1910; second, if based upon the official estimate of population of July 1, 1917, by the Bureau of the Census; and, third, if based upon registration on June 5, 1917.

A careful examination of these figures will show clearly that by figuring the quotas on the registration of June 5, 1917, rather than on the actual population the quotas in Southern States are reduced and the quotas in Northern States are increased.

The Food Situation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES B. ASWELL,
OF LOUISIANA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, July 26, 1917.

Mr. ASWELL. Mr. Speaker, some weeks ago certain circulars were distributed among the Members of Congress respecting the food situation, to which I now desire to call attention.

The one from the National Dairy Council states in part:

Our people should bear in mind the significance of the heart-rending appeal made to the German Reichstag by Field Marshal Von Hindenburg. He cries for fat, fat, fat, fat for his soldiers and fat for the weakened people. The fate of Germany may hang upon the question of fat. At no time in history has the value of fat assumed so ominous a meaning. * * * Our stock of dairy cattle is lower to-day per thousand population than it has been for 40 years. As a Nation, we may well be alarmed over the certainty of further depletion.

One from the National Dairy Show Association says in part:

The allied battling armies need food. Nature seems to have conspired with human passion in this great catastrophe. Her yields are less in these times of greatest stress than they have been in years. The dread specter of famine stalks through the world. Our own country faces a serious food shortage. Prices are abnormally high and already beyond the reach of some pocketbooks.

The warning given to Congress and the country in these two circulars is confirmed in the Chicago Dairy Produce, May 22, 1917, which publishes a symposium of letters from butter producers in "all parts of the country where butter is made in considerable quantities," from which it concludes editorially that—

It is safe to say the make will be no larger than it was last year, and the probabilities are it will be less, regardless of how favorable conditions may be.

It is a matter of common knowledge that under existing conditions many of the American people are unable to obtain any reasonable supply of wholesome table fat. I therefore wish to call attention to a practical method of relief by showing how this situation is met in other countries.

The Manufacturers' Record, June 7, 1917, quotes from United States Department of Commerce Reports:

The latest statistics estimate that Denmark (2,500,000 population, 15,388 square miles) contains 1,300,000 milch cows. * * * Of the 117,000,000 kilos (234,000,000 pounds) of butter made annually, 95,000,000 kilos (190,000,000 pounds) are exported. The consumption of margarine as a substitute for butter is steadily increasing, and it is remarkable to notice how little the Danes care for their own dairy product. In 1915 about 55,100,000 kilos (110,200,000 pounds) were consumed.

From this it would appear that the Danish people consume per capita per annum 44 pounds of margarine and 18 pounds of butter, total 62 pounds, while in America we consume per capita per annum 1½ pounds of margarine and 10½ pounds of butter, total 12 pounds. The South ships millions of pounds of cottonseed oil to Denmark to be churned into margarine.

Commerce Reports, May 14, 1917, says, in part:

In 1916, as in 1915, there was a large demand for edible oils of all sorts to keep pace with the constantly extending demand for margarine, and this in face of rapid increase in margarine imports to the United Kingdom. * * * The price of butter is now prohibitive to the majority of the population, and the rapid extension of margarine is certain to continue. * * * British margarine is made principally from vegetable fats, and may be expected, therefore, to absorb increasing quantities of * * * cottonseed oil.

English annual report on the oil and fat markets for 1916 says, in part:

A matter of far-reaching importance to the future of the edible fat market is the rejection in the American Senate of the Underwood amendment to the Senate revenue bill providing that a flat tax of 2 cents a pound be placed on margarine, colored and uncolored. * * * The achievement of this object would have given considerable fillip to the American margarine industry and would have meant an increasing competition on the part of the American manufacturers for the purchase of the raw material. Fortunately, however, for the European manufacturers, the American dairy interest still carries the day. * * * It will be interesting to watch whether future attempts to allow the American margarine industry free scope will meet with better success.

The Chicago Dairy Produce, May 22, 1917, quotes from Daily Commerce Reports, in part, as follows:

As Trinidad depends for its butter supply chiefly from foreign sources, * * * there has been a tendency on the part of local housewives to make their own butter from coconuts, which grow abundantly in Trinidad. * * * It seems likely that the use of homemade coconut butter will in the future become very extensive. * * * The department of agriculture of Trinidad is doing much to promote the household manufacture and use of coconut butter, and the newspapers are doing much to point out the great economy of coconut butter.

When properly churned in milk peanut and cottonseed oils produce the same delicious, wholesome product as coconut oil so churned; yet if an association of American farmers want to churn their oils in their milk so as to make a delightful, wholesome table food for sale, they must pay $600 a year license, give bond for $5,000, and make daily reports to the Commissioner of Internal Revenue. If they artificially color the product so as to make it pleasing to the eye—as butter is artificially colored—they must pay 10 cents per pound tax. If they make it white, they must still pay one-fourth of 1 cent per pound tax; but nobody wants it white, just as nobody wants white butter.

If the grocer sells the colored food in 10-pound packages or more, he must pay $480, or if he sells only the white food, he must pay $200 a year license, and must make frequent reports to the Internal-Revenue Department.

If he sells in less than 10-pound packages, he must pay for colored food a license of $48, and for white a $6 license.

The result of these restrictions is, as shown above, that the American people have available only about 1½ pounds of oleomargarine per capita per annum, and a wholly inadequate supply of butter, which there is no hope of increasing.

Whereas, if these restrictions were removed so that the business could be engaged in freely as in other countries, at least five or six hundred million pounds of our excellent food oils now going into industrial uses would be properly used as food under Government inspection and to the great relief of the people.

Another result of the removal of these restrictions would be the rapid development of the dairy business, especially in the South, where the combined product of the available cows and available oils in the respective localities would constitute sufficient volume for the establishment of creameries producing margarine in sections now unable to adopt such a course.

Mr. J. Carter, of Gainesville, Ga., says:

I know from actual experience that cottonseed oil (high grade) added to your milk when you churn makes as good butter as you want. If the legal obstructions could be removed, it would be a great blessing to this country and the world at large. It would be a good time now, as butter and fats are so scarce and high, to have the law so revised as to remove the cause that prevents the use of cottonseed and peanut oils.

Mr. James D. Dawson, of Houston, Tex., says:

I am conducting some experiments in the churning of clarola (peanut oil) with milk, and the last result is the production of 3 pounds of the most delicious butter, equally as good as any Elgin brand, from 60 cents worth of material; and if this is not a poor man's proposition I don't know what is.

But the departments here, to whom the people would naturally apply for formulæ and methods for this domestic increase of the food supply, decline to give the people any instruction on the subject, saying, "It would be most unwise to disseminate these instructions, for the reason that any person who manufactured the product for sale or consumption of others, except on his own family table, without compensation, would be liable as a manufacturer of oleomargarine under the present statute."

Surely this legal chain which binds the people to poverty should be broken. It is time for the Congress to act. It is ridiculous to hear so much talk about food control and food conservation and at the same time fail to respond to this just demand from the poor man for a reasonable butter supply. How long must the people remain in the grip of the Butter Trust? How long must the poor people starve for fat while the Butter Trust, though totally unable to supply the demand at any price, fattens on the iniquitous existing oleomargarine law? Let the people speak through their Representatives in Congress.

Physical Valuation of Railroads.

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,
OF WASHINGTON,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Wednesday, June 27, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (S. 1816) to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, when the effort was made to get this bill up two weeks ago, near the close of Calendar Wednesday, I endeavored to secure an hour, as was my right, for the purpose of discussing the slow progress of the physical valuation of railroads and to point out the location of some of these very pretty private cars carrying the letters "I. C. C." and equipped with stewards and good food served without regard to the mandates of Food Dictator Hoover. It seems that my part of the country from San Francisco nearly to the Canadian line are dotted with these cars just now, this being the cool season out there. I am not surprised that these and other Government employees should seek that delightful country where the thermometer does not go much above 80 degrees in these days.

But I do not get the hour. I am given two minutes, and in that space of time I can not go into even the briefest discussion of the physical examination of railroads—the unnecessary costs of that examination—the slowness of it, and the probabilities that it will not be finished in 10 years, and will not be worth much if anything when it is finished. Two minutes will not even open the discussion. I have time, however, to say that I am fully in accord with the Sims amendment to the bill under discussion. I think it is better for us to give the power named and the restrictions now than to stand on the floor as has been done and say what Congress is likely to do if the commission does not regulate rates to satisfy a majority of the Members of Congress. It seems to be well understood that nearly all the Members are opposed to the 15 per cent increase, and as it was so stated by the chairman of the committee, I shall not have any hesitancy in repeating it. However, it is a strange situation. Congress appoints an arm stronger than Congress itself; tells that arm to act without fear or favor; then threatens the commissioners if they fail to act in accordance with public acclaim. And at the same time Congress proposes to refuse to place in this new bill restrictions that would prevent such occurrences.

The CHAIRMAN. The time of the gentleman from Washington has expired.

The Revenue Bill.

OF

HON. CLAUDE KITCHIN,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

Mr. KITCHIN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a statement of the essential differences between the House revenue bill and the Senate revenue bill as reported to the Senate July 3, especially with reference to the excess-profits tax and the income tax.

In view of the many misleading and misrepresenting statements which lately have appeared in the press relative to the essential differences between the House revenue bill and the amendments of the Senate Finance Committee, reported July 3, 1917, with respect to the excess-profits tax and the income tax, and of many inquiries made of me by Members of the House, I wish to make a statement as to such differences:

1. The House bill provides for a flat rate of 16 per cent (8 per cent under existing law and an additional 8 per cent under the bill, making 16 per cent) on the profits in excess of (a) $5,000 plus (b) 8 per cent of the amount of actual capital invested, including paid-in or earned surplus and undivided profits; that is, after allowing an exemption of $5,000 flat in all cases and a further exemption of 8 per cent net profits on actual capital invested, including surplus and undivided profits, the tax of 16 per cent is levied on the balance of the profits. This deduction or exemption, like the exemption for individuals in the income tax, applies equally to all, big and little, whether the profits were small or large, before the war or now.

The amendment of the Senate Finance Committee provides, after the manner of the English system, as the basis of deduction or exemption and computation of the tax, the average net profits of the taxable person or corporation during the three years, 1911, 1912, and 1913, called the "prewar period." The tax is levied on the amount of profits made each taxable year, beginning with 1917, in excess of the average amount made during such prewar period. In case not as much as 6 per cent on the average capital employed was made, on the average, during these years, the person or corporation is permitted to have as a deduction or exemption and as a basis of computation of the tax 6 per cent on "the average capital employed" during the taxable year. The rate levied is as follows:

On the first 15 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 12 per cent.

On the next 10 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 16 per cent.

On the next 25 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 20 per cent.

On the next 25 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 25 per cent.

On the next 25 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 30 per cent.

On the next 50 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 35 per cent.

On the next 50 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 40 per cent.

On the next 50 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 45 per cent.

On the profits in excess of 250 per cent increase in profits over the average for the prewar period, 50 per cent.

This basis of deduction or exemption and of computation of the tax makes an undue discrimination in favor of the fortunate persons or corporations that were highly prosperous during the "prewar period" and equally as prosperous or more so now, as against the less fortunate and less prosperous persons or corporations during such period, but prosperous now. It works an intolerable inequality. Under the provision of the Finance Committee amendments, the more prosperous persons or corporations during the prewar period, and equally as or more prosperous now have a larger exemption and pay less tax—and in many cases no tax—than the less fortunate and less prosperous during such period, though it may be a competitor.

For instance—I have in mind such an actual case: Corporation A, with $100,000 capital invested, made during the prewar period $25,000, or 25 per cent profit. It now makes $25,000 a year. B corporation in same business, same capital, but many years younger, during the prewar period made $6,000, or 6 per cent. It is now making $25,000, or 25 per cent, just the same as the older corporation.

Under Senate Finance Committee amendments corporation A will pay not a cent of excess-profits tax, because there is no profit in excess of the prewar profit, while corporation B will pay $6,929, as it is allowed only a $6,000 exemption, being its prewar profits. During the three prewar years and the first taxable year 1917, corporation A will have made $100,000 clear profits, while corporation B will have made less than $43,000 profits. Yet it pays $6,929 taxes to the Government to help finance the war struggle, and corporation A pays not a cent.

If corporation A makes now $30,000 and corporation B $20,000, B corporation will pay $4,479, while corporation A, making $10,000 more annually, will pay only $650.

A corporation of $10,000,000 capital making during the prewar years and now $1,500,000, 15 per cent—and there are such cases—will pay not a penny of excess-profits tax, while a little corporation or merchant or farmer of $20,000 capital making 6 per cent, or $1,200 during the prewar years and now making $6,000, will pay over $1,800 taxes.

Why should the Government give by any method of taxation or by any law such an immense advantage to one corporation or person over another or make such a discrimination in favor of one against the other, to be used perhaps after the war to cripple or crush out its competitors?

Take another case: Corporations A and B have $1,000,000 capital each. Corporation A during the prewar period made $200,000, or 20 per cent. It now makes $400,000, or 40 per cent. Corporation B made during the prewar period $60,000, or 6 per cent. It now makes $300,000, or 30 per cent; $100,000 less than corporation A. Under Senate Finance Committee's provision corporation B will pay $94,290, while corporation A, with same capital, same business, and making $100,000 more profits annually, will pay only $44,300.

There are hundreds of corporations whose annual profits each reach into the hundreds of thousands and millions that will pay not a cent of excess-profits tax under the Senate Finance Committee's amendments because, being highly prosperous during the prewar years, they are making the same amount of profits now, and therefore have no excess under the Senate Finance Committee's basis of computation. The House bill makes no such discriminations.

2. Under the amendment of the Senate Finance Committee individuals, except officials of the Government, employees, and agents receiving fixed wages or salaries, including in the exception such employees and agents as Gary, of the Steel Corporation; Schwab, of the Bethlehem Co.; Dupont, of the Powder Co.; J. P. Morgan, of Morgan & Co., etc.; lawyers and doctors and other professional men, are included in the application of the tax, as well as corporations and partnerships.

The House bill includes only corporations and partnerships, and excludes individuals because (1) of the extreme difficulty in the administration of the law as regards individuals, and (2) of the exemption from the income tax of partnerships and the exemption of corporations from the surtax, and (3) of the discrimination an excess-profits tax on individuals would make in favor of a corporation as against an individual, especially in view of the surtax on individuals.

Under the Senate Finance Committee amendment there are hundreds of cases where corporations, each making hundreds of thousands and some millions of dollars profits annually, pay less taxes—and in many cases no tax at all—than a little farmer worth less than $20,000.

I know a farmer—there are thousands of such all over the country—worth less than $20,000 who this year, if present prices prevail, will make $6,000 profit, while in 1911. 1912, and 1913, the pre-war years, he did not make over $1,000. I know a corporation whose capital and surplus is over $100,000,000 and whose profits are over $12,000,000 annually. Under the Senate Finance Committee amendment this farmer will pay $2,071, while this corporation will pay not a cent to help support the Government in its war contest.

Under the Senate Finance Committee amendments, as to excess-profits tax and income tax, the United States Steel Corporation, with a billion and a half capital, making annual profits of over $270,000,000, will pay not a cent of tax either on incomes or excess profits, while this little farmer worth less than $20,000, making a profit of $6,000, will pay $2,071.

Some other instances of the heavy taxes the farmers will have to pay under the Senate Finance Committee amendments: A farmer with a farm and equipment worth $30,000, making $1,800 during the pre-war period—and but few made that much—making this year by hard work of himself and family and high prices for his produce $10,000, will pay $3,329 taxes. One with farm and equipment worth $75,000 or $100,000 making in the prewar period $5,000 and making this year $30,000 will pay $10,358 taxes.

The farmers in North Carolina or Iowa or in other agricultural States, under the Senate Finance Committee amendments, will pay much more excess-profits taxes than will the largest and most prevalent industrial corporations in the respective States.

Under the Senate Finance Committee amendments, applying the excess-profits tax to individuals, a great advantage and favor is given the corporation over the individual in the same business with the same capital and making the same profit now and during the prewar period; and in practically all instances the individual will not only pay more income tax than the corporation, but a heavier excess-profits tax, while in many cases the corporation will pay none. For instance: A, an individual—farmer, merchant, or manufacturer—and B, who incorporates his business, owning all stock except a share each to his wife and daughter, have the same kind of business, same capital, say, $50,000; each manages his business, giving to it his entire time. Each, exclusive of salary, makes same profit, say, $15,000, with same deduction of 6 per cent, or $3,000, the basis of computation.

But B, being active president and manager of a corporation, has a right to deduct, before the tax applies to his profits, for his services a salary, say, of $3,000. A, being an individual, has no right to deduct salary or any compensation for his services.

A will pay a tax of $4,714.50, while B's corporation will pay only $3,214.50—$1,500 less than individual A.

Take another case: A, an individual, has a $100,000 capital in business, made 6 per cent, or $6,000, during the prewar year, makes now $25,000, and manages the business. B, C, and D incorporate, each having one-third of the stock, the corporation has the same kind of business, same capital, same prewar profits, and same profits now as individual A, exclusive of salaries, but B, C, and D have the right, as managers or employees of the corporation, to charge, and do charge up, as part of the operating expenses $2,500 salary for each.

A, individual, pays in excess-profits taxes $6,929, while the corporation of B, C, and D pays only $3,379. And, in addition to this, on account of the surtax of the income-tax law, A pays over $600 more income tax than the corporation on its income and the three stockholders on their income from the corporation.

But suppose A and the corporation, exclusive of salaries to B, C, and D, each make $13,500 profits, B, C, and D having the right to deduct their salaries as a part of the operating expenses and A having no such right, the corporation pays no excess-profits tax. A pays $1,854.

Suppose the capital of individual A and the corporation (of B, C, and D) is each $1,000,000, with the same kind of business, same prewar profits of 6 per cent, or $60,000, deduction, making the same profits now (exclusive of salaries of B, C, and D) of 25 per cent, or $250,000. B, C, and D deduct, as they have the right, their salaries of $10,000 each. Individual A would pay $15,000 more of excess profits than the corporation of B, C, and D and over $27,000 more income tax than both the corporation on its income and B, C, and D on their incomes from the corporation.

The House bill contains no such discriminations in favor of corporations as against individuals.

3. The Senate committee amendments do not make an exemption of $5,000, as the House bill does, but provides that the excess-profits tax shall not apply to the trade or business of a corporation, partnership, or individual whose income is less than $5,000.

For instance, A's income from his trade or business is $4,999.99. He is not taxed on any amount; but if B's income, in the same business and same capital and same prewar profits, is $5,000, just a cent more than A's, he is taxable on the whole $5,000, less the prewar profits. Farmer or merchant or manufacturer A, with prewar profits of $1,000, and a profit now, 1917, or any year thereafter, of $4,999.99 pays no tax.

Farmer or merchant or manufacturer B, with the same kind of business, with same capital, with same prewar period profit, making $5,000, just a cent more than A, now, 1917, or any year thereafter, pays under Senate committee amendment a tax of $1,571.

Take another example of the discrimination in favor of a corporation as against an individual in view of this special provision:

Individual A, farmer, merchant, or manufacturer, with capital of $20,000, prewar-period profits of 6 per cent, or $1,200, makes a profit now of $6,000.

B, with $20,000 capital, incorporates, owning all stock (except a share each to his wife and daughter, to comply with his State's law of incorporation).

The corporation with same kind of business, same prewar-period profits, exclusive of B's salary, makes same profit as individual A of $6,000.

Deducting B's salary, say $1,500, as under the law it has the right, the corporation pays no tax, while individual A is made to pay $1,885 tax. This is so, since after deducting the salary of $1,500 the income of B, incorporated, is only $4,500—"less than $5,000," while individual A, not being permitted under existing or the proposed law to deduct any salary for his services, the income of his business being therefore $5,000 and over, must pay a tax on the whole excess of profits. The House bill has no such discriminations.

4. The Senate committee amendments include for the tax farmers, merchants, butchers, blacksmiths, and so forth, but exempt from the tax lawyers, doctors, officers of the Government, and employees and agents receiving fixed amounts for their services. Employees and agents include officers of corporations, like Gary, of the United States Steel Corporation; Schwab, of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation; Morgan, of the J. P. Morgan & Co.; Du Pont, of the powder company, and so forth.

Why should such a tax be levied on the excess profits or income of farmers, merchants, blacksmiths, and so forth, and not be levied on the excess profits or incomes of lawyers, doctors, employees and agents of corporations like Gary, Schwab, Du Pont, Morgan, and so forth, whose increase of income from increase of salaries since the prewar period has been enormous? The House bill contains no such discrimination.

The excess-profits law of other nations—Great Britain, Italy, France, Canada—and the existing excess-profits tax law of our country and the provisions of the House bill exempt from the excess-profits tax individual farmers. Why should the Senate Finance Committee now insist on including them?

A tobacco farmer of North Carolina or Virginia or Kentucky or Connecticut—and there are many such—worth less than $20,000, making a prewar profit of not more than $1,000—and many made less—will by the hard work of himself and family make a profit this year of $6,000, if present prices prevail. He will be made to pay under the Senate committee amendments an excess-profits tax of $2,000 to help the Government out in its war struggle, while the American Tobacco Co., with a capital of $92,000,000 and $35,000,000 surplus, making over $12,000,000 clear profits a year, will not be made to pay a cent of excess profits; and, besides, by the Senate amendment to the income tax, this same tobacco company is relieved of tens of thousands of dollars of income tax yearly.

Why does the Senate Finance Committee wish to take from the farmer, in every section of our country, out of his little income of $6,000, at least $2,000, when he and his wife and children have been struggling a lifetime to make a little profit to improve or build a better home for themselves and better houses for his labor and better barns for his stock? This is the first time he has had the chance, and the Senate committee's amendment takes that away from him. The House bill gives him the chance.

5. The Senate committee amendment expressly permits "water" to be counted as "capital employed" in computing deductions from the taxable income or profits by including specifically "trade-marks, trade brands, and like intangible assets" as part of the "capital employed." Most of the water in all big, overcapitalized corporations is in their value of "trade-marks, trade brands, and like intangible assets."

The House bill expressly prohibits such "water" to be counted as "actual capital invested" in computing deductions or exemptions from the tax.

6. Under the Senate amendments the excess-profits tax provision requires in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred a physical valuation of all the assets of each taxable individual, partnership, or corporation, and is impossible of administration.

If the "capital," as defined by the amendments, remain the same in the taxable year as in the prewar period, the provisions are most easily administered, and many corporations will pay a larger tax—though many will pay none—than under the House bill. But the "capital," as defined by the Senate committee, is different and "greater" in ninety-nine cases out of a hundred, and therefore the Government must, in administering the tax law, resort to the impossible thing, the valuation in every taxable year and in each of the three prewar years the value of all the assets of every taxable person, partnership, and corporation in the United States.

They provide (1) that "if during the prewar period the net income of a corporation or partnership, or of a citizen or resident of the United States, from a trade or business was less than 6 per cent on the average capital employed," capital meaning, as I will presently show, "value of assets," not actual capital invested, according to House bill, "a deduction from the net income during the taxable year of 6 per cent on the average capital," meaning value of assets, "employed during such taxable year"; and (2) that "if the average capital employed in the trade or business during the taxable year is greater or less than the average capital or proportion thereof so employed during the prewar period, the excess profits shall be determined by deducting from the total net income for the taxable year an amount which bears the same proportion to the average annual net income for the prewar period which the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the taxable year bears to the average capital or proportion thereof employed during the prewar period." That is, if one employing $50,000 capital during the prewar period made 10 per cent, or $5,000, but during the taxable year his "capital" had increased to $100,000, he would have to make over $10,000, or 10 per cent, before the tax attached—before there would be any excess of profits. He would have $10,000 instead of $5,000 deduction.

"Capital"—and this is to be noted carefully—is defined thus by the Senate committee amendment:

> For the purpose of this title, capital shall be deemed to be the fair average value of the assets actually invested and employed in the trade or business less the average amounts of the liabilities incurred in respect to such trade or business.

And again:

> The value of any patent, copyright, trade-mark, or like intangible assets shall not be taken to exceed its cash value at the beginning of the prewar period.

So, then, it is clear—impossible of any other construction—that, to ascertain if the person, partnership, or corporation is entitled to the deduction in provision of subdivision (1) above, a physical valuation of all the "assets" for each taxable year, 1917 and thereafter, and also for each of the prewar years, 1911, 1912, and 1913, must be made.

To ascertain the deduction in subdivision (2), physical valuation of the assets of every taxable individual, partnership, and corporation must be made for each of the three prewar years and for this and each taxable year hereafter.

Each taxable person, partnership, and corporation is entitled to the deduction and computation of the tax on the basis set out in this subdivision (2), provided his "average capital"—meaning by the definition of the Senate amendment the "average value of his or its assets"—is "greater or less" than the average capital—assets—during the prewar period, and so forth; not, it is to be carefully noted, "greater" because of new capital or new money being put in, but simply if the assets have increased in value.

The "capital" in the definition of the Senate amendment—that is, "the assets" of practically every taxable person, partnership, and corporation, at least ninety-nine out of a hundred—is greater than they were during the prewar period, although not a dollar of new money or capital might have been put into the business. Plants and property, and therefore value of the assets, of thousands of persons and corporations are doubled, and in some cases quadrupled, in value since the prewar period, regardless of any new capital added.

Then in practically all cases to administer provisions of subdivision (2) physical valuation of the assets must be taken. What is the valuation of all of the assets of all of the railroads? What is the valuation of all the assets of the Pennsylvania Railroad? Of the Illinois Central? How will the Government clerks and agents get at them? Some years ago Congress authorized a commission to value the assets of the railroads. It has hundreds of experts, has labored for years and has many more ahead of it, has expended millions of dollars and will expend millions more, and has not yet completed the valuation.

But under Senate amendments Government clerks and agents within a few months of each year will have to value their assets for 1917 and each taxable year thereafter, and also for each of the prewar years—1911, 1912, and 1913. What is the value of the assets of the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, American Tobacco Co., the Du Pont Powder Co., and each of their subsidiary corporations? What was the value of their assets in 1911, 1912, and 1913? And the assets of every taxable individual—farmers, merchants, blacksmiths, and so forth—of every partnership and of every corporation in the United States must be taken not only for 1917 and every taxable year thereafter but of 1911, 1912, and 1913, and all within four months of each year! How many hundreds of thousands of extra clerks and employees would it take, and how long, even if such a task was possible of performance? But, under the only possible construction of the Senate Finance Committee amendment relative to subdivision (2) above, how much taxes would the Government raise from the corporations, especially the big ones? Impossible to raise one-fourth—certainly not one-third—of the Senate committee's estimates. The excess-profits tax provision of the Senate committee could not possibly produce one-half of the amount which the House bill will. Take the Bethlehem Steel Corporation that is and has been making enormous "war profits." Its stock has gone up from 80 to 600. Every old dollar and every new dollar of capital put in is worth 6 for 1.

Its assets and those of its subsidiary companies—plants, machinery, equipments, and so forth, the same as it had in the prewar period—are worth now five or six times as much as during the prewar period. So under Senate amendment, subdivision (2), if the Bethlehem Steel Corporation was making profits of $6,500,000 during prewar period, it would have to make now five or six times as much, or from $32,500,000 to $39,000,000 before the excess-profits tax of Senate Finance Committee would attach—that is, would have that much deduction or exemptions instead of $6,500,000. Let us take the familiar example of a ship. Suppose my business is that of hauling freight and passengers by water. In prewar period I owned a ship worth, then, $500,000, making net $50,000 a year. That ship is now worth $1,500,000—and ships have increased in value that much—though not a dollar has been added to it since prewar period. My "capital"—assets under Senate amendments—is "greater" by $1,000,000—increased 200 per cent—than in prewar period. Now, before the Senate excess-profits tax attaches, I would have to be making during the taxable year $150,000 instead of $50,000. I would be entitled to a deduction of $150,000 instead of $50,000. That is the proportion provided for by Senate committee amendment in subdivision (2) above.

II. AS TO THE INCOME TAX AND ESTATE OR INHERITANCE TAX.

1. The Senate Finance Committee amendments strike from the House bill the Lenroot amendment, increasing the surtax on large incomes of from $40,000 to $1,000,000 and over. By this the large incomes are relieved of $66,000,000 of tax annually.

2. They strike from the House bill the so-called retroactive tax on incomes, which, in fact, is not a retroactive tax any more than the income-tax law of 1913 or the income-tax law of 1916 or the proposed income-tax provisions of the House bill, approved by the Senate committee. This relieves income taxpayers of $108,000,000.

3. They repeal the "munitions manufacturer's tax" provisions of the revenue act of September 8, 1916, whereby a tax of 12½ per cent, in addition to the regular income tax and excess profits tax, was imposed on the net profits received from the manufacture and sale of direct munitions of war, such as powder and explosives, cannons, guns, rifles, projectiles, and so forth. By this the munition makers are relieved of more than $25,000,000 taxes a year.

The House bill leaves that tax unrepealed.

4. They amend the present income tax law by exempting all corporations from taxation on account of dividends received from other corporations.

Corporations, especially the big ones, are thus relieved of more than $50,000,000 of taxes a year.

The United States Steel Corporation alone is relieved of $10,800,000 annually, on basis of last year's income, and it will make more this year. No such exemption was in the income tax act of October 3, 1913, nor in the present income tax act, of September 8, 1916, nor in the House bill.

In 1913, when the income tax bill was pending in Congress, and again in 1916, when the present income tax act was pending, and again this session while the House bill was pending in the House, the holding companies, like the United States Steel Corporation, and the big corporations, like the Bethlehem Steel Corporation, American Tobacco Co., United Cigar Stores Companies of America, the Du Pont Powder Co., holding large stock in other corporations, wished and endeavored to get into these acts and bills such an exemption from taxation, but failed.

The Senate committee provision (if it becomes law) crowns their efforts and gratifies their wishes.

5. They relieve by amendment to present income-tax act the railroads and big industrial corporations of the payment of the tax direct to the Government on the income from their bonds, which in their bonds they contracted with the purchasers to pay. Many large railroad companies and industrial corporations issued for sale, and continue to do so, their bonds, with a covenant therein to pay themselves to the Government all income and other Federal taxes which were then and might thereafter be imposed by law on the income from such bonds. The railroads and industrial corporations, on account of such covenants, received from the purchasers a larger price for such bonds. Since the income-tax bill of October, 1913, was pending in Congress until now the most unrelenting efforts have been made upon the part of such railroads and industrial corporations to have stricken from the income-tax bills and acts the "collection at the source" provision, and thus relieve them from the payment of the tax by them direct to the Government, according to their covenant. They failed in their fight and efforts in 1913. They failed again in 1916. They failed again before the Ways and Means Committee and the House at this session. They win before the Senate Finance Committee. The taxes involved amount to several millions of dollars a year.

6. They amend present income-tax act by imposing "an additional tax of 15 per cent upon the amount remaining undistributed 60 days after the end of each calendar or fiscal year of the total net incomes of every corporation, joint-stock company or association, or insurance company received during the year." This "additional tax" does not apply (1) "to the portion of undistributed profits used to establish or maintain reserves required by law, (2) to the portion of undistributed profits of railroad companies used for extension, renewal, or betterments with approval of Interstate Commerce Commission or proper State authorities, and (3) an amount of such undistributed profits equal to 20 per cent of such net income of corporations directly engaged in the production or distribution of commodities or in banking, but only while and to the extent such exempted amount is derived from such activities and so employed. * * * Only one of the exemptions in (1), (2), and (3) shall be allowed to the same taxpayer."

The House bill contains no such handicap on business and industry.

7. They strike out from the House bill the additional tax proposed on the transfer of estates of decedents, known as the estate or inheritance tax.

This relieves the big estates or inheritances of $6,000,000 for the first year and $38,000,000, or more, yearly thereafter.

III. SOME OTHER DIFFERENCES.

The House bill imposes a tax on the manufacture and sale of automobiles, tires, cigars, cigarettes, snuff, chewing and smoking tobacco, Coca-Cola and other soft drinks, phonographs and talking machines, Victrolas and other musical instruments, motion-picture films, sporting goods, sporting-club dues, perfumes and cosmetics, diamonds and other jewelry—all luxuries.

The Senate Finance Committee amendments strike out altogether many millions of dollars of such taxes and shift over $100,000,000 from these luxuries to the owners of automobiles and to necessities like sugar, coffee, tea, and cocoa, placing over $60,000,000 increase taxes on them.

They reduce the taxes on cigarettes, chewing and smoking tobacco, and snuff from the House bill $15,000,000 and put that amount on coffee, tea, and cocoa.

They strike from the House bill the tax of over $75,000,000 yearly on the manufacture and sale of automobiles, tires, diamonds and other jewelry, chewing gum, motion-picture films—87 per cent of which are manufactured by one corporation—and the tax on club dues, and to make good this loss of revenue from the House bill they put $40,000,000 a year on the owners of automobiles and $40,000,000 on sugar consumers.

They strike out the House-bill tax of $6,000,000 on insurance companies and bond-indemnity companies—taxed in Spanish-American War tax act and in the emergency tax act of October, 1914—and make good the loss by putting a tax on depositors in banks—a tax of 1 cent on every check, over $5, drawn by the depositor in getting his own money out of the bank.

They levy no tax on coffee, tea, and cocoa in the hands of the importer, wholesaler, or dealer, when the act passes. It is estimated that the big importers and dealers have on hand 400,000,000 pounds of coffee and tea. This escapes taxation and thereby the dealers make a clear extra profit of 2 cents a pound on coffee and 5 cents on tea—on every pound of it; that is over $8,000,000 extra profit, and the Government loses that much. Every pound of such coffee and tea in the hands of the dealer will at once be put up in price at least, if not more, to the amount of the tax. The two big coffee and tea corporations, with their chain of stores throughout the country, by the simple operation of the Senate amendment will make, it is estimated, at least $3,000,000.

While there are numerous instances of discrimination and seeming favoritism all through the Senate amendments, there is one so gross and palpable that I can not refrain from mentioning. An owner of a little independent cigar store, say in Charlotte, N. C., with one or two thousand dollars capital, owned by one of small means, giving his entire time to it, supporting his little family from its meager income—and there are thousands of such cases throughout the country—is given by the Senate committee amendment exemption from the tobacco tax of only 100 pounds of chewing and smoking tobacco, 500 cigars, and 1,000 cigarettes, while the United Cigar Stores Co. of America, with over $30,000,000 of capital, over $2,000,000 of surplus, with a thousand stores throughout the country, making an annual profit of over $2,000,000, is given an exemption from the tax of 100,000 pounds of tobacco, 500,000 cigars, and 1,000,000 cigarettes. The House bill contains no such discrimination or favoritism, though the representatives of the United Cigar Stores Co. of America tried to get such a provision in it while pending before the Ways and Means Committee.

Soldiers' Mail.

OF

HON. HALVOR STEENERSON,

OF MINNESOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

Mr. STEENERSON. Mr. Speaker, this bill is to provide for the national security and defense. Nothing is more important for our defense than the care of our soldiers abroad.

Today I introduced the following bill, to wit:

Be it enacted, etc., That the Postmaster General may provide by regulation for the transmission of unpaid and duly certified letters of soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States and may, by and with the advice and consent of the President, negotiate and conclude postal treaties or conventions with the Government of any foreign country where our expeditionary forces may be providing for the free transmission of such letters from any such foreign country to the United States during the present war and until such forces are withdrawn.

In an interview published in the New York Herald yesterday I pointed out that Congress alone could not regulate postage on mail originating in foreign countries and that the Post Office Department would have to negotiate with the Government concerned. Section 398 of the Revised Statutes authorizes the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to negotiate and conclude postal treaties in general, but it is doubtful whether it is broad enough to cover the unusual and extraordinary situation arising out of the war, and for that reason I think Congress ought to give express authority to the Postmaster General covering this precise exigency. Existing law provides for the transmission of unpaid soldiers' letters, postage to be paid on delivery. Manifestly the statute has no extraterritorial force, and the department, in its rules and regulations, very properly restricts its operation to the United States and the dependencies thereof.

The bills heretofore introduced in Congress on this subject simply change this law so as to make the transmission of such letters free, but they do not extend it to foreign jurisdictions. If Congress should pass the proposed measures, it would not in the slightest degree benefit or affect our expeditionary forces in foreign countries, which are the very men whom we seek to aid. I have therefore prepared a bill, first, authorizing the free transmission of soldiers' letters in territory within the jurisdiction of the United States, and, second, authorizing the Postmaster General, by and with the advice and consent of the President, to negotiate and conclude postal treaties and conventions with the Government of any foreign country where our expeditionary forces may be and providing for the free transmission of such letters from such countries to the United States during the present war and until such forces are withdrawn.

The rule of the Universal Postal Union that each country collects and keeps the postage on mail matter originating therein and destined for foreign countries is subject to this limitation, namely, that first-class mail, though unpaid, is transmitted, but the country of destination collects and keeps double postage on delivery. For its services the country of origin is recouped by similar mail coming from other countries. This rule, however, would not be applicable to the circumstances now confronting us, for here we have large expeditionary forces in foreign countries, while those countries have no forces here to equalize the volume of such mail.

There is no question but that this privilege will be greatly appreciated by our brave boys in the field, and instead of being a burden on postal revenues I believe it will be a gain. Even if we compensate the foreign Government for the cost of this service on its part, we will be the gainer by reason of the increased amount of letter mail that will go to the soldiers from this country. As one good turn deserves another, so one letter deserves and usually gets an answer. This outgoing mail, upon which we will collect full postage, will be very profitable and more than sufficient to pay the cost of the incoming soldiers' mail. There is no doubt that fair and equitable arrangements can be made with the foreign countries concerned, for they with our own people are anxious to do all that can be reasonably done to make the stay of our boys abroad as pleasant as possible and to cheer them up while they are bravely suffering, fighting, and perhaps dying in the cause of a common humanity.

Anything that will stimulate correspondence between the home people and the boys in the field will also have a considerable military value, for it will aid in maintaining the morale of our forces at the highest attainable point.

I hope the House will act favorably on this measure at the earliest opportunity.

The Significance of the Stars and Stripes.

OF

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me to extend my remarks it affords me pleasure to insert an address delivered by Emanuel Hertz, president of Washington Heights Congregation, on July 4, 1917, on the occasion of the presentation of an American flag by the pupils of public school No. 132 to the residents around Plaza Lafayette, New York City, as follows:

Fellow Americans, boys, and girls of Washington Heights, it is recorded in the legends of the ancients which engarland the Holy Bible that in hoary antiquity when the great lawgiver stood at the foot of the flaming mountain, Mount Sinai, ready to accept the Decalogue for the people of the Book, God hesitated to give it to them, saying: "Shall I without further ado give you the Torah (Mosaic law)? Nay; give Me bondsmen that you will observe it, and I will give you the Torah." Israel replied: "Oh, Lord of the world! Our fathers are bondsmen for us." God replied: "Your fathers are My debtors, and therefore not good bondsmen." Abraham said, "Whereby shall I know it?" and thus proved himself lacking in faith. Isaac loved Esau, whom I hated, and Jacob did not immediately upon his return from Padan-Aram keep his vow that he made on his way there. "Bring Me good bondsmen and I will give you the Torah." Israel said: "Our prophets shall be our bondsmen." God again replied: "I have a claim against them, for, like foxes in the deserts became your prophets; bring Me good bondsmen and I will give you the Torah." Israel in sheer despair said: "We will give Thee our children as bondsmen." God: "Well then, these are good bondsmen, on whose bond I will give you the Torah." Hereupon the Israelites brought their wives with their babes at their breast, and He addressed the children with these words: "Behold, I will give your fathers the Torah. Will you be surety for them that they will observe it?" They answered, "Yea." He furthermore said: "I am your God." They answered: "Yea." "Ye shall have no other Gods." They said: "Nay." And so it was the little children upon whose bond God gave His people the Torah.

The children, the coming generation, were accepted as the highest kind of security that could be given by mankind. When the few remaining champions of autocracy hedged in on all sides by the legions of democracy hear that the children of America have taken hold of this fight they will understand at last that the day of doom has struck. When they hear that in addition to the 10,000,000 young men who marched quietly, unostentatiously to the roll call of the Nation and answered "Ready!" to the call of the chosen leader of this Republic, and when they hear that this vast army is thus reinforced by 10,000,000 children, then, indeed, will they appreciate the mission of the United States among the allies. Then, indeed, will they appreciate the true and new significance of this wonderful banner of the free—this map of the firmament on high, with its stars of night, its bars of light, and the celestial white emblematic of Godlike innocence. They will understand that these boys and girls have no ulterior motive—have no desire for foreign territory, for foreign pelf, for aggressions of any kind. They will understand that this flag which has stood sentinel over the destinies of this first great experiment of democracy for 140 years and has watched over every great leader and has stood sponsor for every great movement, from the sorely tried Washington at Valley Forge to the victorious Washington at Yorktown, from Jackson before New Orleans to Scott who hoisted it over the palaces of the Montezumas, from Anderson at Fort Sumter to Grant and Lee at Appomattox, from Boone and the other pioneers of the East to the empire builders of the western prairies and to the imperial Commonwealths along the Pacific; yea, over Peary at the North Pole, and they will hear its blended colors pronounce a new Magna Charta and a new freedom for all the world when it appears on the battle front in France. This flag now tells you, "My mission is understood in these United States. It is time for me to teach the gospel of liberty, of equality, of democracy to the benighted assassins who would enslave and undo mankind."

Symbols are sacred things, and the one that every man holds dear is his national flag. The heart swells and makes us follow the flag and die for it. This is no new emotion, but an inheritance from the ages when history began. Every nation has its symbolic ensign; some have birds, some have beasts, some fishes, some reptiles; the Roman legions had their eagles on their banners. Even our 13 colonies had a multitude of flags; almost as numerous as were those of the 12 tribes of Israel. When the rupture with England came and a common banner became a necessity a great many were tried and suggested; there were pine trees, rattlesnakes, leaves, threefold knotted cords with their 13 ends free, a chain or circle of 13 rings linked together, and still others, some borrowed from heraldry or from British or Dutch history; the sheaf of arrows, the hat of liberty, and the Netherlands lion. But the origin of our flag, like the Republic for which it stands, was not "the sport of chance," or "a creation of circumstances," or a shoot from the stump of dead feudalism, or a fancy of heraldry, but a true symbol of a progressive, expanding Union of States on the basis of a Federal Republic. There is something elemental about our flag, both historic and prophetic. Its stripes represent what was; its stars point to the future. Our fathers chose this floating piece of poetry for the additional reason that the red told of the blood which they willingly shed for their country, the blue of the heavens whence came their inspiration and protection, and the stars of the separate struggling States embodied in one rising nationality. Our flag is the eloquent national ensign, pure and simple. Every star has a tongue, every stripe is articulate, "and nightly to a listening earth repeats the story of her birth."

I want to see the boys and girls of this land taught that the flag is to be their shaft of light by day; their pillar of fire by night; that it is to wave about them in victory and, if perchance they are called upon to offer up their lives in its defense, here or on the distant battle field of Europe, its gentle folds will rest upon their bosoms in death. If it is a privilege to live under such a flag, it is even a greater privilege to die for it, and like Nathan Hale, every loyal son of America will regret that he has but one life to offer upon the altar of his country. What mighty deeds have been inspired, what martyrdoms have been won beneath this starry ensign of our nationality! May it ever be the pledge, the solemn covenant of our common liberties and of our common destiny.

May it ever link our Nation's past and our Nation's future and bless and protect the whole mighty family of her sons sprung from every land, garnered from every clime, and transmuted in the crucible of American citizenship, leaving behind the dross, the fallacies of monarchy, the inhumanities of slavery as they emerge from the great melting pot of our public schools; and after thus baptized, cleansed, and prepared they enter into the household of our country as did they who were invited into the tabernacle and subsequently into the temple on Mount Moriah—"for my house is the house of worship for all peoples." And they all came and they all understood. The sacred task of translating the Word of God, as revealed to Israel through lawgiver, prophet, psalmist, and sage, began at an early date. The victorious Joshua had the law engraved upon the stones of the altar, not in the original Hebrew alone but in all the languages of mankind, 70 in all, in order that all men might become acquainted with the words of the Scriptures, so that all might come and read and learn how light was the yoke of the Torah—"for what does the Lord require of thee but to do justice, to love mercy, and to walk humbly with thy God." And in like manner have we, the descendants of the Pilgrim Fathers, brought up and sustained as they were in the great struggle which was theirs, by the Bible, dedicated our land to the exiles of all lands. We had grown and prospered upon the teachings of the Great Book, and out of the gratitude of our hearts we erected an asylum fortified by the precepts of the Bible and sanctified it and purified it by that fountain of life and light; and over the whole edifice we erected a standard to which all the people of the earth might flock for help, for relief, for protection. This standard is our flag, the fairest flower, the noblest cedar on that Rock of Ages.

"I have seen the glories of art and of architecture," said Senator Hoar, "and of mountain and river. I have seen the sun set on Jungfrau and the full moon rise over Mont Blanc, but fairest vision on which these eyes ever looked was the flag of my country in a foreign land. Beautiful as a flower to those who love it, terrible as a meteor to those who hate it, it is the symbol of the power and glory and the honor" of 110,000,000 Americans. Look close upon it and you will see a grave procession of men who have given all that life holds dearest for that flag. You see there as upon a giant film unfolding before our eyes Washington and his Continentals who gave us independence. You see there the faces of Perry, of Lawrence, and of Jackson, who in 1812 gave us our respect among the nations, and you see there in that flag the faces of Anderson, of John Brown, of Phillips, of Grant, of Sherman, and of Sheridan and of Farragut, and of that Grand Army of the Republic who died that the Union and the flag might live, and first among them the face of the genius of America as expressed in its most perfect representative—the man of many sorrows—Abraham Lincoln.

Countless young men, unknown and unsung, gave their lives to guard that flag. They sacrificed everything that no star should be removed nor their number diminished, and they handed it to us without a stain. The flag again calls upon us for protection, and, thank God, the response was heard around the globe; but bear in mind that it is our duty now to establish for all time to come that if we protect the flag the flag must protect us. Wherever any American goes legally and observing the law, there the flag goes with him, to shield and guard and protect, and there it must ever go. You see, therefore, my fellow Americans, young and old, it is not alone because of its unrivaled beauty, nor for the striking combinations of form and color that enable it to be identified at a greater distance than any other national flag on earth, that this national emblem was evolved. It is because of the liberty and blessing which it guarantees to all who seek its shelter; because it offers to every creed and race a vision of hope and of opportunity unheard of in any other land; because it is the emblem of a government which secures a greater measure of happiness for the individual than any other government has ever given. The blessings our flag brings have followed wherever it has gone in its triumphant march to Alaska. to the Gulf of Mexico, and to the Pacific, to Cuba, to Porto Rico, to Hawaii, and to the far-off Philippines, to the newly acquired Danish Islands—everywhere it has been the herald of a better day; everywhere it is hailed with Messianic heart beat—with tears of joy and with songs of deliverance.

In the capitol at Albany are kept the battle flags of the New York regiments of the Civil War. They are not hung or draped, but are carefully preserved in locked and sealed cases with glass fronts, each flag in its own case with a card giving the name of the engagements of the regiment. These silent tattered flags have evoked the best stanza anent our flag:

Nothing but flags—but simple flags,
Tattered and torn and hanging in rags;
Some walk by them with careless tread,
Nor think of the hosts of patriot dead
That have marched beneath them in days gone by
With a burning cheek and a kindling eye,
And have bathed their folds with their life's young tide.
And, dying, blessed them, and, blessing, died.

Deeds of great valor and devotion in great number have been performed by America's sons for this imperishable flag, of which one is typical and instructive beyond anything else recorded.

In 1863 the Sixteenth Regiment of Connecticut Volunteers—the same kind that aroused the scorn of the butchers of Berlin—after three days' hard fighting, was forced to surrender. Before the enemy swarmed over the breastworks the colonel of the regiment shouted to his men to save the colors—the flag must not fall into the hands of the enemy. In an instant the battle flags were stripped from their poles and cut and torn into small fragments. Each piece was carefully hidden. Some five hundred of the regiment were sent to Libbey, where most of them remained amidst the agonizing and maddening horrors of prison life until the close of the war. Each piece of the colors was sacredly preserved. When a soldier died, his piece was intrusted to a comrade. At the end of the war the weary prisoners returned to their homes, each bringing his bit of star or stripe with him. All these worn fragments were patched together, and the regimental colors, nearly complete, are now preserved in the state house at Hartford.

My fellow Americans, even as we stand here, yonder flag speaks to us in accents more divine, in tones more glorious than even the swelling diapasons of a grand organ or the deep ecstacies of the four magic strings; it speaks in the words of an unknown flag worshiper, who withheld his name in order not to detract from the glory of his celestial theme: "I had my birth in Philadelphia; my stripes of red and white and field of blue and thirteen stars were first kissed by Pennsylvania sunlight. I was the first to reach the top of your tower on Independence Hall; I was first to point out from whence came the music of your Liberty Bell; I led the vanguard of the Continental Army from Valley Forge to Yorktown; I festooned the capitols of every State, until, instead of thirteen, I displayed eight and forty stars; I first blushed in protest against slavery in my native Keystone State; the lilies of France once floating over Fort Duquesne were lowered to the lion of St. George floating over Fort Pitt, but both gave way to me when the wind from the free Alleghenies unfurled my colors above the waters of the Ohio at the town of Pittsburgh; I led your conquering armies from Vera Cruz to the City of Mexico; I was trailed in the dust, but rose again to feel the loyal grasp of Lincoln and Grant, and to give inspiration to the millions of men and women who loved the country and the cause for which I stood; and to-day I float in peace and in glory over every capitol in this broad land, and I stand for liberty, for the noblest ambitions of humanity, and for peace through all the world and for the dignity and honor and protection of all who love liberty and equality, and who claim the sheltering protection which I have always given."

This, my friends, in the true spirit, is the true significance, the new significance, of the Stars and Stripes. And in passing let us offer words of thanksgiving and of joy that we have the opportunity of repaying a debt of honor and of gratitude, if not of love and devotion, to a country who stood by us from Monmouth to Yorktown, and made our desperate, if not losing, fight for liberty against the Hessians of those years an absolute certainty, for without her men, without her guns, without her rifles, without her ammunition so liberally given, without her fleet, we would never have been free. Noble France, glorious France, although 'midst cataclysm and holocaust and almost on the brink of the shadow of the valley of death, she has never stooped to demand repayment of that great debt. To the everlasting glory of the statesmen and leaders, who now steer the ship of state, be it said that even on this very day the sons of America are beginning to repay this long overdue obligation as they march down the streets of Paris on this most glorious of Fourth of Julys. Thank God, America is not selfish, America is not oblivious to her obligations. Our debt is to be fully paid, paid with interest, paid with love, paid with gratitude, paid with unheard of devotion and heroism. "You helped to make us free, we will stand by you and help drive the oppressor from your borders and rebuild your devastated land. Yea, we are here, la belle France, to pay the debt which we owe to you by reason of your Lafayette, to pay the debt we owe to you by reason of your De Grasse, of your Rochambeau. We are here to bear and shoulder the white man's burden against the Hun, and enforce the eternal principles enunciated in the message of our great President, and with the help of the Lord of Hosts we will make the world safe for democracy. We will bring that idea home to the little camarilla in Potsdam who have hitherto paid attention to Krupp guns only." Will we succeed? Of course we will!

What God in His infinite wisdom designed,
And armed with weapons of thunder,
Not all the earth's despots or factions combined
Have the power to conquer or sunder.

On April 2 we issued a credit of $7,000,000,000 to support the war, an astounding figure by way of the first step. On June 5 we witnessed the sublimest of spectacles, when 10,000,000 young Americans—a stupendous army of volunteers—walked to the recruiting stations saying "Boutez en avant" (Beat the advance). We are now celebrating the safe transport—a miraculous deliverance—of our first Army division through the war zones, and we are demonstrating that the spirit of Farragut is still alive among us; that our sailors and soldiers not only damned the torpedoes but they scoffed and defied these sharks and basilisks of the sea. Not a man lost; not a man wounded; so may it ever be, until even the ghastly swindlers of Berlin, of Stambul, and of Vienna shall have learned the rudiments of right living and of right thinking. They should now have no doubts whatever about our determination, for even the children in their cradles have risen against them and lisp for just retribution upon their guilty heads. And now there remains but the invocation—oh, glorious flag of the free, the invocation of the High Priest—which, in the presence of this multitude of Americans I will pronounce over thee even as thou art unfurled to the breeze, "May the Lord of Hosts bless thee and keep thee; may the Lord make his face to shine upon thee and be gracious unto thee; may He incline His countenance unto thee and give thee peace." Peace achieved through the valor of our sons, our brothers, and our sires; may our country soon conquer peace that shall open to us a new and enduring era of freedom and justice in which all the world may participate, a peace which will follow the love, respect, and gratitude of all mankind—a peace which will follow the honorable enforcement of treaties between nation and nation; a peace which will follow the regard for the rights of the weak as well as the strong; a peace which will follow the respect for small nations, such as Judea, Belgium, and Holland—a peace which will secure their inalienable right to live their own lives as they deem best; a peace which will follow the destruction of the last fortress of autocracy and of tyranny; a peace which will usher in an era when man will be a brother to man, and when every man will love his neighbor as himself, when for the last time and for all time to come "they shall beat their swords into plowshares, and their spears into pruning knives; nation shall not lift up sword against nation, and they shall not learn any more war."

"Lord of the universe, shield us and guide us
Trusting us always through shadow and sun.
Thou has united us, who shall divide us?
Keep us, oh, keep us the many in one."

The Revenue Bill.

OF

HON. THOMAS GALLAGHER,

OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, August 4, 1917.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Mr. Speaker, for the purpose of bringing to the attention of Members of Congress the views of one of the leading manufacturers of Chicago on the revenue bill, I am taking the liberty to publish a letter from Mr. D. E. Felt, president of a large manufacturing establishment in my district doing business throughout the world.

He calls attention to some very dangerous provisions or amendments to House bill 4280, now before the Senate, that he believes will impose a hardship on thousands of industrial concerns now doing business.

The matter referred to is as follows:

FELT & TARRANT MANUFACTURING CO.,
Chicago, U. S. A., July 31, 1917.

Hon. THOMAS GALLAGHER,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The Federal House revenue bill (H. R. 4280) has been practically rewritten by the Finance Committee of the Senate, who have introduced into it two exceedingly dangerous provisions, which, if enacted into law, will make it impossible for thousands of industrial concerns to borrow the large amount of money necessary to pay their taxes next April, which I understand is the month that will be fixed for payment of these taxes. In this period of rapid expansion many concerns which have invested all of their available capital and borrowed all they can will not have arrived at the point where their investment in buildings, equipment, material, and labor will have been in any considerable part turned back into cash by the time this tremendous tax levy will fall due. Their profits will then be largely book profits, but they will be taxed on those book profits just the same as though they had already cashed in on them, and the United States Treasury will be satisfied only with the cash. A percentage of these book profits, as the Treasury will figure them, will never be turned into cash, and when the war stops a tremendous loss would be experienced on investments in buildings, equipment, and raw materials.

These remarks do not apply simply to the concerns engaged in the manufacture of munitions and war supplies, but they apply to nearly all manufacturing concerns and to many commercial corporations. It seems that the revenue legislation is being predicated on the stories that we hear of the few concerns who are seemingly just now making immense profits on account of the war, without any consideration being given to the risk involved or the necessity of giving business and industry a chance to adjust themselves to the revolutionary conditions brought on by the entrance of our country into the war, in which are engaged on the other side under German leadership countries having a population and resources of 256,000,000 of people, at a time when we must not only finance our own military operations but contribute billions of money to our allies who have carried the load up to this point under tremendous effort and expense. Our Secretary of the Treasury stated a few weeks ago that it would be good financial policy to raise from taxation at the start one-half of all our expenditures. Now, since we have taken stock and found that our prospective expenditures and loans to our allies for this year will be very much more than originally anticipated—somewhere between twelve and fourteen billions of dollars—I believe that the idea of raising so much as half by taxation has been abandoned; but necessarily the taxation will have to be very heavy, and it should be so devised as to be neither destructive nor unjust.

At present it looks as though the tax will bear most heavily upon the industries, particularly the moderate-sized, rapidly growing industries. I know of one rapidly growing concern with an investment of about $2,500,000, which has not raised the price of its products a cent, in spite of 100 per cent increase in the cost of material and 50 per cent increase in cost of labor, and has not made any munitions or war supplies whatever, whose prospective tax has been computed, on the basis of the bill as amended by the Senate, by a chartered accountant to amount to 27.64 per cent of all the profits, which is about all it can spare and provide for necessary expansions and a reserve to take care of the losses on material and work in process when the reaction comes, without paying any dividends at all. Under the steeply graduated provisions of the so-called excess-profits tax, as amended by the Senate, they are called upon to pay 40 per cent on two-thirds of undistributed profits which they use during 1917 for expansion of the business, which 15 per cent is computed on the present high cost of machinery, material, and buildings. This is because they are a rapidly growing concern, which has always kept its books in a conservative manner, so that it has no "water" or inflated values in its accounts.

I know another corporation with over $100,000,000 capital, which has raised the price of its products and has engaged largely in the manufacture of munitions and war supplies, which will not have to pay as much as 25 per cent on any considerable part of its profits, and probably the per cent it will pay on the total profits will not be over half that. Yet it is the big fellow that they think they are after. Some of the big fellows will pay a tax in proportion to the little ones, but probably not over a dozen altogether, while there will be tens of thousands of the little fellows who will receive a staggering blow. And the worst of it is, the little fellows do not know what is being done to them, and when the blow is delivered it will be a surprise for which they are unprepared.

As the bill now stands, the taxpayer has the option of choosing between something similar to the English system of computing the so-called excess-profits tax, which is based on a comparison between 1917 and the profits for 1911, 1912, and 1913, or paying an excess-profits tax on profits in excess of 6 per cent on invested capital. In industry 6 per cent on book profits is not enough. The Magazine of Wall Street of July 21 gives a list of the earnings for the past year of the principal industrial corporations dealt in on the stock exchanges in comparison to the prices at which their stocks sell. Six are earning over 50 per cent of the price of the stock, 19 over 30 per cent, and 42 over 20 per cent. This is because of the risk involved and the knowledge of the investors that these earnings may turn out to be only book profits. Yet the United States Treasury has indicated that 10 per cent profit is the most they will allow in computing the capital-stock tax of industrial corporations, and the Senate indicates that 6 per cent is enough. Perhaps 6 per cent is the best figure to use for the purpose of the excess-profits tax, because a higher per cent will eliminate nearly all public-service corporations and a large number of other rich corporations and individuals engaged in businesses where little or no risk is involved. Either method of computing the excess-profits tax hits the industries so they would have to pay a tax all out of proportion to others whose property and liberty are to be protected.

The prosperity of the industries is vitally necessary for the successful prosecution of the war, and they should not be unduly discriminated against at this time. When the revenue bill left the House, it contemplated raising by the excess-profits tax feature about $200,000,000. In the Senate, when any particular interest complained about some features of the bill which hit it, the Senate immediately modified or cut out those offending features entirely and dumped the load onto the excess-profits tax, so that when it came out of the Senate it was calculated to raise $530,000,000 by the excess-profits tax. The investment bankers had been there to look after the interests of their clients; also the piano manufacturers, the auto manufacturers, the patent medicine men, and so on, all down the line. We are not going to suffer with a shortage of pianos or automobiles or patent medicines, but it will be a serious matter to cripple those on whom the Government must depend for its supplies.

It is not going to be so easy for expanding concerns who have already used all their legitimate borrowing power to suddenly raise hundreds of thousands of dollars to pay their taxes on book profits. Bankers know the difference between book profits and realized profits, even if Congress does not. Money is not going to be any too plentiful anyhow. The Government itself and the public in general have already suffered because of lack of railroad facilities due to the restrictions put on the railroads, which in recent years have prevented them from realizing sufficient revenue to provide the equipment so much needed just now to move the coal and all other commodities. I am afraid if this revenue bill becomes a law in its present form, the industries which supply the Government will be crippled. The 15 per cent tax on undivided profits should be cut out entirely, and I believe it will be. Its effect would be to discourage the growth of industries and encourage paying out everything in dividends and stimulate extravagant private expenditures at a time when private economy should prevail. Profits should be used to provide abundant opportunities for employment and abundant commodities, which mean low prices. If a concern uses 20 per cent of its book profits to enlarge its business—a healthy concern would use 50 per cent—this bill taxes it 15 per cent on the reserve laid aside to pay the tax, which in many cases will be over 20 per cent of the book profits. So that if the concern distributed 80 per cent in dividends, it would have to borrow all the money or take it from the capital account to pay the tax. It would be absurd to tax a concern 15 per cent on the money it does not pay out in dividends because it must keep it to pay the tax to the Government.

Perhaps in the light of more careful consideration, Congress will decide to remove some of the burden from the so-called excess-profits tax, which in most cases is not on an excess profit at all, merely a tax on the assumption of large business risk. I believe the bill will be changed to raise in the aggregate very much more than it provides for in its present form, but nothing more should be added under the term "excess profits," and surely the steeply graduated scale for computing the excess profits should be greatly reduced. The way the bill is now amended, in the case of a live, growing concern the Government takes by its half-dozen different kinds of taxes (of which the excess-profits tax is the heaviest, in the case of a successful industrial concern) several hundred dollars out of every thousand before the profits are distributed. Then when the remainder is distributed, if at all, they take from the stockholder who has risked his money in the business another big chunk by another graduated tax called the surtax. If the profits are left in the business where they best serve the general welfare, the Government levies an additional tax on it. I realize that no revenue bill can be perfect. Any bill that can be devised will work injustice and hardship to some, but a revenue bill should not be faulty in its major provisions from the standpoint of sound Government finance and the general welfare of the public.

The Government will need taxes next year and the year after that, so it is not wise to scare off or discourage those who contribute most largely to its revenue. In 1916 England raised by taxation only 22½ per cent of her expenditures. From the beginning of the war Germany has raised by taxation a much smaller percentage of her expenditures. They are pretty good financiers over there, and it will stand us in hand to do a little careful figuring. The argument raised in favor of raising by taxation half of all our expenditures seems to be based on our experience in Government finance 10 years after the close of the Civil War, but we are just starting into this war and the situation is not at all parallel with the time when we were getting back on a gold basis. This is not a good time to make experiments based on radical socialistic theories. We are facing a tremendous task and we need patriotism all along the line, from the top to the bottom. We can stand any taxation, if wisely distributed. This generation and this country can pay a large portion of the expenses of the war, but future generations will also have to pay a large part of it—and they should. This generation of Americans could not prevent this war, and the theory that anybody brought it on for profit is absolutely absurd. The effect of unwise legislation will injure the future generation as much as it does this one.

Unjust and unwise tax laws at this time will injure every man, from the top to the bottom of our social fabric, not only in this generation but coming generations. The normally prosperous and capable can take care of themselves any time, because they can always earn enough or have enough to take care of their needs, but when industry is struck down the less capable and thrifty suffer even for necessities, so why make the war an excuse to put into practice the ideas of the superficial social theorists and demagogues? If Jones can cure a thousand hams so they are worth 10 cents a pound more than the same hams if cured by Smith, or if Jones can make 500 steam engines and find a market for them at 25 per cent less cost than Smith can, some would penalize Jones because he makes an "excess profit," but that is not good sense nor good policy and is against public welfare. Some people imagine that a man can not make large profits without robbing some one else, and the reason for their belief is that they are not capable of doing it. The man who tries to make profits at the expense of other seldom if ever succeeds. As a rule, to make a large profit the man has got to benefit the public several dollars for every dollar he makes himself.

The term "swollen fortunes" is often employed as a term of condemnation. As a matter of fact, in nearly all cases "swollen fortunes" consists of that which has been conserved and which is used to supply capital for industry and commerce. To pass laws designed to arbitrarily distribute such capital is not only unjust but it works a great injury to society as a whole. This money is usually in the hands of those who made it and who are capable of conserving it and using it to the best interests of all the people. Breaking up large fortunes means the dissipation of society's capital and taking it from hands in which it constantly increases through investment of the income derived therefrom in industry and commerce where it supplies work for the less prudent and less capable, to say nothing of the large sums which go to charity.

When a millionaire receives interest on bonds or profits on his capital and personal services he does not proceed to use any considerable portion of it for his personal subsistence or pleasures. Many devote to charity and the advancement of public welfare several times what they themselves consume. The balance of it is immediately reinvested where it serves society. What he puts in bonds for a schoolhouse in Iowa, a depot in Kansas City, a tunnel under the Hudson River, development of a public park, etc., immediately is distributed to pay for labor and material (which latter is also the product of labor), and the resultant improvements are permanent benefits to society. What he puts into factories, mines, or industries of any kind not only furnishes immediate employment in the process of their establishments or enlargement of such plants or equipment, but the plants and equipment go on providing opportunities for employment and making abundant commodities for the use of society.

Capital and ability receive only a small proportion compared to what labor receives of the combined products of the two. The major portion of what capital and ability receive is reinvested where it serves and benefits in a thousand ways all the people. Nearly all of it is paid out for labor. Some so expended is lost in the hazards connected with all enterprise, but most of it is saved to supply society's capital. What is put into savings banks and reinvested looks big when viewed in the aggregate, but it is trivial compared to the amount of wages paid annually, or to what the workers could save if not wasteful and thriftless. Too large a part of what labor does save is lost in bad investments. Too large a part is spent for liquor and in other harmful ways. It is often said that if all wealth were divided equally among all of the people it would soon be again unequally distributed and back into the same hands as before. That is not so. Most of it would be utterly wasted. Some of it would get back into the hands of people who can conserve it and use it for society's benefit, but most of it would be entirely dissipated. That would be a calamity for society. Interests and commodities would be very high and opportunities for employment limited. Those who now are less prosperous would be still less prosperous. The capable and thrifty would still be able to take care of themselves and would suffer the least of any.

Very respectfully,

D. E. FELT.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. COURTNEY W. HAMLIN,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, July 26, 1917.

Mr. HAMLIN. Mr. Speaker, I asked and secured permission to extend my remarks in the RECORD for the purpose of inserting some facts which I feel are of special interest at this present time. Some Members here perhaps are familiar with them, but there are others, no doubt, who have not had the opportunity to look these matters up, and I feel sure it will be interesting to everyone. The table to which I refer shows the wealth, annual income, indebtedness, and population of the seven principal nations now at war. This war has already lasted longer than a large percentage of the people thought it could last. The expenditure of money as well as the loss of life up to this date is staggering. But it ought to be some consolation to those of us who have the proud distinction of being American citizens to know that the United States has almost as much wealth as the other nations combined, and while the expenditures which we are compelled to make this year are so great that it is beyond the comprehension of the mind of man, yet it is only a drop in the bucket when we compare it to the total wealth of this country.

These interesting figures were furnished me by Mr. Walter A. Coon, of Springfield, Mo., one of our live, wide-awake bankers and business men. He also conveys to me the gratifying information that the bank with which he is connected—the Union National—had sent out requests for crop reports throughout southern Missouri and northern Arkansas, and that the replies received were uniform to the effect that the prospect for a bumper crop never was better. I am inclined to think that if we can pass the Lever food-control bill in the near future, so as to properly handle the foodstuff of this country, we will have quite sufficient not only to supply our own country and Army but to take care of our allies as well. I see one embarrassing situation due to a delay in passing the food bill. I am informed by letter from farmers in my district that wheat buyers are declining to take their wheat, under the pretense that they are afraid the Government is going to fix the price. Whether this is the real reason that they do not buy the wheat or is only a pretense, I do not know, but I am thoroughly convinced that not one moment of time should be lost in crystallizing that bill into law so that the people in the country may know exactly what the situation is. I think the country ought to know that the delay in passing this bill can not be laid at the door of the House of Representatives. And I am also certain that the House conferees will do everything that they can in order to reach as early an agreement on the bill as possible.

Control of Food and Fuel.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. M. C. SMITH,
OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, I am in full harmony and accord with this bill. The control of our food and fuel is necessary under the crisis through which our country is now passing and while we are at war. It is as necessary that our Army be fed and supplied with food as it is that they be supplied with guns and ammunition. It is well that we give early and proper consideration to supplying our boys who are fighting the battles of their country in distant lands. A soldier can not fight without guns and ammunition. Neither can he fight without food. The purpose of this bill is to encourage the production, conserve the supply, and control the distribution of food and fuel. I find this in the title. I think the title should also include to provide a penalty for hoarding and gambling in food and fuel for purely speculative purposes. If there ever was a time when it ought to be a crime to gamble in food products and fuel and the necessaries of life that time is now, when it is almost a physical impossibility to obtain coal for fuel and when the very life of our Nation may depend upon our food supply.

It is inconceivable that anyone, from purely mercenary motives, would be so unpatriotic as to curtail the supply for the purpose of increasing the price, and yet we read every day of manipulations and speculations in food and fuel. To-day we hear of one young man holding carloads of feed on a siding in a country town in Virginia for speculative purposes. We see hundreds of carloads of coal on the sidetracks of many of our cities while the sheds of the retailers of the country are empty and the consumer is facing winter without even a prospect of obtaining a supply of coal to warm his home.

The guaranty of $2 a bushel for wheat is intended to stimulate production and induce farmers to plant a larger acreage. With wheat selling to-day in the market at $2.40 per bushel and a great shortage in Europe, it must readily be seen that the Government takes no chances in guaranteeing the farmer $2 per bushel for his wheat.

I herewith incorporate as a part of my remarks the provisions of the law guaranteeing the price of $2 a bushel as contained in the bill:

SEC. 12. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat, produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to require the Board of Food Administration to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. Said board shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act, approved August 11, 1916. It shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as it shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment, and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon, the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States, that, upon compliances by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the Board of Food Administration, subject to the approval of the President, shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat from the passage of this act to the 1st day of July, 1919, shall be based upon No. 1 northern or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President or said board under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any wheat for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store it, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of wheat under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

Here we have the guaranteed price only for the crop of 1918. I believe it will have the effect of increasing the production especially in the great wheat-producing sections of the Northwest, where the crop is planted by a single operation of ploughing, dragging, and seeding at one time; and of cutting, thrashing, and bagging at another. I do not think the guaranteeing of $2 a bushel will be a strong inducement to the farmers of Michigan to raise an abnormal crop. If the law had provided first aid to the farmer in putting in his crops, caring for them, and harvesting them, then I believe it would have been of a more practical benefit to the farmer than the guaranty of $2 a bushel for wheat that sold as high as $3.25 a bushel within the last six months.

If we are to render practical aid to the farmer, let us help him to plant and harvest his crop. The fixing of a minimum price will readily result in that also being the maximum price. It has been proposed that all the allied powers of Europe and the United States agree upon a single purchasing agent to buy wheat and supplies. This will result in destroying competition, and the price will be determined by such purchasing agent, since we always have a surplus of wheat for exportation.

If the price of wheat is fixed arbitrarily, why not the price of barley, rye, oats, corn, and other nonperishable grain? If the price of grain is guaranteed, why not the price of all commodities? Also, the price of labor, which is the foundation of production? Then if the wholesale prices are fixed by law, why not the retail prices? Here we would have a discrimination and an indefinite field in which to work.

But we are at war and we must win. We must produce and conserve our food supply. That must be seen at a glance. The war has already cost us billions of dollars in money, and we are all for victory at any price. It will be worth the cost. The President is the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, and let us stand by him and win. Taking up arms in open revolt against our Government will result in some hangings sooner or later, and then we will be united and in harmony for the prosecution of the war. If it is not aid and comfort to the enemy to buy ammunition and take up arms to resist the draft and defy the law, then what is treason?

Aiding in the planting and harvesting of crops would be of more direct benefit to the farmer than the guaranteeing of the prices. It will not materially benefit the farmer to guarantee him a price for his crop if he can not raise it. Last year there were 40,000,000 acres of land planted to wheat in the United States. It is estimated that 35 per cent of this crop, or 14,000,000 acres, was destroyed by cold and unseasonable weather. The uncertainty of weather and ravages of insects are discouraging features in farming.

We are now fighting the greatest war of the ages. I think a mistake is made by some in thinking that it is the war of England or the war of France, Italy, or Russia, and not our war. In this they are wrong. Whatever the motive, or whatever the incentive, cause, or purpose of the war, and whether or not we were justified in declaring war, are now questions aside the issue. I, for one, firmly believe that we were not only warranted in declaring war, but that Germany forced this war upon us. I believe that we are now fighting for our liberty and our rights as firmly as we did in the War of the Revolution, when we gained our independence; as we did in the War of 1812, when we fought because England impressed American citizens into its service, and undertook to destroy our shipping and deprive us of our rights on the high seas; as we did in the Mexican War, which was brought about because an American citizen was shot on the American side of the Rio Grande. We certainly were as much warranted in declaring war against Germany as we were in declaring war against Spain in 1898 for sinking the United States battleship Maine, when 250 of our American soldiers and seamen were sent to the bottom of Habana Harbor.

After the farmer has raised his crop of wheat there will be purchasing agents throughout the country ready to take the wheat off his hands at $2 per bushel, providing other purchasers do not pay more for it. The farmer is not under any obligation to sell his wheat to the Government for $2 if he can get a higher price for it. Of equal importance to the guaranty of $2 per bushel is the storage and distribution of wheat.

The law is also aimed at hoarding and food gambling, and I herewith quote the provision of the bill, as follows:

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowingly to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person, (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) willfully to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries. Any person who violates any of the provisions of this section shall be deemed guilty of a misdemeanor, and, upon conviction thereof, shall be fined in a sum not exceeding $10,000, or by imprisonment not exceeding two years, or both.

The country is in no mood for manipulation of prices of food and fuel by gamblers, and now that the President has authority to act in the premises, and the machinery has been provided, this feature of Government control will be watched with great interest.

Section 22 of the bill provides:

SEC. 22. That it is necessary and proper, in order to execute the powers of Congress to raise and support armies, provide and maintain the Navy, and properly and efficiently provide for the common defense, that the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of sale, transportation, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among merchants and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission, during the war and for a period of one year thereafter, or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

No one is in favor of gambling in the necessities of life, and the bumper crop this year entitles the people to reasonable prices, and under the stress of war no other kind of prices ought to prevail.

The Congress has not sufficiently considered the question of fuel supply. Coal has been the one commodity of extreme speculation, which resulted in many districts throughout the northern section of our country shivering last winter. Where fuel is stored on the siding in any town an unreasonable length of time, it would not be a base violation of law if the people of the community would confiscate the coal for their own use and respond in damages to the owner. This course might be pursued with impunity sooner than to shiver with the cold where the supply of fuel is at hand. After this winter we shall see the breaking up of high prices of coal, not only under this bill, but the public will demand it. There is a superabundance of coal in nearly every State in the Union, and if the abuses continue the Government will take control of the mines and operate them and see to the distribution of this important commodity and necessity of the people. The Governments of England, France, Germany, and Russia now operate the coal mines.

I am not in thorough harmony with the doctrine of Government ownership. But the Government controls the Post Office and means of communication. It controls to a certain extent the operation of our railroads. The operation of our mines and the distribution of coal will be a matter for consideration in the near future if the operation of this bill does not destroy speculation in coal and furnish a necessary supply for the public.

The war has brought about many great changes. We have reenacted much of our former legislation. We must adjust all our business to the purpose in hand of winning the war in the shortest possible period, and, like our forefathers, rededicate ourselves, our fortunes, and our sacred honor anew for our independence and liberty.

The Revenue Bill.

SPEECH

HON. LINCOLN DIXON,

OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, May 11, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. DIXON. Mr. Chairman, this bill now under consideration, to provide revenue to defray war expenses, is the largest tax measure ever presented to any Congress. It is strictly a war measure, to raise by taxation a portion of the money necessary for the use of the Government in the vigorous prosecution of the war. Whatever differences of opinion may have existed among our people prior to the war, happily we are united for its successful prosecution. We are not responsible for war; it was not of our choosing, but was forced upon us by Germany, and we have authorized and directed the President to employ the entire naval and military forces of the United States and the resources of the Government to carry on that war, and we have pledged all the resources of the country to bring the conflict to a successful termination. We have authorized the issuance of bonds to the amount of $5,000,000,000 and certificates of indebtedness of $2,000,000,000. Of the amount realized from the sale of bonds, $3,000,000,000 is to be loaned to the countries now engaged in war against Germany, in order that they may have the means to prosecute the war against Germany in a more efficient and effective manner.

There was neither delay nor hesitation in the prompt passage of that measure. There was not a single vote against it. That extension of credit to the allies was at the time the most effective blow against Germany that our country could then inflict. Their necessities were great, they needed money and supplies, and we furnished the one and the means of securing the other. The question as to the soldiers for this war has been settled, and every man needed will be furnished, and the manner of their selection, recommended by those having special knowledge of this subject, has been agreed to by this House. The men to serve as soldiers will be conscripted, the money with which to furnish them with the needed and necessary supplies will be conscripted by this bill. The soldiers who carry our banners to triumph and victory through dangers, hardships, privations, and sufferings will offer on the altar of their country their lives as a sacrifice. How small in comparison the sacrifice to be made by those whose wealth and money alone will be taken by this bill. The sacrifice by the soldiers can not be calculated and can never be measured by a money standard. Money is the cheapest and smallest part of the cost of war, immense as the expenditures must be; the real cost is the lives and sufferings of the men.

Protests innumerable, and it seemed almost continuously, have been made by the interests affected by this bill, a plea that the sacrifice of profits be made by others better able to stand them. I would not voluntarily destroy any legitimate American industry or unnecessarily curtail its business or profits, but in time of war men must be satisfied and content with less personal gain for the general good and to properly support the Government.

The war expenditures for the remainder of this year and for the next year are estimated to be about $3,800,000,000. A bond issue of $2,000,000,000 has already been authorized to provide that amount of money to finance the war, and we have been asked to furnish the balance by taxation, and this bill is presented in response to that request. It is proper and fair that the people pay an equitable portion of the war expenses by taxation and the balance from the proceeds of bonds. This is better for the people and also for the Government. The sum raised by this bill, if provided for by bonds at 3½ per cent, would be an additional charge of $63,000,000 in interest each year. No definite and fixed rule can be established as to what proportion of the money to carry on the war should be raised by taxation; too many questions will be suggested that naturally affect it. Every bond issue to the extent of the interest thereon increases the necessary cost of government the following year. The $3,000,000,000 bond issue for the allies and the $2,000,000,000 bond issue for our own use will carry an annual interest charge of $175,000,000. England's war interest is now over $700,000,000 annually, while Germany's interest account is as great. The total amount borrowed by the European countries now in this war is about $60,000,000,000, and the interest is not less than $3,000,000,000 annually.

This bill furnishes the full amount requested. The amount is large, indeed appalling, in fact more than three-fourths of the total indebtedness of this Nation at the close of the Civil War, and that, too, to be raised in a single year. But the wealth of the country is enormous, estimated to be at least $250,000,000,000, and the patriotism of our people equally great, and this gives ample assurance of a loyal response to this demand for contributions to the country's Treasury.

The taxes levied by this bill are large, the aggregate amount enormous; the demands upon the industries and wealth are heavy, but necessity demands it; the vigorous prosecution of the war compels it, and we believe the patriotism and judgment of our people will approve it. It may be a heavy burden on some people and on some industries. We sought to make it equitable and fair, even if burdensome and large. We believe these taxes can be paid without injury to any American industry, American business, or American labor. The burdens were made as light as necessity would permit. No member of this committee is pleased with every item in the bill; it is not what any single member would prefer and it does not express the individual judgment of a single member. Personally I was very much opposed to certain provisions and especially the 10 per cent custom duties, but each member has merged his individual judgment into the judgment of a majority of the committee and as a completed measure has accepted it as an expression of the composite opinion of the membership. I shall vote for the bill. The Treasury needs the money, the Army needs the equipment and supplies, and duty in this hour of stress and war demand the prompt furnishing of these necessities. It is a time for active and prompt action and is the best evidence of our determination to supply every dollar needed in this war. We can not hesitate or delay, but must do all we can to bring this war to a successful end. Our part, at this time, is to see that the Government's needs are promptly supplied. I shall vote for every dollar needed in this war.

This bill levies taxes upon all our people. Either directy or indirectly every man must respond.

The first subject mentioned in this bill will be accepted by all as a just and proper object of taxation—that of incomes. The income tax provided for in this bill is in addition to the taxes levied by the present law. This tax is surely a measure of justice. It taxes every individual fortunate enough to have an income embraced within its provisions. It taxes every individual in proportion to his ability to pay—in proportion to his income. It may be said the rates are excessive upon large incomes. In time of war when the Government must have money the rates are not unreasonable. England collects nearly a billion dollars from an income tax, and her total taxes are $60 per capita while ours after the passage of this bill will be but $33 per capita. Our present income-tax rates and the additional rates proposed in this bill are as follows:

The excess-profits tax is now 8 per cent upon the net income of each corporation or partnership after deducting $5,000 and an amount equivalent to 8 per cent of the actual capital invested. This bill proposes an additional tax equivalent to 8 per cent of the net income of corporations and partnerships determined in the above manner, and this tax will yield an additional $200,000,000. England has an excess-profits tax of 50 per cent, but her manner of arriving at the excess profit is entirely different from ours.

The excess-profits tax of England is based upon the amount by which the net income for the taxable year exceeds by more than £200 the average amount of net income for the prewar period. The net income for the prewar period is "the amount of the profit arising from the trade or business on the average of any two of the three last prewar trade years, to be selected by the taxpayer." England, I understand, has increased her excess-profits tax. Most of the countries now at war collect a portion of their revenues from this source. A deduction of $5,000 is not a large amount, nor does it represent a large per cent in the case of the larger corporations, but for corporations of $100,000 and less it is a very liberal deduction. In a corporation of $100,000 the exemption of $5,000 and 8 per cent guarantees a net profit of 13 per cent before the assessment of the excess-profits tax. The exemption of an amount equivalent to 8 per cent of the actual capital invested is surely fair and just. Reasonable profit during the war should be acceptable to our people; in fact, they should be content with it and willing to assist the Government in this time of war by contributing to its Treasury even more than the amount required by this bill. Our business men are contributing to the expenses of our war a very much smaller proportion of their incomes and their profit than are the citizens of any of the other countries engaged in this war. It is estimated that the additional tax provided in this bill will yield during the period of a year $200,000,000.

The tax on distilled spirits has been doubled; an additional tax of $1.10 per gallon is provided in this bill, making a total tax of $2.20 per gallon. The tax on wines has been doubled, except as to wines containing less than 14 per cent alcohol, upon which an additional tax of 2 cents is proposed, making a total tax of 6 cents per gallon. A new tax is also provided for, a 15 cents per gallon tax on rectified spirits. The additional tax upon these distilled spirits and fermented liquors and wines amounts to $151,000,000. An estimate transmitted on May 7 from Secretary McAdoo of the receipts during the fiscal year 1917 from distilled spirits, including wines and special taxes, was $183,000,000, and for fermented liquors, including special taxes, $94,500,000; total from these sources, $277,500,000. Based upon this estimate for this year and the estimate under this bill the total revenue from these sources would be $428,500,000.

On cigars, tobacco, and manufactures thereof the increased revenue under this bill will amount to $68,200,000. The estimated revenue this year from these sources, including special taxes, is estimated at $100,000,000, making in all from these sources $168,200,000.

We have levied taxes upon the soft drinks, small in amount, yet in the aggregate amounting to a revenue of $20,000,000.

We have provided for a tax equivalent to 3 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation by rail or water of property consigned by freight and an amount equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount paid for the transportation of property by express companies.

We have also levied a tax equivalent to 10 per cent of the amount paid for passenger transportation by rail or water, also a similar tax on tickets for parlor cars and sleeping cars; a tax on transportation of oil by pipe lines; a tax of 5 per cent of the amount paid for electric power for domestic use, a similar tax upon amount paid for light and heat and telephone service.

We have placed a tax of 5 cents on every telegraph message and telephone message when a charge of 15 cents is made.

There is also a tax on advertising, except in newspapers and periodicals, and the reenactment of the Spanish War tax on insurance. The taxes estimated for these different items are as follows:

Title III:
Distilled spirits	$100,000,000
Rectified spirits	7,500,000
Fermented liquors	37,500,000
Wines	6,000,000
Soft drinks, sirups, etc	20,000,000
Title IV:
Cigars	11,000,000
Cigarettes	25,000,000
Tobacco	30,000,000
Snuff	2,000,000
Cigarette papers and tubes	200,000
Title V:
Transportation—
Freight	77,500,000
Express	15,000,000
Passenger	75,000,000
Pipe lines	4,500,000
Seats and berths	750,000
Electric lights, gas, domestic power, and telephone service	30,000,000
Telegraph and telephone messages	7,000,000
Advertising	7,500,000
Insurance	5,000,000
Total	461,450,000

This bill also provides, under Title VI, for a war tax on manufacturers. This is a tax upon certain articles that are regarded in a great measure as luxuries, or at least articles that are considered by the large majority of the people as not included under the title of necessities. While proprietary medicines are not luxuries, and to a very large extent are purchased by people of limited means, yet it is believed that the small tax imposed can be divided by the manufacturer and dealer, with no increased cost to the consumer. These medicines have a fixed retail price that secures a very good profit to both. The proprietors did not complain so much as to the tax as to the great inconvenience of the use of stamps. The other taxes will be passed on to the consumer, who will know when he pays that this tax will be included in the price. Many, if not all, the manufacturers producing these articles have insisted that their business would be ruined. I have no intention to question their sincerity, but I do not believe that any purchaser of any article under this title will refuse to purchase by reason of this additional cost. I have no doubt that there will be a curtailment of purchases by reason of the war and the necessity of extra precaution in expenditures. This committee would not knowingly injure or cripple the business of any manufacturer, but all our people must be willing to contribute their share toward paying the enormous expenses of this war.

We have reenacted the stamp taxes imposed in the Spanish War tax of 1898 and also in the act of October 22, 1914, which were repealed September 8, 1916. Slight changes are made in a few of the rates, and a few new features are included in the bill. The Treasury Department estimates that we will realize about $33,000,000 from these taxes.

Under Title IX is included the war estate tax. The bill provides for additional taxes to those now imposed under existing law upon the transfer of the net estate of every deceased. Net estate under the present law is determined by deducting expenses of administration, debts, and lawful charges and an exemption of $50,000. Under this bill the estate will be entitled to an exemption of but $25,000. If this bill becomes a law, the estate tax will be as follows:

	Per cent.
Exceeding $25,000 and not exceeding $50,000	2
Exceeding $50,000 and not exceeding $150,000	4
Exceeding $150,000 and not exceeding $250,000	6
Exceeding $250,000 and not exceeding $450,000	8
Exceeding $450,000 and not exceeding $1,000,000	10

	Per cent.
Exceeding $1,000,000 and not exceeding $2,000,000	12
Exceeding $2,000,000 and not exceeding $3,000,000	14
Exceeding $3,000,000 and not exceeding $4,000,000	16
Exceeding $4,000,000 and not exceeding $5,000,000	18
Exceeding $5,000,000 and not exceeding $8,000,000	20
Exceeding $8,000,000 and not exceeding $11,000,000	22
Exceeding $11,000,000 and not exceeding $15,000,000	25
Exceeding $15,000,000	30

The next title provides for the levy of a customs duty of 10 per cent ad valorem upon all articles now free of duty imported into the United States from any foreign country. It further provides for the imposition of a duty of 10 per cent ad valorem in addition to any duty now imposed by law upon articles now dutiable when imported into the United States. This tax is conceded to be neither equitable nor scientific by those responsible for its insertion in this bill. I did not support it in committee and regret its presence in this bill, but as part of this bill agreed to by the whole committee I will not hesitate to support it.

We have also increased the postal rates of the first and second class mail. On first-class mail the postage was increased 50 per cent, requiring a 3-cent stamp where a 2-cent stamp is now used; drop letters will require a 2-cent stamp, and postal cards will require an additional 1-cent stamp. These increases on first-class mail matter will secure an estimated additional revenue of $70,000,000. The postal rates for second-class mail matter is based on the parcel-post zone system and will yield an additional $19,000,000 revenue. While the increase of the postage rates of first-class mail matter is very large, there has been but little complaint from the persons who will pay this $70,000,000 increase. The people who are asked to pay the additional $19,000,000 on second-class mail have been very insistent that a wrong is being done them, an injury is being inflicted, an unfair discrimination is being imposed upon them, and ruin and bankruptcy are to follow the enactment of these provisions into law. No one desires such results. The Government officials say that we lose $89,000,000 yearly in carrying and delivering second-class mail, and that publishers systematically use the express and freight when cheaper and load the mail when it is cheaper for them than by express. Of course, that is a business proposition, and reduction of expenses means increase of profits. When the magazines and periodicals are full of paid advertising and the business is one for profit, it is hard to realize their attitude when they are only required under this bill to reduce the Government's loss for carrying those magazines by less than one-fourth, and the Government still contribute from its Treasury, from the money raised by taxation, the sum of $70,000,000.

The committee has given this measure careful consideration and study. It furnishes the revenue asked by the Government. The money to be raised by its provisions is needed. We have pledged the resources of the country to bring the conflict to a successful termination, and we must furnish every dollar needed to accomplish that result. Our duty is to see that the country's needs and requirements are promptly supplied.

Dehydration.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MURRAY HULBERT,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

Mr. HULBERT. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to insert the following articles on the subject of dehydration:

[From the New York Sun, June 24, 1917.]

HOW TO SAVE TO-DAY'S PLENTY AGAINST TO-MORROW'S WANT—DEHYDRATING THE MODERN MAGIC OF ECONOMY THAT WILL HELP TO SOLVE THE FOOD SHORTAGE PROBLEM—WAY MUST BE FOUND TO CONSERVE OVERABUNDANCE OF PERISHABLES RAISED BY VOLUNTEER FARM ARMY.

Farmers the country over have planted millions of acres more than heretofore in order to do their war-time bit. Amateur husbandmen have rallied to the call of the Department of Agriculture, and to-day there are at least 2,000,000 town gardens and prospectively fruitful back yards under cultivation.

Seedsmen and nurserymen have had a bumper season of prosperity, and all of this activity is bound to swell enormously the productiveness of the soil. Indeed, it is probably not an exaggeration to say that the ground is going to yield many times its accustomed volume of foodstuffs.

Instead of the shortage so frequently prophesied, there is reason to believe that the markets will be glutted, and unless a movement is initiated to induce wholesale conservation there will follow inevitably a tremendous wastage. Much of this will be the result of the perishable nature of a great deal of the vegetables now growing. These are inherently short lived after gathering, and because of this characteristic must be disposed of or consumed quickly if they are to be utilized at all.

In normal times there is a big wastage in what are commonly called green stuffs. A very considerable percentage of this produce never leaves the farm. The two dominating reasons for this are transportation difficulties at a time when everybody wants to reach the market and the uncertainty as to the direction in which lies a profitable demand.

Then the commercial standards of the commission merchant and the retailer are such that the farmer knows that he can dispose of only his best, and his seconds do not net him a return unless there is a canning factory near by. Seconds do not necessarily mean defective or unwholesome products, and often these vegetables are simply fed to hogs and cattle. This minimizes the loss, to be sure, but it does not compensate the farmer for the outlay and labor incurred in raising them.

We have got to use substantially all that the soil yields if we are to make the most of the present agricultural activity, for, besides feeding ourselves, the Government has virtually promised our allies that we will make up the deficiencies of their own acres. There must be no wastage, and this can be achieved only if we preserve in some way the excess of our fields so that months hence these products will be available for consumption. This has been made quite clear by David Franklin Houston, Secretary of the United States Department of Agriculture. According to this authority:

"Some of the most conspicuous crop wastes occur with fruits and vegetables, of which in normal years larger quantities usually are grown than the producers can market profitably. Frequently these losses are due indirectly to disease and insect injury, which lower their market value without reducing their food value materially if they can be utilized promptly by drying, canning, and other preservative methods."

OBSTACLES TO CANNING.

It is a matter of common knowledge that nowhere else in the world is the canning of foodstuffs carried on upon a scale similar to that of the industry in the United States. But cans call first for plenty of tin plate, and our overworked steel plants and the war-time uses for tin have cut into the accustomed supply of this needed material.

Not long ago the Department of Agriculture announced that "of tin cans there are but 3,000,000,000 in sight in this country." This stock is far too short to meet the demands of the great commercial canneries. Of course every domestic wise person will promtly ask, Why not use glass containers?

Glass jars and the like would answer admirably for many preservative purposes. In normal times the housewife would be quite content with these and probably experience little trouble in getting all of the jars and glasses she desired, but to-day there is a shortage, and the containers of this sort now on the market have advanced more than 25 per cent in price. This at once adds heavily to the possible cost of fruits and vegetables so preserved, but there is still another factor that enters into the matter of expense and also the efficiency of this method of conservation.

It is indispensable, to insure keeping qualities, that the container shall be hermetically sealed, and to make certain of this rubber rings or gaskets are generally essential. The war-time uses of rubber have sent this material soaring, and wherever rubber can be dispensed with it is in the direction of economy to do so. How, then, with all of these handicaps, will it be possible to put up perishable foodstuffs so that any surplusage may be saved to protect us against a shortage during the months to come?

We have got to go back to first principles and bring up to date practices in vogue many centuries ago. In brief, drying processes of one sort or another are the means by which it will be practicable to save millions of dollars worth of foodstuffs and effectually to preserve them for future consumption. This means that most of the water contained in fruits and vegetables, the very element that adds so much to their succulence and juiciness, must be extracted in order to arrest those chemical actions and processes of decay which speedily transform the wholesome into the unpalatable and poisonous.

Mr. Houston has suggested that drying be resorted to for the preservation of soup stock of vegetables, such as carrots, potatoes, and celery, as well as the conservation of surplus sweet corn. In fact, this is only a limited list of the perishable farm products that can be conserved by desiccation.

WATER IN FRUITS AND VEGETABLES.

But in order that the layman may realize something of what this involves it might be well to show how large a part water plays in some staple fruits and vegetables. Let us tabulate these for easier reference.

	Water content, per cent.
Asparagus	94
Apple	85
Banana	74
Beat	87
Cucumber	96
Cabbage	91.5
Carrot	86.5
Grape	77
Lettuce	94.7
Onion	87.9
Potato	78.6
Spinach	92.3
Strawberry	86
Turnip	65

The housewife pays for all of this water at exactly the same rate per pound as she does for the food content. Furthermore, the nutritive value of dried fruits and vegetables increases directly as the percentage of water diminishes. Plainly we are dietary spendthrifts when we insist upon fresh produce, and it is evident that we can effect a very handsome saving if we will content ourselves in the cold seasons with dehydrated products.

To the average person the suggestion of dried foodstuffs instinctively carries the mind back to the dried apple of childhood, a brownish product that had a way of getting moldy and sour often before it could be made into sauce and flat-tasting pies. Deterioration was the consequence of imperfect desiccation. Science came along and worked a seeming miracle when it achieved the so-called evaporated apple and made it possible for the housekeeper to provide pies that came measurably closer to the flavor of the fresh fruit. Even so, the run of evaporated apples fall far short of their natural rivals, and most of us have resigned ourselves to the seemingly inevitable.

It will therefore surprise most people to learn that it is now possible to dry apples, other fruits, and vegetables of many kinds so that they may be preserved for future use and yet retain the full flavor and that freshness of taste peculiar to the newly gathered. Not only that, but the so-called fresh dried crop of orchard and field will keep better and far longer than the average dried commodities at present on the market.

The trouble with most dried foodstuffs is that they are anything but dried as the term is properly understood. For instance, dried apricots contain 41 per cent of water, the dried apples of commerce have 28.1 per cent of water, and dried dates and figs have respectively a water content of 13.8 and 18.8 per cent. These figures explain just why these commodities must be sold quickly and used promptly in order to avoid spoiling.

Mold is one of the things that must be guarded against continually in pantry and storeroom. Mold is only one of a variety of forms of micro-organisms that attack and injure foodstuffs. It has been established by investigators that minute bodies of this sort need at least 25 per cent of moisture in which to live and to multiply their destructive kind.

They thrive best when with this moisture they have a temperature ranging between 80° and 95° F. This makes it clear why the ice box looms so conspicuously in every well-regulated household, especially in warm weather. Low temperature neutralizes the fruitful ground that the moisture would otherwise offer for the breeding of these hurtful small, living things.

GERMAN DRYING FACTORIES.

None of this is news to the bacteriologist, and drying as a preserving process is nearly as old as the hills. Even so, it has been only within a comparatively short span of years that desiccation has been carried forward upon really scientific lines, and the present day accomplishments are the result of a vast deal of experimental research.

Successful drying is something more than the application of heat. If the increased temperature is not employed properly, one might as well say judiciously, dehydrating may be effected only superficially, and beneath a desiccated exterior there may remain a menacing amount of moisture which at certain temperatures will induce fermentation and the spoiling of the product.

Until very lately German drying factories have led the world, and their manner of keeping fruits and vegetables was supposed to be the very acme of the art; such was the reward of Teuton patience and persistent investigation. But the Germans by their very processes tacitly admitted that they had not completely solved the problem.

They attained dehydration at the expense of palatability. For instance, in the cases of desiccated vegetables they first parbolled them before they dried them. In this way the part-way cooking brought about certain chemical changes that served to arrest or to prevent subsequent fermentation. This parboiling necessarily extracted some of the flavor. So treated the farm produce was then put through the drying apparatus, and when withdrawn was packed in suitable containers and could be kept for months.

To prepare these desiccated products for the table it is necessary to cook them again, and this second boiling robs them of just so much more of their flavor. No wonder they are flat in taste and need a lot of seasoning. True, they are nourishing to a degree, but they can in nowise be likened to fresh vegetables.

Notwithstanding these drawbacks the Germans have found it economically well worth their while to establish dehydrating plants all over the Empire. Some idea of the magnitude of this business can be gathered from the fact that just before the outbreak of the war more than 500,000 tons of potatoes were desiccated in the fatherland, and at that time there were fully 425 factories of this kind in Germany.

In addition enormous quantities of other vegetables were similarly dried. Since August, 1914, hundreds of other plants have been organized so that temporary surplussage of products, especially in the large cities, might be conserved and held there for the well-nigh certain days of shortage.

The Germans have carried this method of preserving still further, because they have found it well worth their while to dry beet tops for fodder and to dehydrate vast stores of grain in order to insure safe keeping. The popular mind does not begin to realize how much moisture there is in every pound of flour, for the uninformed believe that wheat, for instance, is dry.

As a matter of fact this is anything but the case. For instance, in every five carloads of wheat there is one carload of water, and this undesirable dead weight is levying its toll of muscular effort and freight charges at every stage of its handling.

AMERICA'S CHANCE TO SAVE.

The Department of Agriculture has reported time and again that something should be done to reduce if not to eliminate waste at the source of production. That is to say, to try to find ways to utilize the foodstuffs that the farmer can not dispose of. Fruit that is shaken from the trees by the wind, commonly called windfalls, is not considered up to standard, and therefore seldom leaves the orchards.

An amazing percentage of apples, oranges, lemons, peaches, pears, etc., that fall to the ground in this way are permitted to rot. All of this wastage brings up the ultimate price to be paid by the consumer for the stuff that does reach him. Losses of this sort are not permitted in any other line of modern industry, and there is no reason why it should go on in this instance.

It is now proposed to eliminate a big share of this annual loss by establishing at suitable points throughout the entire country drying factories that shall be able to handle the great bulk of our perishable farm products. Naturally most of these should be placed in the centers of agricultural districts, where they may be conveniently reached either by rail or by such transportational facilities as motor trucks or horse-drawn vehicles.

Preferably it would probably be found more efficient to use motor trucks with trailers and to send these from day to day over regularly established routes to gather from the husbandmen along the line any greenstuffs they wish to dispose of. This means carrying the market to the farmer, so to speak, and making sure of utilizing everything that he has grown.

But it may be asked, Why has this not been done before? Have we any process or processes available to-day that we did not have until lately? Can we do as well as the Germans have done, or is it possible for us now to achieve even better results? Briefly we are in a position to do this very thing, and all because of recent improvements in the art developed here.

Indeed, it seems that drying and packing can now be carried out at a cost that will permit the fruits and vegetables so prepared to be sold at a price below the normal market charges for the fresh products in season. In this way immense quantities of foodstuffs can be made available and put within the reach of all when fresh fruits and vegetables are not to be had, or, if available, are purchasable only at extravagant prices.

The secret of this revolution in dehydrating is that the ultimate water content is safely below the moisture minimum which makes the formation of mold or the initiation of fermentation possible. Because of this the dry fresh foodstuffs can be kept for many, many months, and curiously the containers may be simply paper-lined barrels or the well-known cardboard cartons of commerce. There is no need for tin cans or glass jars.

The desiccation is effected by means of currents of hot air at relatively low temperatures, and while the drying is perfected in an uncommonly short time still the extraction of the moisture is carried to the innermost cells of the vegetable or fruity substance. There is no need of precooking or parboiling, and the resultant products have well-nigh the fullness of flavor of the freshly gathered yields of farm and orchard. Not only that, but the nutritive properties are those of the original fruits and vegetables, while pound for pound there is more nourishment in the desiccated foodstuffs.

ADVANTAGES OF DEHYDRATING.

For generations the pot au feu of the French has been famous, and an officer of the Royal Flying Corps reported recently when returning to England that he had been cured of rheumatism by a daily diet of the native vegetable soup. The pot au feu is made by cutting up all kinds of vegetables, such as potatoes, carrots, turnips, parsley, onions, celery, cabbage, cauliflower, etc., and letting them simmer on a slow fire with a little water in a closed earthenware vessel. In this way all of the ingredients are gradually cooked and softened.

Boiling would coagulate the albumen and remove some of the valuable vegetable salts, which, because of their alkaline nature, are known to neutralize the acids in the process of digestion. This is mentioned in order to bring out the disadvantage of the parboiling practiced by the Germans preliminary to drying their vegetables.

By the latest American process the products to be dried are commonly treated within a very few hours after they have been gathered; in fact, they reach the so-called dryventors far fresher than most of us know such commodities. We have to wait at times days before they come to the table, and nearly every hour after picking there is measurable deterioration and loss of flavor.

The fruits or vegetables are cut up into small pieces after they have been thoroughly cleansed. Then they are put in the desiccating apparatus, where they remain from two to five hours, depending upon the original water content. This operation is under perfect control, so that there is no hardening of the exterior or injury to the nutritive value.

The ultimate products when soaked in water, as they should be for a short time before cooking, regain their original form and taste as crisp and fresh and full flavored as though newly gathered. Of course, the dried foodstuffs occupy but a small part of the space taken up by the original fresh produce.

For example, a barrel of dried mixed vegetables, that will make just the kind of soup that has been described, weighs but 100 pounds and will provide a steaming plate for 7,000 persons. Before drying these vegetables fill something like 30 barrels. This saving in weight and bulk is a matter of especial importance now because of car shortage and the railway congestion that must be battled with when we get into our full war stride.

Our allies are not going to feed our soldiers at the front. We have got to do that ourselves, and the likeliest way to achieve this economically and efficiently is to ship them an abundance of concentrated foodstuffs. Apparently dried vegetables should help us out to a great measure in this vitally necessary work.

Food of this sort, which offers some variety, will go a long way toward maintaining our fighting men well and strong. It is equally evident, with German U-boats lying in wait for our supply ships, that we can help our own as well as our allies on the other side of the Atlantic by sending them subsistence of this sort. Any one ship getting through will carry the difference of food values that has already been pointed out between the bulky green and the compact dry fresh products.

WOULD INCREASE FOOD SUPPLY.

It is a matter of record that a very large percentage of the potato crop is gathered in the form of culls or tubers injured in the harvest digging. These culls, which are either fed to the pigs or allowed to rot on the ground, can now be gathered and converted into potato flour or chips by means of this latest of American drying processes. This in turn can be used to prepare boiled mashed potatoes, potato cakes, potato bread, and to serve as a sizing for certain textiles.

The careless paring of potatoes is commonly responsible for a wastage of substantially 20 per cent of the edible portion, including outer layers containing valuable mineral substance. The desiccated potato, therefore, is an economic advance. Sweet potato flour, pumpkin flour, etc., can be made from these vegetables when dried, and the most sensitive palate can not detect any difference between pumpkin pies made from the fresh farm product and the prepared flour.

Regarding pumpkins, squashes, and many other vegetables raised primarily for their seeds, hundreds of tons of the meaty matter are ordinarily thrown away. All of this can be saved and utilized helpfully by means of the drying apparatus now at our command. Onions, spinach, carrots, turnips, etc., lend themselves readily to this form of preservation, and, curiously, the spinach so treated is amazingly fresh when cooked.

The uses to which a drying system of this description can be put are well-nigh unlimited, but enough has been said to show how much the preservation of foodstuffs in this fashion concerns every walk of life. Clearly we can, if we will, utilize well-nigh every bit of our agricultural produce, no matter how great its volume, and by doing this we can provide for ourselves, keep down the cost of living, and lend a really substantial helping hand to our allies across the sea.

[From the Scientific American, Mar. 10, 1917.]

FEEDING THE NATION—A NEW DRYING PROCESS THAT PROMISES AN ECONOMIC REVOLUTION.

[By R. G. Skerrett.]

With good reason the world has wondered much during the better part of the past two years how Germany has been able to feed her people in spite of the blockade maintained by her foes. Unquestionably a notable part of her self-sufficiency has been due to the widespread adoption of drying processes to preserve vegetables, fruits, and grains that might otherwise have been sacrificed through deterioration or decay. The dehydrating factories or plants have made it possible to convert these perishable products into foodstuffs that could be kept for many months without much loss in their nutritive properties. How extensive this industry has been for some years back can be gathered from the fact that just about three years ago there were more than 425 drying establishments in the Fatherland, and these have been added to greatly since the outbreak of hostilities. Latterly the German authorities have placed evaporating plants in all of the good-sized cities, and these have served to take care of temporary surplus of farm products, thus conserving for the days of shortage fruits and vegetables that otherwise would have gone to waste.

A conspicuous economy has been effected in Germany through the drying of potato tops and beet tops for fodder. Prior to the desiccating of these leaves it was the practice to store in silos quite two-thirds of the beet tops, and because of unavoidable fermentation a very considerable part was spoiled. The drying treatment has eliminated this wastage and has made it possible for the Teutons to maintain their live stock in an extremely economical manner while fattening them to the desired degree for the market.

The German process for the preservation of vegetables has consisted in partly boiling them first to arrest certain organic changes and then in drying the products for preservation. The high temperatures cause a further radical alteration in physical appearance and chemical properties. To make them fit for the table, these desiccated vegetables require recooking, and, while unquestionably nutritive, they are not overpalatable nor do their flavors closely resemble those of the fresh growths. Even so, the Germans were admittedly masters of this art until a year or two ago, when a rival American process was perfected.

The essential features of the American process, which has been patented and is in operation at three plants in the United States, consist in using heated air at temperatures far below those employed abroad and in insuring a thorough circulation of the air currents so as to reach every particle of the fruits or vegetables undergoing desiccation. Consequently, the final yield of the drying apparatus is quite different from similar products treated by the German systems. To begin with, the moisture is extracted so that the residual water is well inside of 12 per cent, and the desiccation does not injure the cellular membranes of the vegetable matter. The evaporation—depending upon the original water content of the vegetable or fruit—is accomplished within the remarkably short period of from two and one-half to five hours. This is in notable contrast to the six and eight hours, and even much longer, required generally by other systems in which the removal of the water content ranges commonly well above 20 per cent. As a consequence, the vegetables and fruits dried by this American system retain to a remarkable degree their fresh taste and full flavor when prepared for the table; and because their cellular structure is uninjured they reacquire a normal appearance in a short while after being soaked in water.

It is authoritatively stated by the United States Department of Agriculture that quite 50 per cent of the vegetables and fruits grown here never reach the consumer's table, and it is equally certain that the major part of the produce so sacrificed does not leave the farm or orchard. This is because of difficulties of transportation and the state of the market, combined with the fact that only the very best of the fruits or vegetables will pass final inspection or lend themselves to profitable shipping. Nevertheless, by far the greater part of those products that do not leave the farm could be saved and made available by drying. Not only that, but this new process shows that the yields of farm and orchard can be conserved so as to keep well-nigh indefinitely, and can be marketed at a price well below that of the so-called fresh products to be had only at certain seasons of the year.

The economic aspect of this matter is twofold. First, the farmer will no longer be hemmed in by local markets; his produce, when dried at near-by or conveniently located plants, can be cheaply delivered as demand dictates to any point in the United States or to foreign countries. Then, too, these dried products will be a great deal lighter than the fresh fruits or vegetables, and therefore will take up less space than in their original form. This will lower proportionately the charges for transportation and storage. A large truck load of mixed vegetables can be dried by this process so that they will weigh but a hundred pounds and fill only a single barrel. Soup vegetables of this sort and weighing but 1 pound will make enough soup to satisfy 60 adults. For exploring parties, for large forces of workmen engaged far from a base of supply, and for naval and military operations this method of preserving foodstuffs promises to be of the utmost value. Because of the low moisture content these so-called "dry-fresh" products are not liable to attack by molds or bacteria. Also, because of the very modest percentage of the residual water the products, pound for pound, represent a correspondingly higher percentage of nutritive value.

One domestic industry, particularly, is in a fair way to be revolutionized by the perfecting of the process in question. According to the latest crop report of the Bureau of Agriculture, beet-sugar factories in the United States will produce 918,800 short tons of sugar "during the current campaign." The area harvested amounted to 680,000 acres, and the beets totaled 6,671,000 short tons. The official statement issued in December past, says: "This is the largest acreage and tonnage of beets ever harvested in the United States, and the sugar production exceeds the highest preceding crop—that of 1915—by more than 44,600 tons. During the past five years the United States has consumed about 4,000,000 tons of sugar annually."

In 1915 the cane sugar produced in Louisiana amounted to 216,996 tons, and the beet-sugar factories of the United States turned out in the same period 646,257 tons. This gives us some idea of the steadily growing importance of the domestic beet-sugar industry located in Michigan, Colorado, Nebraska, Ohio, Idaho, and Utah. It also shows that we can make ourselves independent, if need be, of outside sources of raw sugar, because the sugar beet can be grown here far more extensively than it is possible for us to cultivate sugar cane within our continental limits. There is cheer for the farmer, too, in this matter. In the less favored of the northern districts of the country farmers confidently count upon realizing $30 per acre of sugar beets, while in California the return is in the neighborhood of $40 and more.

The growing of sugar beets heretofore has been restricted to somewhat narrow zones immediately contiguous to the factories. Wagon hauling is not practicable or profitable beyond a distance of 10 miles, and transportation charges limit rail carriage to an extreme radius of a hundred miles from a refinery. Next, the so-called "campaign" or harvesting period does not extend beyond three months, and within this relatively short interval the sugar beets must be gathered and delivered directly to the factories. Even so, there are many practical difficulties that entail losses.

To begin with, the farmer naturally wants to harvest his product when his beets are biggest and the crop heaviest. The refiner, on the other hand, wants each contributing farmer's harvest delivered separately or at specified intervals, so that the regular daily tonnage to be handled will just fit in with the factory's capacity. This ideal arrangement is well-nigh impossible under prevailing conditions, and, therefore, in order to take care of momentary overload, silos are sometimes installed to hold the excess beets for a while. There is an inevitable loss in the silos owing to fermentation and even to decay of some of the beets.

A factory capable of handling a thousand tons of beets a day represents a plant outlay of quite a million dollars. For nine months of the year this establishment is idle, and all because beets can only be supplied to it for a maximum period of a hundred days annually. Even so, the beet sugar production of 1916—measured by prices charged the housewife—will represent something like $147,000,000. Manifestly, there would be a great economic gain, which would no doubt bring down the price of sugar, if these expensive factories could be operated throughout the entire year with wider areas contributing beets to each refinery. That is to say, instead of having rail transportation limited to 100 miles, imagine the gain if the beets could be delivered from distances of 400 miles at the same freight rate, and in such shape that when received at the refinery they could be held without depreciation and utilized at any time, even months after their arrival. This is exactly what the new drying process makes possible.

Fresh beets are prepared for the diffusion cells of the refinery by being cut into small pieces or slices which are technically known as cossettes. In this form the pieces of beets can be permeated by the hot water and the sucrose content withdrawn. The new system consists of drying plants located at convenient points anywhere within a zone of 400 miles from the refinery and adjacent to lines of rail transportation. At these dehydrating establishments the beets received from the nearby farmers are cut into cossettes and promptly desiccated—1 short ton of beets weighing but 500 pounds when so dried, and the bulk being reduced proportionately. Samples of beet cossettes treated in this manner at a Bound Brook, N. J., factory have remained unimpaired in storage, just as raw sugar might be packed, for a period of more than two years. Measured by dry substance polarization the percentage loss of cossettes stored in burlap feed bags was only 1.66 after 730 days, and curiously enough there was a decrease of nearly 50 per cent of the original moisture. What is even stranger, because of the relatively low temperatures employed, enzymic action is not halted by the dehydrating, and sugar production continues for a while, thus yielding an increase of from 5 to 8 per cent over that of fresh cossettes at the time of their diffusion by the general practice. This increased sucrose production was discovered years ago by the Department of Agriculture, and was considered a puzzling phenomenon. Dehydrated cossettes now actually promote this conversion of normally unformed sugars in the beets, and this gain alone is enough to reduce enormously the cost of running a refinery or to neutralize the expense of drying and transporting the dehydrated cossettes.

Farmers now hundreds of miles away from a refinery can grow beets and be sure of a certain and profitable market; and the beets when dehydrated can be transported in bulk, in box cars, without fear of deterioration. When received at the factory they can be stored where the air can reach them freely and will remain fit for the diffusion process for many months. Not only that, but because of their relatively intensified sugar content, less water will be required to accomplish thorough extraction of the sucrose, the diffusion liquor will be richer, and to just this measure less heat will be needed to effect the subsequent operations.

COMMERCIAL DEHYDRATION.

Undoubtedly the earliest method of carrying over from periods of great abundance to periods of scarcity products of the field and orchard was that of drying. The principle of evaporating moisture from foodstuffs was made use of long before the first canned goods came into existence. In this country the American Indians provided for their commissariat by laying in a stock of pemmican, which is nothing but dehydrated beef, before starting on a forced march. The familiar raisin, which is a dehydrated grape, has been long with us and enjoys a well-earned reputation for wholesomeness, keeping qualities, and other properties of value in determining the worth of foodstuffs.

Drying, desiccation, dehydration, or any other word meaning the same thing, simply consists in removing the water and nothing else from a product. In the case of food the value of the finished product depends upon a number of factors not of importance in the case of nonedible products. It is simple enough to drive the moisture from most articles if no attention is to be given to physical appearance, taste, or odor. As is well known, the expulsion of moisture from an article depends upon the physical reaction known as evaporation, which, in turn, depends upon temperature and the relative humidity of the enveloping atmosphere. Fairly high heat will bring about evaporation even in a stagnant atmosphere, and, on the other hand, moving air will bring about evaporation even at a fairly low temperature. As might be assumed, a combination of moderate heat and moving air is the most effective.

Commercial dehydration is based upon three general methods of operation, namely, heat from the sun, artificial heat, and the air blast, with many combinations of these basic methods. Undoubtedly, the simplest form of dehydrating food products is that still employed with apricots, raisins, and other fruits in which the product to be treated is placed on trays in the sunshine and evaporation brought about by the radiant energy of the sun and the gentle breezes of a midsummer day. Naturally, this method of procedure is interfered with sadly if a rainstorm happens to blow up. Dust and the eggs of certain insects are causes of contamination which must be guarded against. As an offset to these unfavorable factors of sun drying are to be borne in mind the excellent color and flavor generally possessed by foods dried in this fashion.

By using a steady blast of cool air food products may be and are dehydrated, although the process is a somewhat slow one. Here again color and flavor are excellent, and if the operation is carried out in sanitary quarters, dirt and the eggs of undesirable animal life are absent.

Until very recently the most generally used method of dehydrating food products was that of subjecting them to a current of hot, dry air, the general assumption having been that the drier the air the more rapid would be the progress of the action. Ordinarily the first process in dehydrating is that of removing from the air as much of the moisture as is possible. This is generally done by condensation, the air being passed over the chilled pipes of a refrigerating unit, which action causes the moisture contained in the air to condense as drops of water on the cold pipes. The air thus dried is then heated to about 65° C. (150° F.) and is forced by fans through the trays upon which is placed the food to be dried. There are certain objections to this method, notable among which are those of a dissipation of the delicate flavors of certain fruits and vegetables. The treatment is rather heroic for certain types of food, some of which leave the dehydrator in a partially cooked condition. At times the effect of the hot-air blast is to sear the surface of the product with a comparatively impervious layer before all moisture has been extracted from the interior parts of the product.

Of late this time-honored process has apparently been improved upon. As the photographs accompanying this article indicate, it is possible to remove the moisture from certain food products in such manner as to permit, by the simple addition of water, of bringing back the dehydrated products to approximately their original condition. This new method is also claimed to dissipate but little, if any, of the delicate flavor of fruits and vegetables, and, indeed, it is difficult to distinguish a revivified product dehydrated by this new system from the original fruit or vegetable.

This system of dehydration has several points of scientific interest. There are three ways of applying heat to a body, these ordinarily being defined as conduction, convection, and radiation. The iron poker, one end of which is in the fire blazing on the hearth, is heated by conduction. The various rooms of the house are heated by convection currents of warm air set in circulation by the fire in the grate. When we stand in front of the fire for a time our body becomes heated, not by conduction nor by convection, but by the heat which radiates from the fire, and before long we are warmer than is the air between us and the source of the heat. This is due to the fact that air permits passage of the rays of radiant heat without absorbing it. And especially is this true of dry air. Rays of radiant heat are of the same family as light waves, being generally considered to be of considerably greater length than the ray which emits red light. Such rays pass through glass or in turn can be reflected by a mirrored surface in very much the same manner as is possible with light rays. They can to a certain extent be driven through a fog, and here we come to the secret of the Hobson system of hydration, the one upon which this article is based.

In an attempt to overcome the objections to present methods of dehydration, Messrs. Otto Q. Beckworth and Oliver T. Hobson conceived the idea of transmitting heat to the products under treatment by means of radiation but at the same time keeping the product bathed in a medium of warm air slightly cooler than the products and of the proper degree of humidity to absorb moisture from the product at a rate in keeping with its moisture content. Thus, instead of subjecting the product to a current of dry, hot air, it is subjected to heat rays radiating from hot side walls of an oven which rays are at the outset of the operation forced through a constantly moving enveloping medium of moist air which serves at one and the same time to remove moisture from the product and to protect it from too rapid evaporation. In other words, the product is made to "sweat," the perspiration being removed as fast as it is formed by the application of a moist towel, the moist towel in this case being the current of damp air. As the drying process proceeds the current of air, which is forced through the drying compartment by means of blowers, becomes constantly less humid, the excess moisture being removed by appropriate drying apparatus and the later stages of the dehydrating process are conducted in an atmosphere that is practically moisture free.

The object obtained in this method of dehydration is the doing away with the possibility of surface drying before the moisture in the interior of a product has had a chance to work its way out by capillarity and in turn be vaporized by heat and removed by evaporation. All conditions which affect the process are controlled rigidly and as called for by heat and moisture measuring instruments of precision. The heat comes from steam coils placed in the side walls of the drying chamber and the current of air discussed above is blown through perforations in the floor, being removed from the apex of the roof of the drying compartments by revolving fans, the same air current being used repeatedly during the process in order to economize in cost of operation.

The photograph accompanying this article indicates some of the many products now being dehydrated by this system. The process is by no means limited to this list and, indeed, not long ago a delicious shortcake was made of loganberries which were received in practically water-free condition. The delicate flavor peculiar to the loganberry seemed to have been preserved without loss and probably old Gen. Logan himself would have thought he was being served berries fresh from the field.

Economically there are many arguments in favor of dehydration. As fruits and vegetables are from 60 to 90 per cent moisture, the gain in bulk by submitting the products of the field to dehydration before shipping them long distances is obvious; also well-dried food products, while undeniably hygroscopic, can easily be kept in good condition for long periods of time. Should an active industry be built up in dehydrated foodstuffs it would serve to supplement the already established industry of commercial canning and would undeniably have a tendency to conserve for use much high-priced food which is at present not available for the commercial canner. In all large centers where fruits and green vegetables are handled the matter of spoilage could easily be obviated by the installation of dehydrating outfits. The loss due to spoilage is a very considerable item, as is clearly indicated by Mr. Isaac Russell's article in this issue entitled "Food Wastage in New York." If all large cities made a point of dehydrating fruits and vegetables as soon as they reach the point at which deterioration commences and before that process has been allowed to make any serious inroads into the quality of the products the problem of food spoilage would soon be at least partly solved.

The Home Drying of Vegetables and Fruits.

One of the most prominent features of the food-conservation program of European countries has been the universal drying of fruits and vegetables. The surplus vegetables in the city markets were forced by the Governments into large municipal drying plants. Community driers were established in the trucking regions and even itinerant drying machines were sent from farm to farm drying the vegetables which otherwise would have gone to waste. In addition, large quantities of dried vegetables from Canada and this country were shipped to France during the last two years, and there is a possibility that dried fruits and vegetables may continue to be shipped abroad in considerable quantities to supplement the concentrated food diet of the men in the trenches.

The drying of vegetables may seem strange to the present generation, but to our grandmothers it was no novelty. Many housewives even to-day prefer dried sweet corn to the product canned by the old method, and say also that dried pumpkin and squash are excellent for pie making. Snap beans often are strung on threads and dried above the stove. Cherries and raspberries still are dried on bits of bark for use instead of raisins. In fact, many of the everyday foodstuffs already are dried at some stage of their preparation for market. The common dried fruits, such as prunes, raisins, figs, dates, and apples, are staples in the world's markets, while beans and other legumes, tea, coffee, cocoa, and various manufactured foods like starch, tapioca, macaroni, etc., are dried either in the sun and wind or in specially constructed driers.

Even though the drying of fruits and vegetables as practiced a few decades ago on many farms has become practically a "lost art," the present food situation doubtless will cause a marked stimulation of drying as a means of conserving the food supply. This country is producing large quantities of perishable foods this year, which should be saved for storage, canned, or properly dried. Drying is not a panacea for the entire waste evil, nor should it take the place of storing or canning to any considerable extent where proper storage facilities are available or tin cans or glass jars can be obtained readily and at a low cost.

The advantages of drying vegetables are not so apparent for the farm home as they are for the town or city household, which has no root cellar or other place in which to store fresh vegetables. For the farmer's wife the new methods of canning probably will be better than sun drying, which requires a somewhat longer time. But shorter methods of drying are available, and the dried product holds an advantage in that usually it requires fewer jars, cans, or other containers than do canned fruits or vegetables; also dried material can be stored in receptacles which can not be used for canning. Then, too, canned fruit and vegetables freeze and can not be shipped as conveniently in winter. Dried vegetables can be compacted and shipped with a minimum of risk.

To the housewife in the town the drying of vegetables and fruits presents special advantages. During the season when the market is oversupplied locally and prices are low she can lay in a stock, dry it, and put it away for a winter's emergency without its taking up much of the needed small storage space in her home. If she is accustomed to canning her fruit and vegetables and finds she can not secure jars or tin cans, she can easily resort to drying.

And now we are told to dry vegetables and fruits for winter use if tin cans and glass jars for canning are scarce or expensive.

This is the advice of specialists of the United States Department of Agriculture, who recently have studied the possibilities of conserving food to meet war needs in spite of any difficulties that may be experienced in obtaining canning containers. Drying was a well-recognized and successful way of preserving certain foods before canning came into general use, the specialists point out, and modern methods make it still more practicable than formerly, either in the home or by community groups.

Methods of Drying.

Three methods of drying have been found by the department specialists to give satisfactory results. These are sun drying, drying by artificial heat, and drying with air blasts, as before an electric fan. Trays for drying by any one of these methods, as well as tray frames for use over stoves or before fans can be made satisfactorily at home. Frames and trays for use with artificial heat may be purchased complete if desired.

Homemade trays may be made of side and end boards three-fourths of an inch thick and 2 inches wide, and bottom boards of lathing spaced one-fourth of an inch. If desired, one-fourth-inch galvanized wire mesh may be tacked to the side and end boards to form the bottoms of the trays. Frames for use before fans may be made of wood of convenient size. Frames for use with artificial heat should be made of noninflammable material to as great an extent as possible. As many as six trays may be placed one above the other when artificial heat is used.

The trays are arranged so that every other one is pushed back 3 inches from the front, this arrangement affording a free circulation of air, the currents of heated air passing over the product as well as up through it, gathering moisture and passing out through the ventilator. The movement of the current of air induces a more rapid and uniform drying. The trays should be shifted from time to time as the lower ones naturally dry faster than those above.

Another home drier is the cookstove oven, in which bits of food, leftovers, especially sweet corn, etc., can be dried on plates resting on screen or wire trays at a very low temperature. The door should be left ajar and the temperature often noted.

There are two types of cookstove driers on the market. One type is a box-like compartment containing trays through which the heated air rises, carrying off the moisture through a flue. The second type consists of a shallow flat metal box filled with water and designed so that one end can rest on the back of the stove and the other on a leg reaching to the floor.

The various makes of cookstove cabinets—the size convenient for use in the home—have a capacity of from 1 to 4 pecks a day. The larger ones, usually called evaporators, have their own fire boxes underneath and hold from 4 to 5 bushels a day. These capacities are based on green-apple measures.

Almost any vegetables or fruit may be dried in these evaporators or cabinets—apples, pears, peaches, plums, raspberries, huckleberries, currants, peas, corn, potatoes, pumpkins, etc. It has been found that the quality and quantity of each are dependent on the ripeness and the species of the fruit. Baldwin apples, for instance, giving a better grade of product than the Jonathans. The regulations of the heat which passes over the product is of paramount importance. If the air applied at the outset is of too high temperature, the surfaces of the vegetables or fruit become hard or scorched, covering the juicy interior so that it will not dry out. Generally it is not desirable that the air temperature in drying should go above 140° to 150° F., and it is better to keep it well below this point. Insects and insect eggs are killed by exposure to heat of this temperature.

There is no method which would appeal so much to the modern woman as the use of the electric fan in drying. Every woman knows that at the height of the canning season the thermometer reaches its midsummer maximum, and the day which she has set aside for canning (perishable supplies having been ordered some time ahead) is sure to be a stifling day in the kitchen. To be able to arrange her fruits or vegetables (sliced and ready for drying) on trays stacked in tiers placed before an electric fan and then turn on the current, thus making canning a cool rather than an excessively warm operation, exactly accords with her ideas of modern efficiency. The real advantage of this process, however, consists in the fact that the product kept cool, owing to evaporation, tends to retain its color and eliminate spoilage.

In drying before a fan the number of trays that may be placed one above the other will depend, to a large extent, upon the diameter of the fan. In drying in the sun trays as described may be used or the products to be dried may be spread on sheets of paper or muslin held in place by weights.

PREPARING PRODUCTS FOR DRYING.

Vegetables and fruits will dry better if sliced. They should be cut into slices one-eighth to one-fourth of an inch thick. If thicker, they may not dry thoroughly. While drying the products should be turned or stirred from time to time. Dried products should be packed temporarily for three or four days and poured each day from one box to another to bring about thorough mixing and so that the whole mass will have a uniform degree of moisture. If during this "conditioning" any pieces of the products are found to be too moist, they should be returned to the trays and dried further. When in condition, the products may be packed permanently in tight paper bags, insect-proof paper boxes or cartons or glass or tin containers.

RECIPES.

SPINACH AND PARSLEY.

Spinach that is in prime condition for greens should be prepared by careful washing and removing the leaves from the roots. Spread the leaves on trays to dry thoroughly. They will dry much more promptly if sliced or chopped.

GARDEN BEETS, ONIONS, CARROTS, TURNIPS, PARSNIPS, CABBAGE.

Beets: Select young, quickly grown, tender beets, which should be washed, peeled, sliced about an eighth of an inch thick, and dried.

Turnips should be treated in the same way as beets.

Carrots should be well grown, but varieties having a large woody core should be avoided. Wash, peel, and slice crosswise into pieces about an eighth of an inch thick.

Parsnips should be treated in the same way as carrots.

Onions: Remove the outside papery covering. Cut off tops and roots. Slice into one-eighth inch pieces and dry.

Cabbage: Select well-developed heads of cabbage and remove all loose outside leaves. Split the cabbage, remove the hard, woody core, and slice the remainder of the head with a kraut cutter or other hand-slicing machine.

All the products under this heading should be "conditioned" as described above.

BEET TOPS, SWISS CHARD, CELERY, AND RHUBARB.

Beet tops: Tops of young beets in suitable condition for greens should be selected and washed carefully. Both the leaf stalk and blade should be cut into sections about one-fourth inch long and spread on screens and dried.

Swiss chard and celery should be prepared in the same way as beet tops.

Rhubarb: Choose young and succulent growth. Prepare as for stewing by skinning the stalks and cutting into pieces about one-fourth inch to one-half inch in length and dry on trays.

All the products under this heading should be "conditioned" as described.

THE AIR-BLOWN PROCESS.

The air-blown process consists of a chamber constructed of wood or masonry into which the liquid to be evaporated is injected in the form of a fine spray. A current of heated air introduced below the spray rises through it, absorbs its water content, and passes out of the chamber. The solid constituents of the liquids are precipitated to the bottom of the chamber in a dry, finely powdered state without chemical or deleterious change to the product.

The economy of this method of drying is readily apparent. The heat is applied direct to the substances to be dried and not by transmission through a metal membrane, with consequent loss by radiation. The minute subdivision of the atomized fluid permits the heat to surround each atom and absorb its watery envelope instantly. The fluid is projected into the chamber in such a way as to form a blanket of spray, which fills the full transverse area of the house. To find an exit, the hot air must pass through this watery lid, and in consequence give up its heat.

Such substances as milk, eggs, malt, and delicate chemicals may be reduced to their solid constituents by this means at high temperatures without scorching or other injurious effect.

More or less entrainment of the fine light particles occurs, passing out of the chamber with the effluent in the form of a fine dust, the recovery of which is accomplished by well-known methods of dust collection.

The cost of equipping a plant is fractional as compared with the vacuum drying methods. The product is superior and is more soluble and uniform in character.

The accessory apparatus—air heater, air compressor, motors, fan, and dust collector—are all standard equipment and purchasable in the open market.

DISTINCT ADVANTAGES.

1. Low cost of installation.
2. Quick construction.
3. Low cost of upkeep.
4. Longer life of apparatus.
5. Easy to clean and adjust.
6. Low cost of operation.
7. Less expert and fewer workmen required.
8. Concentration or complete evaporation with one apparatus.
9. Finished product obtained instantaneously in one operation.
10. No scorching or chemical change of product.
11. Product more soluble and uniform.
12. Light construction and ease of transport permits location at source of raw supply, a frequent impossibility with the cumbersome vacuum machinery.

The following products in liquid form have been successfully dried with the air-blown process: Milk, eggs, fruit juices, dyes, colors, tanning extracts, logwood, soap, starch, glue, glucose, molasses, cane juice, salt, various drugs and chemicals, malt, blood, blood serum, blood albumen, sulphite, pitch, mine slimes, arsenate of lead, and sulphur.

Any product contained in solution suspension or emulsion may be evaporated by this means to a fine, dry, flourlike product. And many materials that can not be satisfactorily dried by other means may be evaporated by the air-blown process with entire success.

This system of evaporation should not be confounded with the well-known cylindrical type of spray evaporators. The air-blown process employs other physical forces and different constructional methods, resulting in a higher degree of efficiency and greater economy.

Authority of President to Send Militia into a Foreign Country.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM GORDON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, September 1, 1917.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an opinion of the Attorney General of the United States, dated February 17, 1912:

AUTHORITY OF PRESIDENT TO SEND MILITIA INTO A FOREIGN COUNTRY.

The Constitution, which enumerates the exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into the service of the United States, affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union, and hence the President has no authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation.

DEPARTMENT OF JUSTICE, February 17, 1912.

SIR: I have the honor to respond to your note of the 8th instant, in which you ask my opinion upon the following question:

"Whether or not, under existing laws, the President has authority to call forth the Organized Militia of the States and send it into a foreign country with the Regular Army as a part of an army of occupation, especially should the United States intervene in the affairs of such country under conditions short of actual warfare?"

From very early times, in both England and this country, the militia has always been considered and treated as a military body quite distinct and different from the Regular or Standing Army, governed by different laws and rules, and equally different as to the time, place, or occasion of its service. One of the most notable points of difference is this: While the latter was in the continued service of the Government and might be called into active service at all times and in all places where armed force is required for any purpose, the militia could be called into the actual service of the Government only in the few special cases provided for by law. Their service has always been considered as of a rather domestic character, for the protection and defense of their own country and the enforcement of its laws.

This has always been the English doctrine, and in some instances acts of Parliament have expressly forbidden the use of militia outside of the Kingdom.

Our ancestors, who framed and adopted our Constitution and early laws, got their ideas of a militia, its nature and purposes, from this, and must be taken to have intended substantially the same military body, with the same limitations of the occasion and nature of their service. If they had intended to enlarge this, they would have said so, just as they have when they intended to further limit or restrict the occasion or nature of their service.

When the Constitution gives to Congress the power "to raise and support armies," and to provide "for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," and makes the President "the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy of the United States, and the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States," it is speaking of two different bodies—the one the Regular Army, in the continuous service of the Government, and liable to be called into active service at any time, or in any place where armed force is required; and the other a body for domestic service, and liable to be called into the service of the Government only upon the particular occasions named in the Constitution. And acts of Congress relating to the Army and the militia must have the same construction.

It is certain that it is only upon one or more of these three occasions—when it is necessary to suppress insurrections, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the United States—that even Congress can call this militia into the service of the United States, or authorize it to be done.

As "insurrection" is necessarily internal and domestic, within the territorial limits of the Nation, this portion of the sentence can afford no warrant for sending the militia to suppress it elsewhere. And even if an insurrection of our own citizens were set on foot and threateningly maintained in a foreign jurisdiction and upon our border, to send an armed force there to suppress it would be an act of war which the President can not rightfully do.

The term "to repel invasion" may be, in some respects, more elastic in its meaning. Thus, if the militia were called into the service of the General Government to repel an invasion, it would not be necessary to discontinue their use at the boundary line, but they might (within certain limits, at least) pursue and capture the invading force, even beyond that line, and just as the Regular Army might be used for that purpose. This may well be held to be within the meaning of the term "to repel invasion."

Then, too, if an armed force were assembled upon our border, so near and under circumstances which plainly indicated hostility and an intended invasion, this Government might attack and capture or defeat such forces, using either the Regular Army or the militia for that purpose. This, also, would be but one of the ways of repelling an invasion.

But this is quite different from and affords no warrant for sending the militia into a foreign country in time of peace and when no invasion is made or threatened.

The only remaining occasion for calling out the militia is "to execute the laws of the Union." But this certainly means to execute such laws where, and only where, they are in force and can be executed or enforced. The Constitution or laws of the United States have no extraterritorial force and can not be compulsorily executed beyond or outside of the territorial limits of the United States.

It is true that treaties made in pursuance of the Constitution are, equally with acts of Congress, the supreme law of the land; but their observance, outside of our own jurisdiction, can not be enforced in the same way. The observance and performance, outside of our own jurisdiction, of treaty stipulations and obligations are left much to the honor, good faith, and comity of the other contracting party, reenforced, at times, by a regard for the consequences of a breach. We can not send either the Regular Army or the militia into a foreign country to execute such treaties or our laws. Such an invasion of a foreign country would be an act of war.

Outside of our own limits "the laws of the Union" are not executed by armed force, either regular or militia.

The Constitution had already given to Congress the unlimited power to declare war, at any time and for whatever cause it chose. It did not, in this provision, attempt the useless thing of giving to Congress an additional power to declare war, or to afford an additional ground for doing so.

What is certainly meant by this provision is that Congress shall have power to call out the militia in aid of the civil power, for the peaceful execution of the laws of the Union, wherever such laws are in force and may be compulsorily executed, much as a sheriff may call upon the posse comitatus to peacefully disperse a riot or execute the laws.

Under our Constitution, as it has been uniformly construed from the first, the military is subordinate and subservient to the civil power, and it can be called upon to execute the laws of the Union only in aid of the civil power and where the civil power has jurisdiction of such enforcement. Even the Regular Army can be thus called upon only on such occasions, and certainly the militia can not be thus called upon at any other.

Then, as the civil power is without force in a foreign country, and as even the Regular Army can not be sent into another country to there execute the laws of the Union, it follows that the Constitution confers no power to send the militia into a foreign country for the purpose stated in the question here considered. On the contrary, by its specific enumeration of the only occasions for calling out the militia, it clearly forbids this.

In all this I am not unmindful that nations sometimes do make hostile demonstrations and use armed force to compel the observance by another nation of its treaty obligations, and sometimes send armed forces into another country to protect the lives and rights of its own citizens there.

I shall briefly notice these in their application to our own country, its Constitution and laws. It will be observed, and as controlling and conclusive of the present question, that in case of a hostile demonstration against or a forcible attack upon another nation to enforce its treaty obligations, or to punish their infraction, there is no question involved of executing the laws of the invading nation, for such laws have no force or existence there. While the Constitution makes itself and the laws and treaties, in pursuance thereof, the supreme law of the land, it is only in our own land where such laws are supreme or of any force. As to the other contracting party, a treaty is a mere compact, depending for its observance upon the good faith, comity, or other moral considerations. The Constitution can not make itself or the treaties or laws made under it the supreme law of any other nation, or give to either any force or existence beyond our own borders. So that, when an armed force is used to compel the observance of treaty obligations, or to punish or obtain compensation for their violation, there is no question of executing any law of the Union, for there is no such law there. It is but the forcible compelling of the observance of an agreement, or compensation for its breach. The provision referred to does not warrant the use of the militia for this purpose.

Just so it is when, in troublous times, an army of occupation, large or small, is sent into a foreign country to protect the lives and the rights of our own citizens. Here, too, no law of the Union is being executed by such invasion, for no law of the Union exists or can be enforced there.

While it is the duty of every nation to afford proper protection to foreigners who are lawfully within its borders, yet this is not because of any law of the nation of which such foreigners are subjects, for no such laws exist or have any force there. No one can say, in such a case, that we are executing or enforcing any law of the Union. We are but aiding or compelling the foreign Government to execute its own laws and to perform its own duty. As no law of the Union is being executed by such invasion, the militia can not be called out, under this provision, to take part in it. As no law of the Union can exist or be in force in any foreign country, the militia can not be called out to enforce any such law there.

The plain and certain meaning and effect of this constitutional provision is to confer upon Congress the power to call out the militia "to execute the laws of the Union" within our own borders where, and where only, they exist, have any force, or can be executed by anyone. This confers no power to send the militia into a foreign country to execute our laws which have no existence or force there and can not be there executed.

If authority is needed for the conclusion here reached, the following may suffice:

In Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, page 501, it is said:

"The Constitution distinctly enumerates the three exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into the service of the United States. These purposes are: First, to execute the laws of the Union; second, to suppress insurrection; and, third, to repel invasions.

"These three occasions representing necessities of a strictly domestic character, plainly indicate that the services required of the militia can be rendered only upon the soil of the United States or of its Territories. * * * In the history of this provision of the Constitution there is nothing indicating that it was even contemplated that such troops should be employed for purposes of offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States. And it is but just to infer that the enumeration of the specific occasions on which alone the militia can be called into the service of the General Government was intended as a distinct limitation upon their employment.

"Being the ministers of the law to enforce its commands, they can only be summoned by the lawmaking power to act within the extent of its jurisdiction, and in the manner prescribed by the Constitution. They can not consequently be used to invade the territory of a neighboring country or to enforce any public rights abroad. * * *

"The militia of the States, restricted to domestic purposes alone, are to be distinguished therefore from the Army proper of the United States, which, whether in the form of Regular troops or Volunteers, may be used to invade a foreign country as well as to repel the attack of foreign enemies."

And Von Holtz, Constitutional Law, page 170, it is said "the militia can not be taken out of the country."

In Kneedler v. Lane (45 Pa. St., 238, 276), Judge Strong, speaking for the court, said:

"Apart from the obligations assumed by treaty, it was well known that there are many cases where the rights of a nation and of its citizens can not be protected or vindicated within its own boundaries.

"But the power conferred upon Congress over the militia is insufficient to enable the fulfillment of the demands of such treaties, or to protect the rights of the Government, or its citizens, in those cases in which protection must be sought beyond the territorial limits of the country."

And see Houston v. Moore (5 Wheat., 1) and Martin v. Mott (12 Wheat., 19, 27).

It is true that the act of January 21, 1903, as amended by the act of March 27, 1908 (35 Stat., 400), provides:

"That whenever the President calls forth the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia, to be employed in the service of the United States, he may specify in his call the period for which such service is required, and the militia so called shall continue to serve during the term so specified, either within or without the territory of the United States, unless sooner relieved by order of the President."

But this must be read in view of the constitutional power of Congress to call forth the militia only to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union. Congress can not, by its own enactment, enlarge the power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and if this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified it would be unconstitutional. This provision applies only to cases where, under the Constitution, said militia may be used outside of our own borders, and was doubtless inserted as a matter of precaution and to prevent the possible recurrence of what took place in our last war with Great Britain, when portions of the militia refused to obey orders to cross the Canadian frontier.

I think that the constitutional provision here considered not only affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union, but by its careful enumeration of the three occasions or purposes for which the militia may be used it forbids such use for any other purpose; and your question is answered in the negative.

Respectfully,

GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM.

The SECRETARY OF WAR.

The Pink Bollworm.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. JAMES P. BUCHANAN,
OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, September 1, 1917.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Mr. Speaker, the pink bollworm, so constantly discussed in the papers, thrusts itself upon our attention in no uncertain way. Without question its serious consideration can not be avoided, for the emergency marks the most significant crisis that has ever stirred the cotton growers of America, and the destruction of our cotton industry seems a pending calamity.

There is no question—not the shadow of a doubt—of its profound concern to the cotton interests everywhere.

It is intensely so to the cotton belt of the United States, and the Texas cotton planter may well be alarmed over the situation, for his experience justifies his gravest fear. He knows how great the calamity that threatens the Texas cotton production, approximating, as it does, one-half of the baled lint of the cotton States.

The pink bollworm, Mr. Speaker, without exaggeration, is today the most real and destructive pest that has ever aroused the cotton world. It bodes a far greater disaster than the Mexican boll weevil, with which we are familiar and that has for so many years scourged us unmercifully. Twenty-five years ago we were warned of the coming of what was called the Mexican boll weevil, and in the early nineties the panic-stricken farmers of Texas were distracted and gloomy over what seemed to mean the total loss of their main dependence for livelihood and prosperity.

They had just learned to cope with "the army worm" and "the caterpillar" that for decades had engaged them in annual battle over the growing cotton and that, until understood, had often destroyed over night their most promising hopes. They had just succeeded in the use of remedies for this annual disaster and were feeling secure in their crops when the Mexican boll weavil terror was heralded from Mexico as the advancing arch enemy of King Cotton. Soon the invasion of that mighty tropical pest began its resistless march across the Texas border at the Rio Grande and imperial Texas was rapidly subjected to the most remorseless insect visitation since the plagues of Egypt. Since then, Mr. Speaker, the cotton States have become infested throughout and incalculable damage has fallen upon the land. But cultural methods have largely overcome this summer pestilence and the crop now is measurably secure. The habitual use of the seed of the early maturing varieties of cotton, early planting with intensive cultivation, and the early harvest measurably defeats the pestiferous little bug that hides itself, safe from sight or poison, under the close-fitting shuck of the boll and thrives on the tender bud that sprouts to suit its seasonable activity and appetite. To a degree at present we manage Mr. Boll Weevil.

But now, Mr. Speaker, unless we take instant and effective action, the fateful scourge known to the entomologist as the Pectinophora gossypiella—in common phrase the pink bollworm—will inflict upon us the most destructive calamity ever known to the cotton industry the world over.

The pink bollworm, like the Mexican boll weevil, hails from the Mexican tropics and is very much more destructive and infinitely more difficult to fight and impossible to exterminate. It is more to be dreaded than all the pests that prey on nature's finest provision for universal clothing. It is the most incomparable terror of all the insect enemies that infest the fields and ginhouses and seed sheds and oil mills of the cotton regions. Its food, and its only food, is furnished by the cotton plant. It lives on the green boll, in the stalk, the dry seed in the bin, or under the shed, and its life is preserved in the packed lint of the cotton bale, and its perennial existence runs through the four seasons.

This Pectinophora gossypiella has been the object of investigation and research by the scientists and students of agriculture and plant life for many years; they know it by every small fraction of its anatomy. It is recognizable if but a particle of its dead remains be examined under the microscope. It comes from India via Africa, but it is at home wherever the cotton plant is grown.

In Asia, Africa, and the Hawaiian Islands it habitually reduces the lint yield by 50 per cent and over, and cuts the oil-bearing quality of the seed by a very material loss. One observation—by Maxwell Lefroy—fixes the minimum loss in India at more than $10,000,000 annually. And the crop has virtually been abandoned in the Hawaiian Islands, where in 1915 the bolls in the field were damaged from 50 to 99 per cent, and 50 to 90 per cent of the lint was entirely lost.

The cotton crop of Brazil was free from insect troubles of any kind up to 1914. During the next two years the pink bollworm was introduced by importing Egyptian cotton seed to improve the native cotton, and that great territory became at once infested permanently through an unguarded entry of nonfumigated seed from Egypt. This neglect to fumigate the imported seed cost the cotton interests of Brazil 50 per cent of the crop of 1916, and inflicts a great and permanent annual loss upon the people of that Republic. A little watchful care could have avoided this permanent damage, and an annual drain for all time could have been prevented.

Almost coincident with the Brazilian experience our neighbor across the Rio Grande became the victim of a similar trouble, and the infested Laguna district, near San Pedro, in Mexico, presents an acute and alarming situation to the cotton producers of the United States. From this Mexican source we are in the greatest peril, and we may well be excited, for the most inveterate foe to our cotton industries ever known is conveniently located right at our unprotected gate and ready to attack us at any time.

The cotton-growing areas of Asia, Africa, Japan, Ceylon, Straits Settlements, the Philippine and Hawaiian Islands, Brazil, and Mexico are now infested by the pink bollworm, and their cotton production has been largely destroyed.

Only the United States is free from this tenacious and terrible insect scourge. And, Mr. Speaker, the emergency is upon us, and we must be moving to save our most extensive and prolific cotton territory of all the world for our own welfare, and to meet the necessities of humanity.

With countless millions of this Pectinophora gossypiella just across the Rio Grande, and our unprotected border open to the innumerable army, our fate is a foregone conclusion unless we take prompt and effective action to save our inestimable values.

The pink bollworm meets no present opposition and if not prevented will surely establish its permanent quarters in our cottonseed receptacles, where it can hibernate indefinitely to suit its own convenience. It will not be long until we will hear the lamentations and mourning if we are not up and doing at once. Indeed, we are not sure but that the first contingent of the enemy has already arrived.

It is known that hundreds of carloads of nonfumigated seed from this infested Laguna district of Mexico have been delivered to the seed houses and oil mills of as many as 10 Texas localities during the last season.

To be exact, the authentic figures of the Entomological Bureau of the Department of Agriculture make a total of 446 carloads, and distributed as follows:

Beaumont Cotton Oil Co., Beaumont, 114 carloads.

Kaufman Cotton Oil Co., Kaufman, 69 carloads.
Planters Cotton Oil Co., Hearne, 93 carloads.
Texas Refining Cotton Oil Co., San Antonio, 30 carloads.
Magnolia Cotton Oil Co., Houston, 41 carloads.
Planters Cotton Oil Co., Dallas, 15 carloads.
Landa Cotton Oil Co., New Braunfels, 48 carloads.
R. Morgan Cotton Oil Co., Grandview, 25 carloads.
Charles Dubose, Alice, 10 carloads.
Hunt County Oil Co., Wolf City, one carload.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a most frightful situation, and we could face no greater adversity than is immediately threatened.

If the pink bollworm joins forces with the Mexican boll weevil, the days of King Cotton will, in all probability, be numbered for the now favored cotton interests of the United States.

If to the ravages of the wet-weather scourge of the summer and fall—the boll weevil—be added that of the perennial pest—the pink bollworm—that incubates and feeds in safety the year around, and both of them absolutely and exclusively dependent on the cotton plant and its products for existence, the destruction is bound to be so momentous that there will be no profitable remnant, and the cotton culture must be greatly reduced or possibly abandoned altogether. Mr. Speaker, we can scarcely conceive of so universal a calamity. If the national exchequer be deprived of this tremendous revenue and mankind be shorn of the raw material that guarantees us low cost and the most available clothing universally enjoyed, to say nothing of the wonderful food products so extensively used, and the gun-cotton demand for the present war, the extreme condition would be appalling indeed. Of course the crucial emergency must be met and met right away.

The first step to be taken in the campaign against the pink bollworm is to be able to recognize the insect in all its stages of existence. For this purpose we have descriptive matter not merely enough but ample and extensive. There is no practical value, however, to be gained in a discussion involving the mass of technical terms peculiar and interesting only to the scientist. But we have all the needed points to enable the ordinary grower of cotton to detect at any stage the presence of the destroyer.

There are four stages of development that cover the incubation, growth, and maturity of the pink bollworm. First, the ovum or egg; second, the pupa or chrysalis; third, the larva or caterpillar; and, fourth, the butterfly or moth.

The characteristic markings can be discerned by the practical field man aided by the common lens or reading glass.

First. The minute eggs, though visible, are not readily detected by the naked eye. The eggshell is a pearly white; when newly laid it has a greenish tint; at its maturity, just before hatching, its color is reddish.

Second. If within or about the boll, on the stalk, or in the ginhouse, a small lepidopterous or four-winged pupa be found, and it is shown under the lens to be clothed with a short pubescent or hairy growth and has a short upturned hook at the tail it is very likely to be the pink bollworm in its earliest active vitality.

Third. If inside the cotton boll or in the stored cotton seed a very small white or pinkish caterpillar be detected, with a brown head, and the mandibles or jaws have four teeth, and the crotches on the abdominal legs form a semicircle, opening outward, it will very probably prove to be the larva stage of the pink bollworm.

Fourth. If a small dark brown moth be captured in the cotton field or cotton house, with its fore wings pointed and its hind wings broad and sinuated, or wavy below the tip, and with long curved palpi or feelers, and long stiff hairs on the first joint of the feelers, it is nearly certain to be the adult of the Pectinaphora gossypiella—the moth stages of the dreaded pink bollworm.

If greater detail be desired than the showing observed under the pocket lens, the most elaborate minutiæ can be obtained from the exhaustive research set forth in scientific publications and quite visible under the microscope. But, as remarked, there is but small practical value to be derived from the mass of technical knowledge that interests the ultra scientific student exclusively.

But, Mr. Speaker, the habits of the pink bollworm give even a more ready means of recognizing its presence.

The very small eggs—difficult to find without the aid of the lens—are to be looked for singly or in groups anywhere on the green boll, even in the flower. Usually, however, they are laid at the apex of the boll and in the lines that mark the sectional divisions. As many as 20 eggs may sometimes be found on one of these nesting bolls. The egg hatches in from 4 to 12 days after it is laid.

The larva when hatched is quite small and has a brown head. It tunnels into the boll under or close to the eggshell and begins to feed at once on the tenderest tissues. The young grub is easily overlooked when the boll is opened, but the small entrance hole and the empty eggshell are reliable signs of infection, and the diminutive worm will be revealed within the boll. The larva feeds exclusively on the inside of the boll and does not eat the leaves or shoots. It is only in its last larval stages that it assumes the strong pink color that gives it the name of pink bollworm. It has then matured for the next stage of its growing existence and spins the tough, dirty-brown silk envelope for the cocoon.

This cocoon, or chrysalis, from which goes the winged moth, is always spun next to the inside wall of the boll, through which a hole is bored to accommodate the escape into the outside world of the full-grown moth.

The larval stage from the hatching of the egg to the spinning of the cocoon takes 20 or 30 days in the summer. During cold weather or abnormally dry weather the larval term may be much extended.

The small imago, or moth, hides during the day on the ground under stones or brush, sometimes burying itself in the soil. Its wings are substantial, but the moth is very sluggish and does not usually extend its flight beyond the nearest cotton bolls for copulation and egg laying and then to die. Its flying activity is from 6 to 8 p. m. The entire life from hatching to the next egg laying is usually 40 to 50 days in summer, but it is longer in winter. The moth avoids the light, and its activity is at dusk from 6 to 8 p. m., as remarked. Its small size and inconspicuous color makes it troublesome to capture.

It is perfectly obvious that the perils of this pink boll worm menace demands the concentrated energies of the people and their governments to stay the threatened stroke of agricultural and economic paralysis.

The dangers are not disputed; in fact, the people most immediately concerned are wide awake and on the verge of panic.

The most absorbing question is as to the campaign methods—how and where and when and what to do.

At the present juncture, with our territory almost, if not entirely free from the devouring foe to our peace and welfare, most assuredly the course to be pursued is one of prevention. The old adage, which must stand forever as the axiom of common sense, "an ounce of prevention is better than a pound of cure," is the incontrovertible logic of the hour.

The cotton planter of every rank and station must be rallied to a proper conception of the danger that harasses his means of making a living.

To this end all the agitators for the good of the order must be brought into action to study the pest from every angle so that its instant recognition may put into instant play every possible means of defense.

First of all, the cotton grower, the sentinel of the farm, should with the keenest vigilance capture every suspicious specimen of egg or worm or chrysalis or moth that haunts the cotton seed or lurks about the growing cotton. And he should, with lens in hand, determine for himself the nature and character of the captive.

If at all doubtful, he has the able and interested and powerful Bureau of Entomology of the United States Department of Agriculture to whom to appeal for any information or instruction need at any time and on any insect question. Let me insist, Mr. Speaker, that any unknown or suspicious sample of a possible enemy to plant life or of plant products should be immediately submitted for solution to the Bureau of Entomology, Department of Agriculture, Washington, D. C., with the request to be advised fully in the premises. This is a most important point, Mr. Speaker, and it is especially urged upon the attention of our cotton growers who may not be well posted as to their public servants and their right of appeal to them. Any Member of Congress will gladly cooperate with any citizen of any district.

With such widespread study as the situation demands in full swing throughout the cotton districts of the United States we are in a position to understand how difficult it is to destroy or exterminate the pink bollworm when once it is established. The fearful fact is that it has never been done, and the rational conclusion is that it is an impossibility except by complete segregation from an infected point or district or country that famine may starve the life that must have access to the cotton plant, its sole dependence for food.

In so far as the moth and its ability to contaminate goes, the sluggish wings are in our favor. The fly wings its way over but short distances from plant to plant, hence the spread by the incubating moth is limited and slow. Of course, the fatal fly is liable to the accident of being carried to a virgin field on the green stalk so often handed about between neighborhood planters or in the transportation of seed. In this way its spread may be facilitated from farm to farm or from one community to another, or from county to county; otherwise the natural advance is slow, because of the sluggishness natural to the moth.

But to us, Mr. Speaker, our great awakening must be as to the attitudes and action of our Governments. If our State authorities and the National Government are up in arms and eager to cope with this fell destroyer of the fleecy staple, our continued blessings are assured. If, on the other hand, the State and Nation are slothful and indifferent, the doom of cotton agriculture is already sounded and the marvelous fabric of universal and low-cost clothing is gone from the people of the earth.

Of all the States, Mr. Speaker, the State of Texas is infinitely the most important to enlist in the pink bollworm crusade. Its frontier is in touch with the boundaries of infected Mexico, and her domain is immediately in danger from the voracious myriads of the swarming Laguna district.

If the 446 carloads of nonfumigated seed that have been distributed over Texas from the devastated Province of the Laguna land have planted the fateful germs in any one of the importing localities, the State and interstate powers should be at once invoked to prevent any further damage. The State authorities should act for the State within its confines by a determined policy, as sweeping and dogmatic as martial law, to save its people from being despoiled by an enemy as stealthy and fatal as the assassin's dagger, and as inconquerable as the white plague.

County should quarantine against county, and any poisoned territory should instantly submit to the heroic treatment of an absolute barricade against cotton planting for the period known to guarantee the extermination of of the pest within the inoculated area.

If Texas becomes a noxious zone, the character of the campaign becomes at once interstate, and the cooperation between interested States must involve the processes of mutuality that usually dominate with the State authorities. One thing is certain and that is that the cotton interests of the respective States will inaugurate whatever available means of protection seems most advisable and efficient, for the cotton planter, if possible, must and shall be protected.

It remains, however, to understand that the bulwark of efficient defense lies with the United States Government.

Of course the individual cotton grower and the cotton interests collectively are indispenable in whatever way the popular will may be expressed to inaugurate and to sustain the war upon the pink bollworm. And the power of the State is necessary, in every interstate sense, to contribute to the limit in the desperate struggle forced upon us to save from utter destruction our most remunerative and useful product of the soil.

But the strong arm of the National Government is essential and must be invoked to deliver us from the insidious and overwhelming calamity that will inevitably consume the substance of the cotton farmer, sure to undermine the prosperity of the cotton States, and bound to cut enormously into the wealth of the Nation.

The immediate demand is for adequate defense against the contagions of the Mexican pink bollworm cancer of the Laguna territory. Primarily and fundamentally this phase of the pink bollworm trouble is most important and requires the national attention, for the cooperation of the two Republics is in every way advisable.

There is but one way to stop the slow but sure march of the pest over the cotton fields, and that is to stop all cotton culture in a territory wide enough to make it certain that the moth will not pass the strip so sentenced by governmental authority.

To meet this unavoidable measure of defense for the great general common weal, the local interests will have to be satisfied in some equitable way. It is not proposed to override the property rights of the citizen in any ruthless proceeding, but some fair compensatory and lawful treatment can meet the emergency and overcome the difficulty. It may be only necessary to reimburse the cotton growers by the loss sustained in excess of the cotton-crop value over the value of the substituted crop. And it is possible there may be no such excess to lose, but whatever the monetary cost it can not even remotely approximately the loss to result from the pink-bollworm invasion and occupation of the fields of cotton-growing States. But, regardless of our ability to make any equitable arrangements with the cotton growers of the cotton free zone, self-preservation demands that this cotton free zone must be established and maintained, which will require the cooperative action of State and Federal Government.

Mr. Speaker, to satisfy the crucial demand, to relieve anxiety for the economic standing of the cotton States, and to conserve the national wealth, our Texas authorities and the Federal power should combine against this desperate pink-bollworm evil.

Texas is invested with constitutional rights to deal as she may within her boundaries, and I doubt not that she will do her full duty to defend and protect her citizens. It is an act of self-defense and justifiable to prevent shipment from Mexico to Texas and such an act will prove wise and proper, but must be done by and through national authority. Texas can take any measure to restrict and defend one point of the State from an infected locality within its borders, and doubtless all its prerogatives to that end, if needed, will be exercised.

It may be the thing, and the imperative thing, for the State to condemn a zone on the Texas side of the Rio Grande as forbidden ground to any kind of cotton culture. That would be effective against Mexico and would probably protect the State from that direction, and a close embargo by the United States Government on the importation of cotton products from any foreign country infested with the pink bollworm into any of our cotton-producing States would very likely insure our Commonwealth from the pink bollworm affliction.

A zone destitute of cotton growth is free from the Pectinophora gossypiella, because the wretched insect will starve before it will feed on anything less tempting than our valuable cloth-producing fiber, and our rich, nut-flavored seed kernel that gives the world its finest and most abundant sweet olive oil is toothsome to the worm.

The pink bollworm lives and moves and has its being only down where the cotton grows. Any territory devoid of the cotton plant is impossible to the pest, that exists exclusively on the cotton boll and its products.

Such a zone, Mr. Speaker, established along the Mexican border would sacrifice no soil adapted to cotton culture except on the extreme southern valley of the Rio Grande, and in that favored stretch the defenses of natural segregation and isolation may guard all insect approaches. That particular part of the valley is naturally located for its own security. Yet we should take no chances, but establish the cotton free zone the entire length of Texas and then some.

The northern end of the boundary along the river for hundreds of miles is subject to easy quarantine, because the soil of that upper valley is not at all adapted to the growth of cotton, and no sacrifice would be imposed if it were so designated and condemned. I take it that no valuable property rights would be sacrificed to establish this zone of defense, which would not in all probability be opposed.

But the Government of the United States must be the dependable guaranty for our permanent cotton prosperity.

Even the determination of the boundary zone between the United States and Mexico will assume more importance and be more respected and stronger if it is negotiated and provided through the efforts of the Federal Government.

The amenities supposed to prevail between Texas and the General Government should be observed that mutual good will may cement the bonds of mutual interest.

And Mexico as an interested party would feel more inclined and better satisfied with the understanding that Texas was consulted and agreeable to any transaction concluded between the two Republics.

Mr. Speaker, the best zone to be preferred is one involving both Mexican and Texas territory. It is one that would set apart a strip of land on the Mexican side and a similar strip on the Texas side to run to the mouth of the river and to be pledged by treaty to remain sterile and barren against the growth of every species of cotton.

Of course, that would have to be an international transaction and accord with international law, but reciprocal advantages of one kind or another would probably inspire and actuate such a result and prove a stepping-stone to the relations of comity and good will that should by all means knit the destinies of two such unavoidably close neighbors.

That we may have the most certain and adequate facilities it is in contemplation to introduce a bill in Congress to appropriate sufficiently to cover the costs of inaugurating and sustaining the most efficient warfare against this pink-bollworm curse.

Whatever the necessary cost and however great the care and trouble incident to such defensive activity we are bound to assume the responsibility, for a satisfactory result will be worth all its legitimate cost and more.

In Texas alone the preservation of its 4,000,000 bales of cotton at present prices equals $500,000,000, and the usual destruction of 50 per cent means a dead loss to the people of $250,000,000. An estimate for the United States would be very conservative if based on a crop of 12,000,000 bales, and would figure for the American people of the United States the stupendous annual sacrifice of $750,000,000—enough to equip an army.

It is perfectly apparent that we can not afford to stickle on cost or trouble if we would save our country from the awful catastrophe to be precipitated upon us if we fail to grasp the true import and urgency of the situation.

Indeed, Mr. Speaker, we may well consider the policy and provision to close our ports to the world against the importation of cotton seed of any kind from any land. We can not entertain any risk that would cut from our hold our incalculably great money crop—the only soil product that equates as a bank check the world over, and as ready current exchange at any time.

And there is no part of the habitable globe that can afford to ignore this great, common concern of mankind.

Bryan Approves Wilson's Reply.

OF

HON. PAT HARRISON,

OF MISSISSIPPI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, September 1, 1917.

Mr. HARRISON of Mississippi. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a part of the speech of William J. Bryan before the University Club yesterday at Chicago:

BRYAN APPROVES WILSON'S REPLY TO PEACE NOTE.

CHICAGO, August 31.

His opinion of the President's note was given by William Jennings Bryan at the University Club to-day. "The President has presented a powerful indictment of the German Government," he said. "I insist it is the duty of every citizen to support his Government in any act the Government takes. Ours is the best Government in the world; it is a people's Government and the Government speaks for the people.

"The alternative is anarchy, the substitution of the individual's opinion for his Government's decision."

And also the following article, entitled "We must win," from the Commoner of July, 1917:

We must win. Defeat is inconceivable; it would be indescribably unfortunate if it were possible. We can not allow any foreign nation to determine the destiny of the United States—especially a nation committed, as Germany is, to arbitrary government and militarism.

Neither can we afford to have our allies overcome—that would bring upon us the disasters of defeat or the burden of carrying on the war alone.

We are in the war by the action of Congress—the only body authorized to take the Nation into war. The quickest way to peace is to go straight through supporting the Government in all it undertakes, no matter how long the war lasts or how much it costs.

We must win.

Any discord or division, after the Government has acted, would prolong the war and increase its cost in money and men.

W. J. BRYAN.

Fraternal Beneficiary Insurance and the War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIS C. HAWLEY,

OF OREGON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

Mr. HAWLEY. Mr. Speaker, a fraternal beneficiary society collects from its members the amounts necessary to make good the policies issued to them. It eliminates the element of profit. The rates are therefore calculated upon healthful lives, having the usual expectancy of life, and engaged in vocations incurring only normal hazards. Members engaging in extrahazardous vocations are charged an additional rate sufficient to cover the hazard assumed. Persons engaged in certain ordinary vocations classed as of unusual hazard are not admitted.

Soldiers incur of necessity dangers of a most unusual character. Being young men, they hold membership in the fraternal beneficiary societies in large numbers. The service they render is of universal benefit to our country. The pay they receive is much less than that gained in the usual occupations of life. For these and other reasons it seems just that the protection taken out by them for the benefit of persons dependent upon them should be continued at the normal rate at least. Patriotism is a universal obligation, and the burdens arising out of it should be borne by all and not entailed upon those only who go to the front offering the last full measure of devotion.

Societies recognizing this obligation are worthy of honorable mention in the public records. The Woodmen of the World, of Denver, Colo., has taken the action indicated in the following telegrams:

DENVER, COLO., April 6, 1917.

Hon. W. C. HAWLEY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.:

War has been declared. Many of our members have already enlisted. Others will probably do so. Our law requires that all members enlisting in Army, Navy, or Marines shall pay 35 cents extra on each thousand or certificate will be scaled to 80 per cent of face value. As a patriotic and fraternal measure, I am in favor of waiving that requirement. It has been done twice before and approved. It should be done again. Camps are requesting it. What do you recommend?

I. I. BOAK, Head Consul.

I immediately telegraphed the following reply:

Recommend that members in service of the United States during present war be kept in good standing without payment of extra amount, agreeing with your suggestion.

W. C. HAWLEY, Head Manager.

Rates must be fixed according to ascertained standards and hazards, but the patriotism of the society has always led the membership as a whole to assume the war hazard.

Mr. Boak, the chief executive officer of the society, is also the president of the National Fraternal Congress of America and is one of the committee recently appointed by Secretary McAdoo to prepare a system for war insurance for all soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States, and his recommendation is based upon a long and successful experience as a recognized authority in fraternal beneficiary protection or insurance.

The City of Washington.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. BEN JOHNSON,

OF KENTUCKY.

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, September 4, 1917.

Mr. JOHNSON of Kentucky. Mr. Speaker: Washington never has been, and is not now the Capital of the United States. Instead, the District of Columbia is the Capital of the United States.

Neither has the city of Washington ever had any legally defined limits. The generally accepted belief is that Florida Avenue, the course of which is almost a semi-circle, is its northern boundary. There never has been any legislative action by which that boundary was established. Neither any maximum nor any minimum limit to its size ever has been legally fixed. It may have been no larger than a city block, or it may have been as large as all the United States.

Congress, having been bandied around like a shuttlecock from place to place, in 1783 commenced seriously to consider a permanent seat of government.

At that time New York offered the town of Kingston for such a purpose. Shortly thereafter Maryland offered Annapolis, together with $180,000; the latter being offered as an additional inducement for the location of the Capital at that place. These offers gave rise to much discussion and concern as to the size of the proposed seat of government, until Congress, on October 6, 1783, resolved to select a site in one of the then existing States located not farther north than New Jersey. At that time New Jersey and Maryland became the principal contenders for the seat of government; but no final choice was made. A committee was appointed to examine the proposed site near the falls of the Delaware, in the vicinity of Trenton; and, shortly thereafter, another committee was appointed to examine and report upon a location near the lower falls of the Potomac. It was decided that, until a site was chosen, Congress should meet alternately at Trenton and Annapolis. Soon this was found to be useless as well as quite inconvenient.

The first commission which was appointed for the purpose of making a selection of a site reported in favor of the proposed one on the Delaware, and against the one on the Potomac.

During all the early discussions of the matter a "Territory" or "District" of only 2 or 3 miles square seems to have been preferred. However, the Constitution of the United States came along and provided that the Territory or District to be selected as "a permanent seat of government" should not exceed 10 miles square. That same provision of the Constitution (Art. I, sec. 8) also provided that whenever such Territory or District had been selected, and had been accepted by the Congress, that it should "* * * become the seat of the government of the United States."

Maryland, Pennsylvania and Virginia offered sites of 10 miles square. Virginia accompanied her offer by a proposition to give $120,000, and Maryland $72,000. Petitions also were sent to Congress from several cities in New Jersey, Pennsylvania and Maryland, each seeking to be selected as the National Capital.

The District of Columbia was acquired under authority of an act of Congress dated July 16, 1790; which act also declared that that District should be the "permanent seat of government of the United States." That act provided that the District should be located on the Potomac River, at some space between the mouths of the Eastern Branch and Conogocheague, to be selected and laid off, by metes and bounds, by three commissioners to be appointed by the President of the United States.

On January 22, 1791, President Washington appointed Thomas Johnson and Daniel Carroll, of Maryland, and David Stuart, of Virginia, the three members of the commission to lay off the District, in accordance with the terms of the act of July preceding. Two days thereafter the President directed this commission to lay off the said District by commencing at the mouth of Hunting Creek, on the Virginia side of the river, notwithstanding the fact that that point was far below the mouth of the Eastern Branch; and therefore, not within the territorial limit fixed by Congress.

On March 3, 1791 Congress approved this change in location which President Washington arbitrarily had made, but provided that the public buildings should be erected on the Maryland side of the Potomac River.

At the time this commission was appointed by the President Mr. Carroll was a Member of the lower House in Congress from Maryland, and he, for the time being, declined to act as one of the commissioners. In consequence the District was laid off by Johnson and Stuart.

President Washington arrived at Georgetown on the evening of March 28, 1791 from Philadelphia. The next afternoon a number of farmers who owned land lying on the eastern side of the Potomac, and north of the Eastern Branch, met President Washington at Georgetown and proposed to him that, in consideration of the great benefits they would derive from having a city laid off upon their lands, they would donate part of their lands for that purpose. Although he was without authority in the premises, the President then and there accepted the proposition, but limited his acceptance of it to 19 farmers, whose holdings amounted to about 6,100 acres.

The conveyances made by those 19 farmers were not made to Johnson, Carroll and Stuart, who were the legally appointed commissioners to lay off the District; but they were made to Thomas Beall, of George, and John M. Gantt, as trustees of their own selection, but whose selection was agreed to by George Washington. The agreement to convey was executed the following day; and the formal deed of conveyance to Beall and Gantt, as trustees, was made on June 29, 1791.

Thus it will be seen that the owners of the land did not convey to the commissioners appointed by George Washington to lay off the District; but to Beall and Gantt, who, also, had no statutory authority or direction whatever for laying off a city. The conveyances which the 19 farmers made provided that when their lands had been laid off that every other lot should be conveyed to the commissioners appointed by virtue of the act of July 16, 1790 for the use of the United States; but no such conveyance ever was made.

It is quite clear that neither the President of the United States nor the commission which he appointed in compliance with the act of July 16, 1790, was authorized to lay out a city. The President had no authority in the premises beyond the appointment of a commission; and that commission had no authority other than to survey and, by proper metes and bounds, define such District, and to acquire such quantity of land, within the said District, as the President should deem proper for the use of the United States, and to provide suitable buildings within that District for the accommodation of Congress, the President and the public offices of the Government of the United States.

Under the act of July 16, 1790, Philadelphia was to be the temporary seat of government until December, 1800, at which time "the seat of government of the United States was to be removed to the said District."

No particular part, or subdivision, of the District to which the Federal offices and property of the United States were to be removed was designated in the authorizing act. For all intents and purposes of the act all of the District was as good as any lesser part of it.

The first charter of the city of Washington was granted May 3, 1802. Therefore, approximately 11 years elapsed between the time when the 19 farmers conveyed to Beall and Gantt, as trustees, before the city of Washington ever was incorporated or legally named.

The commission composed of Johnson, Stuart and Carroll had legal authority and direction to lay off the District, not exceeding 10 miles square, by metes and bounds, to acquire sufficient land upon which to erect suitable buildings for the accommodation of the President, the Congress and the several departments of government; but their authority ceased with that. They did not have authority to give a name to that District or to any subdivision of it. Notwithstanding their lack of authority, on September 9, 1791, they addressed a communication to Maj. L'Enfant, in which they said:

> We have agreed to call the 10 miles square "the Territory of Columbia" and the Federal city the "city of Washington."

In that communication they also directed L'Enfant to make "a map of the city of Washington in the Territory of Columbia." They had no more authority to name the District, or any subdivision of it, than any other persons in the whole United States had.

Until the act of May 3, 1802, that which by common consent was called the city of Washington, had neither a legal name nor a legal existence as a municipality. By the act of May 3, 1802 "* * * the inhabitants of the city of Washington were constituted a body politic and corporate, by the name of a mayor, and a council of the city of Washington, and by their corporate name, may sue and be sued, and so forth * * *"; but no territorial limits for the city of Washington were fixed either by that act, by any prior one or by any subsequent one.

That charter was granted for a term of two years, or to the end of the next session of Congress thereafter, and no longer.

The next legislation upon the subject is found in the act of February 24, 1804, by which the charter of 1802 was continued "for and during a term of 15 years, from the end of the next session of Congress." However, on May 4, 1812, five years before the previous charter expired, Congress adopted an act which continued the charter, but changed the incorporated name of the city by providing "that the said corporation (Washington) shall in future be named and styled 'the Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council of the City of Washington.'"

Therefore, those who now contend that the city still exists under its old name of "Washington" should be frank enough to concede that the incorporated city of that name went out of existence in 1812, and was succeeded by the new municipality of "The Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council of the City of Washington." There is no subsequent act of Congress restoring the city to the name of "Washington" which, by uncertain implication only, was given to it in the act of 1802.

The next act of Congress upon the subject was that of February 28, 1820, whereby the charter was "extended to the 3d day of March, 1821, unless sooner repealed." Under the terms of that act the name given to the municipality by the act of 1812 was not changed, and that name was "The Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council of the City of Washington."

The next act upon the subject was that of May 15, 1820, which repealed the former charter and all amendments thereto, and reincorporated the municipality by a charter entirely new.

Section 2 of the act of 1820 reads:

> And be it further enacted, That the inhabitants of the city of Washington shall continue to be a body politic and corporate, by the name of the "Mayor, Board of Aldermen and Board of Common Council of the city of Washington."

The concluding section of that act reads:

> And be it further enacted, That this act shall continue in force for and during the term of 20 years, and until Congress shall, by law, determine otherwise.

At the end of 20 years Congress took no action concerning the charter of the city.

But the next act thereafter pertaining to the subject was approved May 17, 1848, by which the name of the municipality, "The Mayor, the board of aldermen and board of common council of the city of Washington," was continued, and the charter again extended for another term of 20 years, or until Congress should determine otherwise.

The next act relating to the subject was that of May 16, 1868, the first section of which refers to the charter granted May 17, 1848, and continues that act "in force for the term of one year from the date thereof, or until Congress shall, by law, determine otherwise.

Please note that through all these acts after 1812 the simple name of "Washington" for the city was never restored; but, instead, the corporate name of the municipality was "The Mayor, board of aldermen and board of common council of the City of Washington."

The next act bearing upon the name and legal existence of the city is the one of April 7, 1869. That act is a short one, seven or eight lines, and repeals all except sections 1 and 6 of the act passed by Congress on May 16, 1868, which became law, without the President's signature, on May 28, 1868. Section 1 of that act, which section was not repealed, continued the name of the municipality as "Mayor, board of aldermen and board of common council of the city of Washington," and extended the charter for another year, or until Congress should, by law, otherwise determine. Section 6 of that act, which section also was not repealed, related solely to the elective franchise.

Therefore, the corporate name of the municipality to that time continued to be "The Mayor, board of aldermen and board of common council of the city of Washington."

In many instances it seems that, for brevity's sake or out of ignorance, the municipality frequently was referred to, even in acts of Congress, merely as "The City of Washington"; although the statutes are explicit in declaring that the corporate name of the municipality from May 4, 1812, until May 15, 1820, was "The Mayor, Aldermen and Common Council of the city of Washington"; and from May 15, 1820 to February 21, 1871, it was "The Mayor, board of aldermen and board of common council of the city of Washington."

The act of July 16, 1790 declared the District of Columbia, and not any lesser portion of it, (after December 1800) to be "the permanent seat of the Government of the United States."

The act of June 11, 1878, which frequently is dignified by being called the "organic act," starts out by saying:—

That all the territory ceded by the State of Maryland to the Congress of the United States for the permanent seat of the Government of the United States shall continue to be designated as the District of Columbia.

There, again, we find the District of Columbia, by act of Congress, designated and continued not only as the seat of government but as the permanent seat of the Government.

The municipality commonly designated as the city of Washington was first chartered for a term of only 2 years; then for another term of 15 years; then for another term of 2 years; then for another term of 20 years; then for another term of 20 years; then for another term of 1 year, and then for a term of another year.

The act of July 16, 1790 provided for "a permanent seat of government." That permanency is found in all the acts after that which relate to the District of Columbia, but is not found at all as it relates to the city of Washington, because its charter was first given for a term of two years, and thereafter was continued for short terms until 1871 when, in so many words, it was repealed and the District of Columbia declared to be the successor of Washington, Georgetown and the Levy Court.

If there is a city of Washington, as the word "city" is understood:—

(a) Where are its legally fixed territorial boundaries?

(b) Where is its municipal government, and what are the functions of that government?

(c) Who are its municipal officers?

What has been urged contra merely proves, either that there is a post office of "Washington," or that there is a locality known as "Washington," such as the locality of Brightwood, of Brookland, of Potomac Park, of the Mall, or of Anacostia, all in the District of Columbia, without proving at all that there is in existence a municipal corporation or "city" in the legal sense of the word "city."

Upon the other hand when we come to treat of the District of Columbia we know its legally fixed boundaries; we know who its officials are; we know its powers and privileges; and, with positive certainty, we know the acts which fix and provide for them.

Those who platted the old city of Washington did not plat north of Florida Avenue, although they had as much authority to plat north of it as they had to plat south of it, and they had no statutory direction or authority to do either.

If only 18 of the farmers instead of the 19 had conveyed to Beall and Gantt, as trustees, then, of necessity, they would have platted south of Florida Avenue. While, upon the other hand, if 20 instead of 19 had so conveyed they might have platted north of Florida Avenue; and so on and on, as there was no limit upon either their will or inclination in doing that which was neither directed nor prohibited by law.

This brings us up to the act of February 21, 1871, the purpose and effect of which was to repeal completely the three existing municipalities in the District of Columbia, one of which was called Washington, and create the one municipality of the District of Columbia instead of three; and, at the same time, to create the erstwhile Shepherd régime, which proved to be so infamous that it was abolished by the act of June 20, 1874.

The act of February 21, 1871, did away with the legal existence of Washington, Georgetown and the Levy Court just as completely and effectively as the act of June 20, 1874, did away with the Shepherd government; and, in its stead, created temporarily the commission form of government for the whole District of Columbia, which form was made permanent by the act of June 11, 1878, which frequently is called the "organic act."

While there can not be any reasonable ground for argument about the matter; yet, to argue with the unreasonable, it well may be said that if the act of 1871 creating the Shepherd government did not do away with the three municipalities of Washington, Georgetown and the Levy Court completely, then the acts of 1874 and 1878 which established the present commission form of government for the District of Columbia did so most certainly.

But, aside from the construction of that statute at this late day, there followed close upon its enactment an object lesson of construction, which even the blind might see. That object lesson was the retirement of the mayor of Washington to private life; the adjournment forever of its city council; the surrender by the treasurer of its finances; the delivery of all its books, accounts and property of every description to the succeeding Shepherd government; the transfer of authority over the police and fire departments; the construction under one Board of Public Works of streets and roads in the entire District, including the old cities of Washington and Georgetown.

Yet section 40 of that very act of 1871 has been cited for the purpose of making plausible the futile argument that the city of Washington still is in existence.

That section, for the purpose of this address, may well be divided into two parts:—

First: Where it says:—

Be it further enacted, That the charters of the cities of Washington and Georgetown shall be repealed on and after the 1st day of June A. D., 1871, and all offices of said corporations abolished at that date; * * *;

And, second: Where it says:—

And that portion of said District included within the present limits of the city of Washington shall continue to be known as the city of Washington; and that portion of the said District included within the limits of the city of Georgetown shall continue to be known as the city of Georgetown; and the legislative assembly shall have power to levy a special tax upon property, except the property of the Government of the United States, within the city of Washington for the payment of the debts of said city; and upon property, except the property of the Government of the United States, within the limits of the city of Georgetown for the payment of the debts of said city; * * *.

Under the first quotation the charters of the cities of Washington and Georgetown unquestionably were repealed after June 1, 1871, and all the offices and legal functions of those two corporations were abolished at that date.

The second quotation authorizes a special tax levy within the limits of the old city of Washington, and also within the limits of the old city of Georgetown, for the payment of the debts of each of said cities; and it seems clear, even beyond dispute, that the use of the name of the old city of Washington and the use of the name of the old city of Georgetown was made solely for the purposes of description, in order to define where special taxes might be levied, so that they might not be levied upon that part of the District of Columbia lying outside those two old cities.

The limits of the old city of Georgetown were established by charter granted by the British Crown in 1750. As no limits, by metes and bounds or otherwise, for the old city of Washington had ever been fixed by statute its commonly accepted boundaries were used, together with the name—Washington—as descriptive only of a portion of the District of Columbia where special taxes might be levied.

There are many instances in the statutes pertaining to District legislation which did the same thing. For instance, section 5 of this same act reads as follows:

That legislative power and authority in said District shall be vested in a legislative assembly as hereinafter provided. The assembly shall consist of a council and house of delegates. The council shall consist of 11 members, of whom 2 shall be residents of the city of Georgetown, and 2 residents of the county outside the cities of Washington and Georgetown, who shall be appointed by the President, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, * * *

Again, section 37, of the same act reads:

That there shall be in the District of Columbia a board of public works, to consist of the governor, who shall be president of said board; four persons to be appointed by the President of the United States, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate, one of whom shall be a civil engineer, and the others citizens and residents of the District, having the qualifications of an elector therein; one of said board shall be a citizen and resident of Georgetown, and one of said board shall be a citizen and resident of the county outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown. * * *

Thus it will be seen that section 5 provided that two members of the council of the District of Columbia should reside in the city of Georgetown, and two in the county outside of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, leaving seven to be selected from the city of Washington, the charter and legal existence of which is specifically repealed in the self-same act.

The two localities, Washington and Georgetown, in that section evidently were used for descriptive purposes only, and not for the purpose of contradicting the plain and explicit repeal of their legal existence, which was one of the two main objects of the act; the other being the establishment of a new form of government.

Referring to the board of public works, section 37 of the same act provided that one member thereof should be a citizen and resident of Georgetown, and another should be a citizen and resident of the county outside the cities of Washington and Georgetown, leaving the remaining two to be selected from the city of Washington. There, again, the two localities were used only for describing in which part of the thereby newly created municipality of the District of Columbia the members of the board of public works should reside.

The same purpose of description is followed in section 41 of the same act, which reads as follows:

* * * No taxes for general purposes shall hereafter be assessed by the municipal authorities of the cities of Washington or Georgetown, or by said Levy Court. And upon the repeal of the charters of the cities of Washington and Georgetown, the District of Columbia be, and is hereby, declared to be the successor of said corporations, and all the property of said corporation and of the county of Washington, shall become vested in the said District of Columbia, and all fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures, which are now by law made payable to said cities, respectively, or said Levy Court, shall be paid to said District of Columbia * * *.

Could anything be more conclusive than that the above language positively, certainly, emphatically and entirely did away with the city of Washington, the city of Georgetown and the Levy Court, except for purposes of description?

Recently, with much show of teeth towards me, there appeared in the Washington Times an article written by one Leaky Bill Price, wherein he advanced two alleged arguments for the purpose of showing that there still exists a city of Washington.

He used as one of his alleged arguments a quotation from the act of February 2, 1895. The other is, that the Postmaster General has designated Washington as a post office.

The quotation from the act of 1895, used by Leaky Bill in his newspaper article, reads as follows:

That from and after the passage of this act all that part of the District of Columbia embraced within the bounds and now constituting the city of Georgetown, as referred to in said acts of February 21, 1871, and June 20, 1874, shall no longer be known by the name and title in law of the city of Georgetown, but the same shall be known as and shall constitute a part of the city of Washington, the Federal Capital.

I wish to invite your attention to that part of the act just read which says:

* * * shall no longer be known by the name and title in law of the city of Georgetown * * *.

Whoever wrote the act of 1895, just referred to, seems to have known that there was an act passed by Congress on February 21, 1871, relative to the cities of Georgetown and Washington; but it is quite clear that he was ignorant of the fact that that act repealed the charter of Georgetown; and that after June 1, 1871 there was no city in the District of Columbia—

* * * known by the name and title in law of the city of Georgetown * * *.

Again, Leaky Bill insists that there still is a city of Washington, notwithstanding the act of February 21, 1871 declares the District of Columbia—

* * * to be the successor of said corporations, (Washington and Georgetown) and all property of said corporations, and of the county of Washington, shall become vested in the said District of Columbia, and all fines, penalties, costs, and forfeitures, which are now by law made payable to said cities, respectively, or said Levy Court, shall be paid to said District of Columbia * * *.

It was not the purpose of the act of 1895 either to incorporate or to re-incorporate either the city of Washington or Georgetown. Its purpose was to rename the streets, and change the numbers of the squares in the old city of Georgetown, so that they would conform in name and number to the streets and squares in the old city of Washington.

Nevertheless Leaky Bill is of the opinion, and urges his opinion upon the readers of the Washington Times, that the adding of the defunct city of Washington to the defunct city of Georgetown was a legal rehabilitation of the old city of Washington.

It is the old case of "Nothing, plus nothing, equals nothing."

Leaky Bill argues that still there is a city of Washington because the Postmaster General recognizes such a city for postal matters.

The Postmaster General may establish post offices at will, and give them such names as he chooses. However, nobody except Leaky Bill will contend that the Postmaster General, by establishing post offices and giving them names, thereby can create county seats, State capitals and a seat of government for the National Government.

Last, but not least, some little consideration should be given to the Constitution of the United States in determining whether the city of Washington or the District of Columbia is the seat of government.

We find in that Constitution the following language:

The Congress shall have power * * * to exercise exclusive legislation in all cases whatsover, over such District (not exceeding 10 miles square) as may by cession of the particular States, and the acceptance of Congress, become the seat of Government of the United States.

There, quite clearly, it is shown that the framers of the Constitution made the whole District, and not any minor part of it, the seat of government of the United States, Leaky Bill to the contrary notwithsanding.

In conclusion I repeat my opening sentence: Washington never has been, and is not now the Capital of the United States; but, instead, the District of Columbia is the Capital.

Champ Clark's Speech on Monmouth Courthouse Battle Field.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOSEPH J. RUSSELL,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, September 5, 1917.

Mr. RUSSELL. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by the Speaker of this House at the Monmouth Courthouse Battle Field last Monday.

The speech is as follows:

[Excerpt from Champ Clark's speech on Monmouth Courthouse Battle Field, Monday, Sept. 3, 1917.]

Mr. CLARK said in part:

"It is a great, a glorious thing to be an American citizen; greater than it was to be a Roman citizen when Rome was mistress of the world, which the Romans claimed was greater than to be a king. Our Government should be so conducted that the sentence 'I am an American' would have more potency the wide world round than the far-famed 'Romanus sum,' when Rome was in the plenitude of imperial power. I think sometimes that we do not sufficiently appreciate the blessings of our system of government. We too frequently take it for granted that achieving freedom was natural and inevitable in the evolution of things, and therefore easy. As a matter of fact, the men who proclaimed our independence at Philadelphia, July 4, 1776, performed that immortal deed with halters about their necks—as did Washington and his men who made Jefferson's declaration good on Yorktown's blood-stained heights.

"When they had signed, old Ben Franklin, the greatest wit of that age—perhaps the greatest wit of all the ages—cheered up his companions in glory by remarking: 'Now that we have signed, we must all hang together or we will all hang separately'—a statement as true as the Gospel. I wish that he could return to earth for at least one night to some great city—New York, Philadelphia, St. Louis, Kansas City, San Francisco—and learn what his experiment with the kite has done for the happiness and comfort of mankind.

"Gov. Ben Harrison, of Virginia, a great big, burly man, punched little Elbridge Gerry of Massachusetts, who weighed less than 100 pounds, in the ribs, saying: 'When the day of hanging comes, I will have one great advantage over you. My weight will make me die quicker.' That was the spirit in which they signed; and that should be the spirit in which we live.

"When Charles Carroll, of Maryland, signed, somebody suggested to him that there were so many Charles Carrolls in Maryland that when the day for hanging came he might escape in the multitude of his namesakes, whereupon he seized the pen and wrote after his name the words 'of Carrollton,' so that there could be no mistaking the right person.

"When as a child I first saw his name at the foot of the Declaration, 'Charles Carroll, of Carrollton,' I thought it was done out of overweaning vanity of family pride; but ever since I learned the truth about it I have loved the man and his memory. God spared him to be the last of that noble band to ascend to the skies.

"John Hancock, who held the office then that I hold now, signed his name in characters so large that 'signing your John Hancock' has become proverbial. He said, 'I guess King George III can read that without his spectacles.'

"I consider it among the blessings of my life, which have been rich and numberless, that when I was a lad attending Kentucky University one of my teachers was Prof. Joseph Desha Pickett, born and bred in old Virginia, a cousin to that Gen. Pickett who achieved immortal renown at Gettysburg. When Prof. Pickett was a young man he traveled a good deal in Europe and was thrown much into the company of an English duchess. When they came to separate, she said, 'Prof. Pickett. I am astonished at your politeness, seeing that you come from a country where they have no queen.' The old Virginian, bowing almost to the ground, replied, 'Your Grace is mistaken. You live in a country where they have one queen; I come from a country where every woman is a queen.'

"Just after the close of the war between the States Admiral Farragut made the circle of the globe in his flagship. In every civilized country he was received with the honors due to a hero, which he was. When he was cruising in the Ægean Sea he sent word to the Sultan of Turkey that he wanted to call on him to pay his respects. The Sultan sent him word back that no battleship except one commanded by a prince of the blood royal could enter the Dardanelles. This made Admiral Farragut's Tennessee fighting blood boil, and he promptly sent this message to the Sultan, 'I have on board my ship 700 American citizens, every one of whom is a prince of the blood royal in his own land. I am stripping my ship for action and will call on you immediately in force.' Suffice it to say, he had no trouble anchoring in the Golden Horn.

"I will tell you how I feel about being an American. A few years ago a party of Americans were traveling in the Old World. They had a boy with them about 12 years old. In the Pyramids of Egypt he was weary and fell asleep. A wag thought he would have some fun out of him, so he surrounded him with grinning mummies of dead Pharaohs and blew a horn in immitation of Gabriel's trumpet. The boy waked up, didn't know where he was, but swung his cap over his head and shouted, 'Hurrah! It is Resurrection Day and an American is the first man up.' In very truth we are the heirs of all the ages. Splendidly does Emerson say:

"We live in a new and exceptional age. America is another word for opportunity. Our entire history appears to be a last effort of Divine Providence in behalf of the human race.

"The men who under Washington rendered famous forever this and other hard-fought fields reddened and enriched by their blood builded more wisely than they knew. They understood precisely what they were fighting for—the precious right to govern themselves; but, not being prophets, they never dreamed that in 1917 their immortal leader would be universally accounted the foremost man in the entire history of the human race and that the tiny Republic which he and his brave followers created would be the mightiest Nation on the globe. As a human-interest story the plain, unadorned history of the United States exceeds in gripping power any novel or romance ever written. The men who fought and bled and died on this field and other fields from Lexington to Yorktown never dreamed that the American idea of self-government would, like the leaven spoken of in the Bible, do its perfect work until the whole lump of humanity is leavened with the spirit of liberty.

"We are prone to boast of our colossal wealth, of our vast physical resources, of our tremendous banks, of our broad acres, and other like things. These things are good within themselves, universally coveted by the children of men, but they do not within themselves constitute a great nation. Scores and scores of years ago Sir William Jones propounded a far-resounding question and, evidently fearing that nobody else would do the subject justice, answered it himself:

"What constitutes a State?
Not high-raised battlements or labored mound,
Thick walls or moated gate;
Not cities proud with spires and turrets crowned;
Not bays and broad-armed ports,
Where, laughing at the storm, rich navies ride;
Not starred and spangled courts,
Where low-browed baseness wafts perfume to pride;
No! Men! High-minded men! Men who their duties know,
But know their rights, and, knowing, dare maintain.
These constitute a State!

"Such men as fought about Monmouth Courthouse on the 28th of June, 1778, 'the hottest day since men learned to read thermometers,' according to Sir George Otto Trevelyan, historian of the American Revolution; such men as constitute the armies we are now raising for the most stupendous of all wars. We have not degenerated into a race of mollycoddles, as certain pessimists claim—a fact which will be clearly demonstrated in the immediate future. A finer body of young men never went forth to battle than our soldiers now 'swiftly forming in the ranks of war.'

"In this supreme crisis of our affairs—not of ours alone but of the whole world's affairs—it is the duty of every American, male or female, native or naturalized, to support, aid, and sustain the Government in every manner possible—mentally, morally, physically, financially. That is the plain, imperative duty we owe to our ancestors, to ourselves, and above all to our posterity. From time immemorial orators, philosophers, statesmen, and poets have exalted patriotism as the sublimest virtue. Centuries ago Horace sang, 'Dulce et decorum pro patria mori' ('It is sweet and glorious to die for one's country'). However that may be, it is sweet and glorious to live and work for one's country, and we can all do that much. We can not in good conscience do less. I beg to suggest that patriotism does not consist entirely in public speeches, braying bands, flag-bedecked parades, and vociferous asseverations of love of country, but genuine patriotism consists in being a thoroughgoing American citizen, discharging all the various duties of citizenship every day of the 365, thereby showing forth the blessings and glories of our free and beneficent institutions to all the world. That is the real way for any of us to prove our patriotism, for it is written—

"By their fruits ye shall know them.

"A few days since President Wilson published by far the strongest, the clearest, the most far-resounding of his State papers, stating in extenso his views on peace proposals. He is of right the mouthpiece, the spokesman of this mighty people, and his statement has been read of all men and will be read forever and forever.

"I now and here state our case in the fewest words possible: No nation will long endure or deserves to endure that does not protect all of its citizens wherever they may be, by land or sea."

Patriotism.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD W. POU,

OF NORTH CAROLINA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 6, 1917.

Mr. POU. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include a speech delivered by Ex-Senator Pritchard upon the question of patriotism and the duty of the American citizen in this hour.

The speech is as follows:

THE HOUR AND THE DUTY.

I esteem it an honor to have the privilege of addressing this representative audience composed of the citizens of Wake County. It is peculiarly fitting that these exercises should be held on Labor Day and under the joint auspices of the Wake County Council of Defense and the labor organizations of the city. We are here to do honor to the 304 selected men who have enlisted for service in the most gigantic military struggle the world has ever witnessed. In this connection I deem it appropriate to say that the laboring men of the Nation have always been true and loyal to our Government, and have borne its burdens on many bloody battle fields where the Stars and Stripes have triumphed and our heroes have won imperishable fame. Labor and capital appreciate now perhaps more than ever before the importance of living under a Government strong enough to protect human life and property rights in any emergency that may arise. I can not resist the temptation to discuss briefly the relation the citizen sustains to our Government, and the importance of such relation to the general welfare of the American people.

We can not ignore the fact that during the past few years there have been many evidences of unrest and an inclination on the part of many to oppose what may be properly termed "duly constituted authority." This in the main is due to a failure on the part of parents to give their children proper training at a time when their minds are in a formative state and when they may be easily taught the importance of becoming useful and patriotic citizens.

Under a republican form of government like ours those who maintain and support it are recruited from the home. Therefore the maintenance and perpetuation of our Government and its institutions depend largely upon the character of the home. Many of our parents fail to appreciate the responsibility that rests upon them as respects this vital question. "A stream can rise no higher than its source" and a government no higher than the plane of its citizenship. Therefore it is important that a parent should exercise the greatest care in training his boy for the performance of the duties that must necessarily in the near future devolve upon him as a citizen of this country. The parent who enjoys all the rights, privileges, and immunities of the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof for his well-being and protection owes to his country the duty of rearing his sons so that they may grow up to be useful, God-fearing, and patriotic citizens. The disposition to violate the law grows out of an improper regard for the constituted authorities of the State and the Nation.

We are now engaged in a conflict which from the very nature of things must eventually affect the welfare of every civilized nation of the world. It should be constantly borne in mind that this is not a war of our choosing, and that it was with deep regret that we were finally impelled to take the step which imposed upon us as a Nation the obligation to aid in the rescue of those who are being destroyed by the most brutal and inhuman methods ever resorted to by any race of men from the dawn of creation until this good hour.

Many reasons have been assigned in support of the action of Congress and the President. Some say that it is our purpose to make democracy safe for the world, others that it is to wipe out Prussianism and militarism, and still others that it is to avenge the wrongs committed against Belgium by the Imperial German Government. All must admit that the President displayed great patience and forbearance before final action was taken. He employed all legitimate means within his power in an honest effort to keep the American people out of this awful conflict. Indeed, there were many well-meaning people in both political parties who criticized the President for not taking definite action sooner than he did.

Now that we are face to face with the stern realities of war and the direful consequences that must come to those involved, we can all the more appreciate the feelings which actuated the President in endeavoring to avoid, if possible, the necessity of calling upon the young manhood of America to take up arms in defense of what all fair-minded people must admit is a just cause. While it is true that there was strong opposition in the ranks of both political parties to a declaration of war, after Congress acted the President had, and now has, the unanimous support of every patriotic American, regardless of his political or religious views. Therefore, in so far as this war is concerned, we are neither Democrats nor Republicans, but American citizens. This is the spirit which flashed from the lips of Patrick Henry in the Continental Congress, when he said, "I am not a Virginian, but an American."

This is not the war of any individual, but it is a war in which every American who has red blood in his veins and who honestly desires to safeguard his own Government should be interested, and he should be willing to support it with the same zeal and courage which actuated Washington and other Revolutionary heroes when the foundations of our Government were being made secure. An overwhelming majority of the representatives of both political parties in Congress are to-day standing like a stone wall behind the Government, doing everything in their power to secure the enactment of any legislation that may be necessary for the successful conduct of the war.

It is with pride that we point to the fact that the American people have never failed to support their Government in the past, and those who attempt in this trying hour, by any means whatsoever, to embarrass the Government in its efforts to bring this war to a successful termination, should, if their conduct warrants it, be indicted, and if convicted their punishment should be such as to warn all slackers that their presence is a menace to the welfare of this country. It is high time that this issue should be so clearly drawn that no one, however indifferent he may be, could possibly misunderstand the attitude of our Government. As our distinguished governor recently said in a speech delivered at Asheville, there was a time when the question as to the propriety of declaring war against Germany was debatable one, but that day is past, and further discussion of the question is extremely harmful and should not be tolerated.

The whole world is overshadowed with gloom, and our own land is saddened in consequence of the fact that our brave boys are called upon to engage in this terrible conflict for the purpose of protecting American rights and rendering aid to suffering humanity. Notwithstanding this condition, there are some who are doing all in their power to embarrass the President in his efforts to bring the war to a successful termination.

The only way to successfully meet those who are disloyal is to instill in the minds of the people lessons of patriotism and devotion to America and her institutions. Let us, therefore, cultivate a spirit of patriotism and respect for the majesty of the Constitution and the laws passed in pursuance thereof.

The disposition in certain quarters to denounce the courts and criticize those who are charged with the administration of the law has a tendency to weaken the faith of the people in the stability of our Government. Notwithstanding the critical condition of the affairs of the Nation at this time, some have dared even to go so far as to unjustly criticise the President, and in the past this same class of people have impugned the motives of the Supreme Court—the highest court in the land—the last resort of the people.

This sentiment has been nurtured and developed by the demagogue who is willing to assail the very foundation of the Government in order that he may succeed in his political aspirations. The courts are not above legitimate criticism, and when a judge acts improperly he should be criticised, and if his conduct warrants it, he should be impeached, but there should be no wholesale denunciation of the courts, and those who attempt by such methods to bring discredit upon any branch of the Government should be taught by the American people that the doctrines which they teach can never flourish on American soil.

The late ex-President Cleveland, in an address delivered at Princeton, September 19, 1901, in referring to the death of the lamented McKinley, said:

> There is a serious lesson for us all in the tragedy of our late President's death. The shock of it is so great that it is hard at this time to read the lesson calmly. We can hardly fail to see, however, behind the bloody deed of the assassin, the horrible faces and figures from which it will not do to turn away. If we are to escape further attack upon our peace and security we must boldly and resolutely grapple with the monster of anarchy. It is a thing that we can not safely leave to be dealt with by party or partisanship. Nothing can guarantee us against its menace except the teaching and practice of the best citizenship; the exposure of the ends and aims of the gospel of discontent and hatred of social order and the brave enactment and execution of repressive laws.

These are words of wisdom, spoken by one of the greatest statesmen of his age, and the lesson which he sought to teach should be constantly borne in mind by every patriotic citizen. This is, indeed, a land of liberty, but it is not a land of license, and the sooner the lawless classes understand the true situation the better it will be for all parties concerned. The individual who believes in dynamite rather than reason and who is willing to resort to unlawful methods to further his ends, and is not willing to support his Government under any and all circumstances, should find no welcome in this free land of ours. The enemies of this country and the demagogue have much in common, and the one is as dangerous as the other, and each should be spurned by the American people.

I do not wish to be understood as intimating that an appreciable number of North Carolinians are unfaithful to the Government at this time. I believe that North Carolina in this struggle will do her full duty, and after the final muster roll is made up we will find that we have sent as many soldiers to the front in proportion to our population as any State in the Union.

Now that we have entered the war, the sole and only question to be considered is as to the best possible methods to be employed in order that we may bring success to America and her allies.

I do not deem it necessary to enter into a discussion of the merits of any controversy that may have existed anterior to the declaration of war further than to say that I consider any one of the following reasons sufficient ground upon which to base our action: (a) Our duty to uphold the neutrality of Belgium under a treaty to which we are a party; (b) to resent the unwarranted interference with our rights as a Nation upon the high seas; (c) to take active and effective steps to suppress what may be properly termed the most brutal and uncivilized slaughter of human beings that has ever been known in the history of the world; (d) to secure at the end of the hostilities, by the concerted action of all the nations of the world, a permanent peace by the creation of a board of arbitration to which all matters in controversy in the future between nations may be submitted and amicably adjusted without the destruction of property or the loss of human life.

We can maintain either one of these grounds without violating the principles of Christianity. This is the spirit which prompts the Nation to call her splendid young manhood to arms in order that we may demonstrate to the world that our Government is founded upon the principles of justice and righteousness, which are as permanent as the rock of Gibraltar.

Long anterior to the declaration of war against Germany, and at a time when we were observing strict neutrality as a Nation, a warning was issued purporting to come from a representative of the Imperial German Government and published in the leading newspapers of this country in which it was boldly stated that if any Americans should attempt to cross the Atlantic upon the Lusitania they would do so at their own peril. That this warning emanated from the German Government is clearly established by the fact that the Lusitania, with all of her human freight, consisting in part of men, women, and little children, who were born on American soil, and therefore entitled to the fullest protection of this Government, was, without warning to such citizens or giving them an opportunity to escape, sent to the bottom of the ocean by a German submarine. The sinking of that ill-fated vessel in defiance of every principle of international law and the rules of civilized warfare was sufficient within itself to justify the American Government in declaring war against Germany.

When we contemplate the destruction of human life and property by Germany and her allies in France, and the consequent privation and suffering of her people at this time, we are forcefully reminded of the timely and effective service France rendered this country when our existence as a nation was trembling in the balance. Under these circumstances anyone with a spark of gratitude in his soul must admit that it is our bounden duty to go to the rescue of the descendants of Lafayette and Rochambeau and the other gallant sons of France who left their native land and joined with the American forces in our struggle to become a free and independent people. If no other reason existed, this alone would amply justify us in sending all the men and money necessary to drive the invader from French soil and restore to the people of that unhappy land the territory which has been so unjustly taken from them by methods heretofore unknown in warfare among civilized people.

In condemning the Kaiser and his associates I do not wish to be understood as impugning in the slightest degree the loyalty and patriotism of the Germans who are residents of this country, feeling as I do that with few exceptions they are just as loyal to this country as those of us who are native born.

It is not our purpose in entering this contest to demand indemnity or to acquire a foot of territory by conquest. Such has always been our policy. The great domain which we possess came to us not through bloody conquest nor by the violation of the rights of another nation. The policy of this country in its war against Spain is the most conspicuous example of the generous treatment of one nation by another, under similar circumstances, in the history of the world.

We not only purchased and paid for the Philippine Islands, but gave them schools, churches, modern methods of sanitation, and, indeed, everything necessary to encourage the moral and intellectual development of the people of those islands, and now after the lapse of a comparatively short time they are as free as the people of the United States. The same policy was adopted as respects Cuba and Porto Rico, with the result that the people of each of those countries are living together in peace and happiness and making rapid development in everything that tends toward a higher civilization, and it is in harmony with this well-established policy that we extend a helping hand to our allies across the sea.

The conduct of Germany threatens not only the existence of good government in Europe but, if by any chance they should win, it will in the near future result in the overthrow of representative government on every part of the globe, including the Government under which we live. It has been well said that "Eternal vigilance is the price of liberty." May I not paraphrase this statement by saying that eternal vigilance on our part is necessary to insure the continued safety of our own Government? With this end in view we should at all times in the future maintain a trained force sufficient to command the respect of the other nations of the earth and as a guaranty that no nation will ever have the audacity to even attempt to violate the rights of the American people.

The cruel and heartless treatment of those who have been so unfortunate as to fall into the hands of the German soldiers clearly indicates the spirit which actuates them in the war which they are waging for the purpose of dominating the people of every nation on the face of the earth. Existing conditions are such as to arouse the spirit of intense patriotism in the breast of every citizen of this country, and this should not abate until we wipe from every inch of soil now occupied by the Germans the last vestige of military oppression. It has always been the policy of America to do everything in her power to aid the oppressed of other lands, and by so doing we have not only gained prestige abroad but have greatly strengthened our own Government.

If as a result of this conflict a republican form of government for the people of Germany should be established, it would be hailed with delight by everyone who has the slightest interest in the progress and development of the human race; but, as I understand, it was not our purpose in entering this conflict to force the people of that country to adopt any particular form of government, our real purpose being, as the President has so ably said—

> To deliver the free people of the world from the menace and actual power of a vast military establishment controlled by an irresponsible Government, which, having secretly planned to dominate the world, proceeded to carry the plan out without regard either to the sacred obligations of treaty or the long-established practices and long-cherished principles of international action and honor; which chose its own time for the war; delivered its blow fiercely and suddenly; stopped at no barrier either of law or mercy; swept a whole continent within the tide of blood—not the blood of soldiers only but the blood of innocent women and children and of the helpless poor.

Many people have an exaggerated idea as to the number of killed and wounded in this war. In this connection I will say that my distinguished friend, Hon. James H. Pou, of this city, has rendered the State and the Nation a splendid service by showing that the percentage is not near so great as we have been led to believe by the reports that have been sent out indiscriminately through the press. Indeed, some people seem to take peculiar pleasure in circulating reports calculated to discourage the American soldiers and our people generally.

Now, a word as to those who will be permitted to stay at home and pursue their daily vocations, which involves an overwhelming majority of our people. While those of us who fall within the exempted class are to enjoy this privilege, there are many things that we can do to aid our Government in the Herculean task that it has undertaken.

We should at all times act in harmony with the policy of our President as respects the conservation of foodstuffs and other things essential to the support of the Government and the forces in the field.

The generous conduct of our good women in the preparation of articles necessary to the comfort of the sick and wounded challenges the admiration of everyone who loves his country. The Red Cross is doing most effective work in sending those things that are essential to the welfare and comfort of those who may be sick and wounded on foreign soil, and, best of all, they are sending angels of mercy in the person of nurses who go as our representatives to minister to the wants of our brave boys. This should appeal directly to the heart of every human being who possesses that generous instinct that has always characterized the American people in the face of every great calamity.

Our hearts are filled with sadness when we realize that our dear boys will soon be called upon to fight on foreign soil, but I confidently believe that we will receive good reports from them; that they will make a record as soldiers that will challenge the admiration of the world. I trust that our young men will not forget that the most important thing in life is to maintain a good character under any and all circumstances, and I confidently believe that the conduct of our boys while abroad will be such as to develop those traits essential to true manhood.

The American soldier has never turned his back to any foe, and I verily believe that the indomitable courage and will power which has always characterized our boys will soon bring this war to a speedy termination. When the descendants of those who fought with Grant, Sheridan, Lee, Jackson, Wheeler, and Shafter touch elbows, inspired by the strains of Yankee Doodle and Dixie, with anything like a fair opportunity to show what the American soldier can do, the Kaiser and those who are really in sympathy with him will rue the day they conceived the plan of dominating the world by brute force.

After the awful struggle is over and our boys are permitted to return to their native land we want them to know that their services will be recognized by the American people and that they will be largely instrumental in shaping the future destiny of this country.

The American flag and the many things that it stands for should be their constant thought. Let them cherish this glorious emblem of our liberty, to which Dr. Edward Everett Hale has so beautifully referred in the following language:

> And for your country, boy, and for that flag, never dream but of serving her as she bids you. No matter what happens to you, no matter who flatters you or abuses you, never look at another flag. Remember, that behind all these men you have to do with, behind officers, and Government, and people even, there is the country herself, your country, and that you belong to her as you do belong to your own mother. Stand by her as you would stand by your own mother.

Physical Culture.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. HORATIO C. CLAYPOOL,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 7, 1917.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, my mind has been deeply impressed for a long time by the necessity for some governmental action designed to encourage and establish the practice of physical culture among the citizenship of this country. The appalling condition, disclosed by the recent physical examinations of the young men of our Nation before the exemption boards has sent a thrill of alarm and a sense of profound concern into the heart of every thinking and loyal citizen. The question naturally arises within the mind of every serious man, What practical thing can be done to decrease the percentage of physical deficients and raise the standard of physical efficiency among the men of our Nation?

You will agree with me that there is overwhelming evidence that the people of this Nation are living in profound ignorance of the vital and imperative necessity of training their bodies with the same care and thoroughness as they do their minds. "Cram the mind, though the body be crippled," has been the abiding practice of our people so long that when the hour of great necessity arises, when the moment of peril is upon us, and the things that are more priceless to us than our lives are in jeopardy and the cry of a ruthless enemy is heard at our gates, and the Nation turns with confidence to the surging millions of its citizens for defenders, an amazing host is found nervous, timid, uncertain, doubtful, hesitant, and with waning and depleted vitality. Well might we hang our heads in shame at the exhibition, and doubly so, because in all the wonderful achievements of this peerless Nation it has neglected the apparent and imperative duty of training its citizenship in the necessity of physical culture.

It is easy for a healthy man to be courageous, hopeful, optimistic, and enthusiastic, and it is easy for a sick man to be a coward. If the resplendent glory of this Nation is to remain unsullied, it will be because of the devotion, courage, masterfulness, resourcefulness, and physical vigor of its citizens.

With a profound conviction of the integrity of these sentiments I this day introduce in the House of Representatives a bill to provide for the promotion of physical culture, to provide for the cooperation with the States in the preparation of teachers of physical culture, and to appropriate money to defray the expenses of the same and regulate its expenditure, and earnestly urge its adoption.

This bill provides for a Federal board for physical culture, having supreme supervision and control over the training, tests, experiments, studies, exercises, investigations, and reports to aid in the organization and conduct of physical education. It also makes provision for a State board in each State of the Union to act in cooperation with the said Federal board, and also makes provision for ample appropriations by Nation and States to secure the proper training and maintenance of a force of teachers, supervisors, or directors of physical culture. Ample safeguards are thrown around the provisions covering the disbursements of the funds, and, in addition, the bill provides a method of supreme importance in determining the best system of physical culture available, evidenced by the results of carefully conducted training tests.

The adoption of this bill will secure to the people of this Nation an opportunity of conveniently and inexpensively securing training and an education in physical culture.

Join this opportunity and great privilege with a campaign of education, thereby placing in the possession of the people the unmistakable evidences of the Nation's weakness and I am confident the people in a large measure will seize the benefits thereby provided with eagerness, with the result that each succeeding year an ever-increasing number will be found in the ranks of the vigorous and strong.

The tremendous necessity of enlightening the people concerning the peril to the Nation through the physical weakness of its people must not be overlooked. The Nation looks through the eyes of its people and is strong and courageous and victorious because these qualities are the characteristics of its people.

The bulldog tenacity which plays such a part in every life worth while has a physical basis.

The will power, which is a leader in the mental kingdom, depends very largely upon the health.

How different obstacles, for example, look to the man who is ailing all the time, suffering pain, compared with the way they look to a man who is full of vigor and energy.

The man who is well plans great things to-day, because he feels strong and vigorous. Obstacles are nothing to him, because he feels within himself the power to annihilate them. One's courage is largely a matter of physical health. Courage and physical vigor go together.

The quality of health has a great deal to do with the quality of thought. If the vitality is below par, the thought will drop to its level.

Suppose some great genius should declare to the world that he had discovered a secret for doubling one's vitality and energy, what would we not all do or give to get this secret! Yet within our reach is a process for doubling our vitality and energy which never fails. There is nothing complicated in it—the commonsense practice of physical culture, which enables us to hold the victorious attitude toward life, toward our work, toward our health, toward everything.

While I believe that the people have in a large measure through ignorance neglected the requirements of their physical systems and have thereby endangered the security of the Nation, I do not believe that they will continue in that neglect and prolong this danger when they are once enlightened.

War Powers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY J. STEELE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, September 10, 1917.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I include an address of former Justice Charles E. Hughes before the American Bar Association on Wednesday last on the subject of war powers, and an address of Mr. Sutherland at the same time.

The addresses are as follows:

ADDRESS OF HON. CHARLES E. HUGHES.

THE FIGHTING POWERS OF THE UNITED STATES UNDER THE CONSTITUTION.

In the unusual circumstances of war it is natural that there should be some confusion with respect to the constitutional warrant for extraordinary action taken or contemplated. Some altogether misconceive the Constitution. Others vaguely fear that we are serving temporary exigency at the expense of our fundamental law, and that we are thus breeding a lawless Constitution-ignoring spirit which is a serious menace to our future. Others seek to raise doubts of power in order to embarrass the prosecution of the war. And there seem to be still others who in their zeal impatiently and without thought put the Constitution aside as having no relation to these times.

CONSTITUTIONAL GOVERNMENT IN WAR.

While we are at war, we are not in revolution. We are making war as a Nation organized under the Constitution, from which the established national authorities derive all their powers either in war or in peace. The Constitution is as effective to-day as it ever was, and the oath to support it is just as binding. But the framers of the Constitution did not contrive an imposing spectacle of impotency. One of the objects of "a more perfect Union" was "to provide for the common defense." A nation which could not fight would be powerless to secure the "blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity." Self-preservation is the first law of national life, and the Constitution itself provides the necessary powers in order to defend and preserve the United States. Otherwise, as Mr. Justice Story said, "the country would be in danger of losing both its liberty and its sovereignty from its dread of investing the public councils with the power of defending it. It would be more willing to submit to foreign conquest than to domestic rule."

DISTRIBUTION OF POWERS.

The war powers under the Constitution are carefully distributed. To Congress is given the power "to declare war." The proposal to add "to make peace" found no favor, as this was deemed to belong to the treaty-making power vested in the President and the Senate. To the President was given the direction of war as the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. It was not in the contemplation of the Constitution that the command of forces and the conduct of campaigns should be in charge of a council or that as to this there should be a division of authority or responsibility. The prosecution of war demands in the highest degree the promptness, directness, and unity of action in military operations, which alone can proceed from the Executive. This exclusive power to command the Army and Navy and thus to direct and control campaigns exhibits not autocracy but democracy fighting effectively through its chosen instruments and in accordance with the established organic law.

PLENARY POWER TO WAGE WAR.

While the President is Commander in Chief, in the Congress resides the authority "to raise and support armies" and "to provide and maintain a navy," and "to make rules for the government and regulation of the land and naval forces," and as a safeguard against military domination the power to raise and support armies is qualified by the provision that "no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." Otherwise this power is unlimited. The Congress is to prescribe the military organization and provide the military establishment, fix numbers, regulate equipment, afford maintenance, and for these purposes appropriate such amounts of money as it thinks necessary.

POWER TO PASS CONSCRIPTION LAWS.

Upon every citizen lies the duty of aiding in the common defense. In exercising its constitutional power to raise armies the Congress may enforce this duty. The Congress may call anyone to service who is able to serve. The question who may be called or in what order is simply one for the judgment of the National Legislature. The power vested in Congress is not to raise armies simply by calling for volunteers, but to raise armies by whatever method Congress deems best, and hence must be deemed to embrace conscription. To the framers of the Constitution the draft was a familiar mode of raising armies, as it had been resorted to by the Colonies to fill up their quotas in the Revolutionary War. It is true that the proposal, in 1814, of Monroe as Secretary of War to resort to conscription, was vigorously opposed as unconstitutinal. But the draft was put in force both by the Union and by the Confederacy during the Civil War, and its validity was sustained by the courts in both North and South. "The power of coercing the citizen," said Judge Robertson, of Virginia, in Burrough v. Peyton (16 Gratt., 470 (1864)), "to render military service is indeed a transcendent power in the hands of any government; but so far from being inconsistent with liberty, it is essential to its preservation."

LINCOLN'S OPINION.

Permit me to quote upon this question the opinion prepared (although not published) by President Lincoln, which sets forth admirably the grounds for sustaining the power of Congress to pass a conscription act:

> In this case those who desire the rebellion to succeed, and others who seek reward in a different way, are very active in accommodating us with this class of arguments. They tell us the law is unconstitutional. It is the first instance, I believe, in which the power of Congress to do a thing has ever been questioned in a case when the power is given by the Constitution in express terms. Whether a power can be implied when it is not expressed has often been the subject of controversy; but this is the first case in which the degree of effrontery has been ventured upon of denying a power which is plainly and distinctly written down in the Constitution. The Constitution declares that "the Congress shall have power * * * to raise and support armies; but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years." The whole scope of the conscription act is "to raise and support armies." There is nothing else in it. * * * Do you admit that the power is given to raise and support armies, and yet insist that by this act Congress has not exercised the power in a constitutional mode, has not done the thing in the right way? Who is to judge of this? The Constitution gives Congress the power, but it does not prescribe the mode, or expressly declare who shall prescribe it. In such case Congress must prescribe the mode or relinquish the power. There is no alternative. * * * The power is given fully, completely, unconditionally. It is not a power to raise armies if State authorities consent; nor if the men to compose the armies are entirely willing; but it is a power to raise and support armies given to Congress by the Constitution without an "if." * * * The principle of the draft, which simply is involuntary or enforced service, is not new. It has been practiced in all ages of the world. It was well known to the framers of our Constitution as one of the modes of raising armies, at the time they placed in that instrument the provision that "the Congress shall have power to raise and support armies." * * * Wherein is the peculiar hardship now? Shall we shrink from the necessary means to maintain our free government which our grandfathers employed to establish it and our own fathers have already employed once to maintain it? Are we degenerate? Has the manhood of the race run out?

These are the words of Lincoln, penned in the midst of the Civil War, in which conscription was enforced, and his reasoning is conclusive. And while the question was not presented to the United States Supreme Court, the power of Congress was explicitly recognized in Tarble's case (13 Wall., p. 407, and in later opinions).

CONSCIENTIOUS OBJECTORS.

The constitutional authority thus vested in Congress is not limited by any qualification arising from religious beliefs or conscientious objections. These are matters not affecting power, but policy. As Mr. Justice Harlan said, in delivering the opinion of the Supreme Court in Jacobson v. Massachusetts (197 U. S., p. 29), one "may be compelled, by force, if need be, against his will and without regard to his personal wishes or his pecuniary interests, or even his religious or political convictions, to take his place in the ranks of the army of his country, and risk the chance of being shot down in its defense." It is, however, in my judgment, a sound policy on the part of Congress to provide for the discharge from the draft of conscientious objectors. Nothing, I believe, is gained for the country by overriding the claims of conscience in such cases; but it is obviously necessary that there should be such definitions and restrictions as will prevent imposture and evasion by those who have as little conscience as they have stomach for war.

THIRTEENTH AMENDMENT.

It is now contended in some quarters that this power, which undoubtedly Congress had, has been restricted or abolished by the thirteenth amendment, which was adopted after the close of the Civil War. This amendment provides that "Neither slavery nor involuntary servitude, except as a punishment for crime whereof the party shall have been duly convicted, shall exist within the United States or any place subject to their jurisdiction." It has been said by the United States Supreme Court that the plain intention "was to abolish slavery of whatever name and form and all its badges and incidents; to render impossible any state of bondage; to make labor free by prohibiting that control by which the personal service of one man is disposed of or coerced for another's benefit, which is the essence of involuntary servitude." It hits not only slavery but peonage. But the language of the amendment was not new. It reproduced the historic words of the ordinance of 1787 for the government of the Northwest Territory, and its terms, construed in the light of its history and plain purpose, afford no basis whatever for the conclusion that it interfered in the slightest degree with the power of Congress to raise and support armies.

In the case of Robertson v. Baldwin (165 U. S., p. 275) it was argued that the thirteenth amendment invalidated certain provisions of the Revised Statutes authorizing justices of the peace to issue warrants for deserting seamen. In denying the claim the court said: "It is clear, however, that the amendment was not intended to introduce any novel doctrine with respect to certain descriptions of service which have always been treated as exceptions, such as military and naval enlistments." The soldier drafted under the act of Congress is performing the duty which he owes of aiding in the common defense, and the constitutional amendment contemplates no escape from the duty to defend and preserve the United States.

POWER OVER THE MILITIA.

The power to "raise and support armies" should not be confused with the power given to Congress "to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions"; and "to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." The President is Commander in Chief not only of "the Army and Navy of the United States" but also "of the militia of the several States when called into the actual service of the United States."

The militia, within the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution, is distinct from the Army of the United States. "Remember always," said Daniel Webster, "that the great principle of the Constitution on that subject is that the militia is the militia of the States and not of the General Government; and being thus the militia of the States, there is no part of the Constitution worded with greater care and with a more scrupulous jealousy than that which grants and limits the power of Congress over it."

In order to execute the laws of the Union, to suppress insurrection, and to repel invasions it would be necessary to employ Regular troops or to employ the militia. And the power given to Congress with respect to the militia was manifestly to make a large standing army unnecessary. But as the service of the Organized Militia can only be required by the National Government for the limited purposes specified in the Constitution, it follows (as Attorney General Wickersham advised President Taft) that the Organized Militia, as such, can not be employed for offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States.

MAY SEND ARMY ABROAD.

This, however, is apart from the power of Congress to raise and support a Federal army. Congress may be content with a small standing army in ordinary times, but Congress may create and equip such army as it pleases, subject to the qualification with respect to appropriations. It can equip an army in preparation for war, and of course it may furnish whatever army is required for the prosecution of war. The organization and service of an army raised by Congress are not subject to the limitations governing its control of the militia. The power to use an army is coextensive with the power to make war; and the army may be used wherever the war is carried on, here or elsewhere. There is no limitation upon the authority of Congress to create an army, and it is for the President as Commander in Chief to direct the campaign of that army wherever he may think they should be carried on. As Chief Justice Taney, speaking for the Supreme Court in Fleming v. Page (9 How., p. 615), said:

As Commander in Chief he is authorized to direct the movements of the naval and military forces placed by law at his command, and to employ them in the manner he may deem most effectual to harass and conquer and subdue the enemy. He may invade the hostile country and subject it to the sovereignty and authority of the United States.

We employed our arms in Canada in the War of 1812; our troops were again sent to foreign soil in the Mexican War and in the War with Spain, and more recently have been employed in China and Mexico. There is no doubt of the constitutional authority to employ our forces on the battle fields of Europe in the war that we are now waging for the safety of the United States and to conquer an enduring peace that the liberties of free peoples throughout the world may forever be secured from the aggressions of unscrupulous military power.

POWER TO WAGE WAR SUCCESSFULLY.

The power to wage war is the power to wage war successfully. The framers of the Constitution were under no illusions as to war. They had emerged from a long struggle which had taught them the weakness of a mere confederation, and they had no hope that they could hold what they had won save as they established a Union which could fight with the strength of one people under one government intrusted with the common defense. In equipping the National Government with the needed authority in war they tolerated no limitations inconsistent with that object, as they realized that the very existence of the Nation might be at stake and that every resource of the people must be at command. Said Madison in the Federalist:

Security against foreign danger is one of the primitive objects of civil society. It is an avowed and essential object of the American Union. The powers requisite for attaining it must be effectually confided to the Federal councils.

And Hamilton said:

The idea of restraining the legislative authority, in the means of providing for the national defense, is one of those refinements which owe their origin to a zeal for liberty more ardent than enlightened.

He again emphasizes the same idea in these words:

The circumstances that endanger the safety of nations are infinite, and for this reason no constitutional shackles can wisely be imposed on the power to which the care of it is committed. This power ought to be coextensive with all the possible combinations of such circumstances, and ought to be under the direction of the same councils which are appointed to preside over the common defense.

It was in this view that plenary power was given to Congress to wage war and raise armies. It is also in the light of this conception of national exigencies that we must read subdivision 18 of section 8 of Article I of the Constitution (following the enumeration of powers), which gives Congress the authority "to make all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States, or in any department or officer thereof." It must also be remembered that it is of the essence of national power that where it exists it dominates. There is no room in our scheme of government for the assertion of State power in hostility to the authorized exercise of Federal power. The power of the National Government to carry on war is explicit and supreme, and the authority thus resides in Congress to make all laws which are needed for that purpose; that is, to Congress in the event of war is confided the power to enact whatever legislation is necessary to prosecute the war with vigor and success, and this power is to be exercised without impairment of the authority committed to the President as Commander in Chief to direct military operations.

POWER OF THE PRESIDENT.

Each of these powers, that of Congress and of the President, is the subject of a distinct grant; each is the complement of the other, and together they furnish the adequate equipment of authority for war. There is no more impressive spectacle than that of the President of the Republic in time of war when, in addition to the other great powers of his office, he acts in supreme command of the armed forces of the Nation and conducts its military campaigns. It was under this power that President Lincoln defended the proclamation of emancipation. It related to those held as slaves in the States in rebellion, and he regarded it, as it recited, as a necessary act of war within his authority as Commander in Chief. He thus expressed this point of view:

You say it is unconstitutional. I think differently. I think the Constitution invests the Commander in Chief with the law of war in time of war. The most that can be said—is so much—is that slaves are property. Is there—has there ever been—any question that by the law of war property, both of enemies and friends, may be taken when needed? And is it not needed whenever taking it helps us or hurts the enemy? Armies the world over destroy enemies' property when they can not use it, and even destroy their own to keep it from the enemy.

It is also to be observed that the power exercised by the President in time of war is greatly augmented, outside of his functions as Commander in Chief, through legislation of Congress increasing his administrative authority. War demands the highest degree of efficient organization, and Congress, in the nature of things, can not prescribe many important details as it legislates for the purpose of meeting the exigencies of war. Never is adaptation of legislation to practical ends so urgently required, and hence Congress naturally in very large measure confers upon the President the authority to ascertain and determine various states of fact to which legislative measures are addressed. Further, a wide range of provisions relating to the organization and government of the Army and Navy which Congress might enact if it saw fit, it authorizes the President to prescribe. The principles governing the delegation of legislative power are clear, and while they are of the utmost importance when properly applied, they are not such as to make the appropriate exercise of legislative power impracticable.

The Legislature can not delegate its power to make a law, but it can make a law to delegate a power to determine some fact or state of things upon which the law makes, or intends to make, its own action depend. To deny this would be to stop the wheels of Government. There are many things upon which wise and useful legislation must depend which can not be known to the lawmaking power, and must, therefore, be a subject of inquiry and determination outside of the halls of legislation.

Congress can not be permitted to abandon to others its proper legislative functions; but in time of war, when legislation must be adapted to many situations of the utmost complexity, which must be dealt with effectively and promptly, there is special need for flexibility and for every resource of practicality; and, of course, whether the limits of permissible delegation are in any case overstepped always remains a judicial question. We thus not only find these great war powers conferred upon the Congress and the President, respectively, but also a vast increase of administrative authority through legislative action springing from the necessities of war.

OTHER PROVISIONS OF THE CONSTITUTION—TAXING POWER.

The question remains: What may be deemed to be the force and effect in time of war of the restrictive provisions contained in the Constitution with respect to the exercise of Federal authority? It is manifest, at once, that the great organs of the National Government retain and perform their functions as the Constitution prescribes. Senators and Representatives are qualified and chosen as provided in the Constitution, and the legislative power vested in the Congress must be exercised in the required manner. The President is still the constitutional Executive, elected in the manner provided and subject to the restraints imposed upon his office. The judicial power of the United States continues to be vested in one Supreme Court and such inferior courts as Congress has ordained. Again, apart from the provisions fixing the framework of the Government, there are limitations which by reason of their express terms or by necessary implication must be regarded as applicable as well in war as in peace. Thus one of the expressed objects of the power granted to Congress "to lay and collect taxes, duties, imposts, and excises" is to "provide for the common defense," and it can not be doubted that taxes laid for this purpose—that is, to support the Army and Navy and to provide means for military operations—must be laid subject to the constitutional restrictions. That is, all duties, imposts, and excises must be uniform throughout the United States, and direct taxes must be apportioned among the States according to population. And by the sixteenth amendment, providing that income taxes, from whatever source derived, may be laid without apportionment among the States, these taxes fall into the great class of excise duties and imposts and are alike subject to the rule requiring geographical uniformity, a requirement operative in war as well as in peace.

TREASON.

The provisions as to treason are also clearly applicable in war: "Treason against the United States shall consist only in levying war against them or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort"; and "the Congress shall have power to declare the punishment of treason, but no attainder of treason shall work corruption of blood or forfeiture except during the life of the person attainted."

FIFTH AND SIXTH AMENDMENTS.

But what shall be said of the efficacy in time of war of the great guaranties of personal and property rights? It would be impossible on this occasion to discuss comprehensively this important subject or even to refer to all these guaranties, but we may briefly touch upon the question in its relation to the fifth and sixth amendments, viz:

No person shall be held to answer for a capital or otherwise infamous crime unless on a presentment or indictment of a grand jury, except in cases arising in the land or naval forces, or in the militia, when in actual service in time of war or public danger; nor shall any person be subject for the same offense to be twice put in jeopardy of life or limb; nor shall be compelled in any criminal case to be a witness against himself, nor be deprived of life, liberty, or property without due process of law; nor shall private property be taken for public use without just compensation.

In all criminal prosecutions the accused shall enjoy the right to a speedy and public trial by an impartial jury of the State and district wherein the crime shall have been committed, which district shall have been previously ascertained by law, and to be informed of the nature and cause of the accusation; to be confronted with the witnesses against him; to have compulsory process for obtaining witnesses in his favor, and to have the assistance of counsel for his defense.

Clearly these amendments, normally and perfectly adapted to conditions of peace, do not have the same complete and universal application in time of war. Thus the fifth amendment normally gives its protection to "any person." But in war this must yield to the undoubted national power to capture and confiscate the property of enemies. This was distinctly ruled by the Supreme Court in Miller v. United States (11 Wall., p. 268), a proceeding brought under the confiscation acts of 1861 and 1862 to confiscate shares of stock owned by Miller, a Virginian, in a Michigan corporation. The court said:

If the act of 1861 and the fifth, sixth, and seventh sections of the act of July 17, 1862, were municipal regulations only there would be force in the objection that Congress has disregarded the restrictions of the fifth and sixth amendments of the Constitution. * * * If, on the contrary, they are an exercise of the war powers of the Government, it is clear that they are not affected by the restrictions imposed by the fifth and sixth amendments. This we understand to have been conceded in the argument. The question, therefore, is whether the action of Congress was a legitimate exercise of the war power. The Constitution confers upon Congress, expressly, power to declare war, grant letters of marque and reprisal, and make rules respecting captures on land and water. Upon the exercise of these powers no restrictions are imposed. Of course, the power to declare war involves the power to prosecute it by all means and in any manner in which war may be legitimately prosecuted. It therefore includes the right to seize and confiscate all property of an enemy and to dispose of it at the will of the captor. This is, and always has been, an undoubted belligerent right.

MARTIAL LAW.

Again, in the place where actual military operations are being conducted, the ordinary rights of citizens must yield to paramount military necessity. This was conceded in Milligan's case (4 Wall., p. 127), where it was said in the prevailing opinion:

If, in foreign invasion or civil war, the courts are actually closed and it is impossible to administer criminal justice according to law, then, on the theater of actual military operations, where war really prevails, there is a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority, thus overthrown, to preserve the safety of the Army and society; and as no power is left but the military it is allowed to govern by martial rule until the laws can have their free course.

A different question, however, is presented with respect to the rights of citizens and others not enemies in places which are outside the actual theater of war. It was upon the question of the power of Congress to provide for the trial of citizens by military commission in such places that the justices sharply divided in the noted case of Milligan. He was a citizen of Indiana who had been tried by a military commission at Indianapolis on a charge of aiding the enemy and conspiring against the Government and had been sentenced to be hung. He was not a resident of one of the rebellious States nor a prisoner of war and he had not been in the military or naval service. The court was unanimous in the opinion that under the terms of the act of Congress creating the commission it had no jurisdiction. But the majority of the court went further and declared that Congress was without power to provide for the trial of citizens by military commissions save in the locality of actual war and when there was no access to the courts. Maintaining with eloquent emphasis the guaranties of freedom contained in the fifth and sixth amendments, the majority of the court asserted that—

Martial law can not arise from a threatened invasion. The necessity must be actual and present; the invasion real, such as effectually closes the courts and deposes the civil administration. * * * Martial rule can never exist where the courts are open and in the proper and unobstructed exercise of their jurisdiction. It is also confined to the locality of actual war.

The minority of four justices, led by Chief Justice Chase, while agreeing that there was no jurisdiction in Milligan's case under the act of Congress, strongly insisted that Congress in time of war had the power to provide for the punishment of citizens charged with conspiracy against the United States by military tribunals if it was deemed necessary for the public safety. Deducing this view from the war powers conferred by the Constitution, the Chief Justice said:

Where peace exists the laws of peace must prevail. What we do maintain is that when the Nation is involved in war and some portions of the country are invaded and all are exposed to invasion it is within the power of Congress to determine to what States or districts such great and imminent public danger exists as justifies the authorization of military tribunals for the trial of crimes and offenses against the discipline or security of the Army or against the public safety. * * * The fact that the Federal courts were open was regarded by Congress as a sufficient reason for not exercising the power; but that fact could not deprive Congress of the right to exercise it. These courts might be open and undisturbed in the execution of their functions and yet wholly incompetent to avoid threatened danger or to punish with adequate promptitude and certainty the guilty conspirators. * * * In times of rebellion and civil war it may often happen, indeed, that judges and marshals will be in active sympathy with the rebels and courts their most efficient allies. * * * It was for Congress to determine the question of expediency.

Prof. Willoughby, in a careful review of the Milligan case, regards the doctrine of the majority as essentially sound, that the necessity justifying martial law may not be created by legislative fiat. But he suggests that the majority went too far in the absolute declaration that martial law can not arise from "a threatened invasion," and that the mere fact that the courts are open, regardless of all other conditions, is a conclusive test. "The better doctrine," says Willoughby, "is not for the courts to attempt to determine in advance with respect to any one element what does, what does not, create a necessity for martial law, but, as in all other cases of the exercise of official authority, to test the legality of an act by its special circumstances."

Certainly the test should not be a mere physical one, nor should substance be sacrificed to form. The majority recognized "a necessity to furnish a substitute for the civil authority" when overthrown, in order "to preserve the safety of the army and society." If this necessity actually exists it can not be doubted that the power of the Nation is adequate to meet it, but the rights of the citizen may not be impaired by an arbitrary legislative declaration. Outside the actual theater of war, and if, in a true sense, the administration of justice remains unobstructed, the right of the citizen to normal judicial procedure is secure.

CITIZEN'S RIGHTS OF PROPERTY.

Further, with respect to the citizen's rights of property, a distinction may be taken between the unavoidable deprivations which take place where the conflict rages and those takings, although for military purposes, which are deliberate appropriations for which compensation must be made. As was said by the Supreme Court in United States v. Russell (13 Wall., p. 623):

Private property, the Constitution provides, shall not be taken for public use without just compensation. * * * Extraordinary and unforeseen occasions arise, beyond all doubt, in cases of extreme necessity in time of war or of immediate and impending public danger in which private property may be impressed into the public service, or may be seized or appropriated to the public use, or may even be destroyed without the consent of the owner. * * * Where such an extraordinary and unforeseen emergency occurs in the public service in time of war no doubt is entertained that the power of the Government is ample to supply for the moment the public wants in that way to the extent of the immediate public exigency, but the public danger must be immediate, imminent, and impending, and the emergency in the public service must be extreme and imperative and such as will not admit of delay or a resort to any other source of supply. * * * Such a justification may be shown, and when shown, the rule is well settled that the officer taking private property for such a purpose, if the emergency is fully proved, is not a trespasser, and that the Government is bound to make full compensation to the owner.

REASONABLE REGULATIONS TO INSURE SUCCESS IN WAR.

Distinct from such requisitions from individuals is the necessary regulation of the use of property to secure the successful prosecution of the war. We are witnessing a new phase of the exercise of war powers. But the applicable principle to determine the validity of such action is not new. Even in times of peace we are familiar with the principle of regulation which extends to callings "affected with a public interest." The Supreme Court, after reviewing the decisions, recently said:

They demonstrate that a business, by circumstances and its nature, may rise from private to be a public concern, and be subject, in consequence, to governmental regulation. And they demonstrate * * * that the attempts made to place the right of public regulation in the cases in which it has been exerted and of which we have given examples, upon the ground of special privilege conferred by the public on those affected, can not be supported. The underlying principle is that business of certain kinds holds such a peculiar relation to the public interest that there is superinduced upon it the right of public regulation. (German Alliance Insurance Co. v. Kansas, 233 U. S., 411.)

The extraordinary circumstances of war may bring particular business and enterprises clearly into the category of those which are affected with a public interest and which demand immediate and thoroughgoing public regulation. The production and distribution of foodstuffs, articles of prime necessity, those which have direct relation to military efficiency, those which are absolutely required for the support of the people during the stress of conflict, are plainly of this sort. Reasonable regulations to safeguard the resources upon which we depend for military success must be regarded as being within the powers confided to Congress to enable it to prosecute a successful war. In the words of the Supreme Court:

It is well settled that the Constitution is not self-destructive. In other words, that the power which it confers on the one hand it does not immediately take away on the other. (Billings v. United States, 232 U. S., 282.)

This was said in relation to the taxing power. Having been granted in express terms, the court held it had not been taken away by the due process clause of the fifth amendment. As the Supreme Court put it in another case:

The Constitution does not conflict with itself by conferring upon the one hand a taxing power and taking the same power away on the other by the limitations of the due process clause. (240 U. S., 24.)

Similarly, it may be said that the power has been expressly given to Congress to prosecute war and to pass all laws which shall be necessary and proper for carrying that power into execution. That power explicitly conferred and absolutely essential to the safety of the Nation is not destroyed or impaired by any later provision of the Constitution or by any one of the amendments. These may all be construed so as to avoid making the Constitution self-destructive, so as to preserve the rights of the citizen from unwarrantable attack, while assuring beyond all hazard the common defense and the perpetuity of our liberties. These rest upon the preservation of the Nation.

ADDRESS OF THE PRESIDENT, GEORGE SUTHERLAND, OF UTAH.

[Presented at the meeting of the American Bar Association, at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., Sept. 4, 1917.]

PRIVATE RIGHTS AND GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

From the foundation of civil society, two desires, in a measure conflicting with one another, have been at work striving for supremacy: First, the desire of the individual to control and regulate his own activities in such a way as to promote what he conceives to be his own good; and second, the desire of society to curtail the activities of the individual in such a way as to promote what it conceives to be the common good. The operation of the first of these we call liberty, and that of the second we call authority. Throughout all history, mankind has oscillated, like some huge pendulum, between these two, sometimes swinging too far in one direction and sometimes, in the rebound, too far in the opposite direction. Liberty has degenerated into anarchy and authority has ended in despotism, and this has been repeated so often that some students of history have reached the pessimistic conclusion that the whole process was but the aimless pursuit of the unattainable. I do not, myself, share that view. In all probability we shall never succeed in getting rid of all the bad things which afflict the social organism—and perhaps it would not be a desirable result if we should succeed, since out of the dead level of settled perfection there could not come that uplifting sense of moral regeneration which follows the successful fight against evil, and which is responsible for so much of human advancement—but I am sure that in most ways, including some of the ways of government, we are better off to-day than we have ever been before. It is, however, apparently one of the corollaries of progressive development that we get rid of old evils only to acquire new ones. We move out of the wilderness into the city and thereby escape the tooth and claw of savage nature, which we see clearly, only to incur the sometimes deadlier menace of the microbes of civilization, of whose existence we learn only after suffering the mischief they do. To-day, as always, eternal vigilance is the price of liberty—liberty whose form has changed but whose spirit is the same. In the old days it was the liberty of person, the liberty of speech, the freedom of religious worship, which were principally threatened. To-day it is the liberty to order the detail of one's daily life for oneself—the liberty to do honest and profitable business—the liberty to seek honest and remunerative investment that are in peril. In my own mind I feel sure that there never has been a time when the business of the country occupied a higher moral plane; never a time when the voluntary code which governs the conduct of the banker, the manufacturer, the merchant, the railway manager, has been finer in tone or more faithfully observed than it is to-day; and yet never before have the business activities of the people been so beset and bedeviled with vexatious statutes, prying commissions, and governmental intermeddling of all sorts.

Under our form of government the will of the people is supreme. We seem to have become intoxicated with the plenitude of our power, or fearful that it will disappear if we do not constantly use it, and, inasmuch as our will can be exercised authoritatively only through some form of law, whenever we become dissatisfied with anything, we enact a statute on the subject.

If, therefore, I were asked to name the characteristic which more than any other distinguishes our present-day political institutions, I am not sure that I should not answer, "The passion for making laws." There are 48 small or moderate-sized legislative bodies in the United States engaged a good deal of the time and one very large National Legislature working overtime at this amiable occupation, their combined output being not far from 15,000 statutes each year. The prevailing obsession seems to be that statutes, like the crops, enrich the country in proportion to their volume. Unfortunately for this notion, however, the average legislator does not always know what he is sowing and the harvest which frequently results is made up of strange and unexpected plants whose appearance is as astonishing to the legislator as it is disconcerting to his constituents.

This situation, I am bound to say, is not wholly unrelated to a more or less prevalent superstition entertained by the electorate that previous training in legislative affairs is a superfluous adjunct of the legislative mind, which should enter upon its task with the sweet inexperience of a bride coming to the altar. As rotation in crops—if I may return to the agricultural figure—improves the soil, so rotation in office is supposed to improve the Government. The comparison, however, is illusory since the legislator resembles the farmer who cultivates the crops rather than the crops themselves, and previous experience, even of the most thorough character, on the part of the farmer has never hitherto been supposed to destroy his availability for continued service.

I think it was the late Mr. Carlyle, who is reported to have made the rather cynical observation that the only acts of Parliament which were entitled to commendation were those by which previous acts of Parliament were repealed. I am not prepared to go quite that far, though I am prepared to say that in my judgment an extraordinarily large proportion of the statutes which have been passed from time to time in our various legislative bodies might be repealed without the slightest detriment to the general welfare.

Throughout the country the business world has come to look upon the meeting of the legislature as a thing to be borne rather than desired, and to regard with grave suspicion pretty much everything that happens, with the exception of the final adjournment, a resolution to which end, unless history has been singularly unobservant, has never thus far been withheld by general request.

The trouble with much of our legislation is that the legislator has mistaken emotion for wisdom, impulse for knowledge, and good intention for sound judgment. "He means well" is a sweet and wholesome thing in the field of ethics. It may be of small consequence, or of no consequence at all, in the domain of law. "He means well" may save the legislator from the afflictions of an accusing conscience, but it does not protect the community from the affliction of mischievous and meddlesome statutes.

A diffused desire to do good—an anxious feeling about progress—are not to be derided, of course, but standing alone and regarded from the viewpoint of practical statesmanship, they leave something to be desired in the way of complete equipment for discriminating legislative work. Progress, let me suggest, is not a state of mind. It is a fact, or set of facts, capable of observation and analysis—a condition of affairs which may be cross-examined to ascertain whether it is what it pretends to be. But you can not cross-examine a mere longing for goodness—an indefinite, inarticulate yearning for reform and the uplift—or an uneasy, vague state of flabby sentimentalism about things in general.

In matters of social conventionality we are still rigidly conservative, but in the field of government there is a widespread demand for innovating legislation—a craze for change. A politician may advocate the complete repudiation of the Constitution and be regarded with complacency, if not with approval as an up-to-date reformer and friend of the people, but let him appear in public wearing a skirt instead of a pair of trousers and the populace will be moved to riot and violence.

The difficulty which confronts us in all the fields of human endeavor is that we are going ahead so fast—so many novel and perplexing problems are pressing upon us for solution—that we become confused at their very multiplicity. Evils develop faster than remedies can be devised. Most of these evils, if left alone, would disappear under the powerful pressure of public sentiment, but we become impatient because the force of the social organism is not sufficiently radical and the demand goes forth for a law which will instantly put an end to the matter.

The view which prevailed a hundred years ago was that the primary relation of the Government to the conduct of the citizen was that of the policeman, to preserve the peace and regulate the activities of the individual only when necessary to prevent injury to other individuals or to safeguard the public; in short, to exercise what is comprehended under the term "police power." It is true that the Government was not rigidly confined to those limits, but whenever it undertook to go beyond them it assumed the burden of showing clearly the necessity for so doing. The whole philosophy found its extreme expression in the Jeffersonian aphorism, "That government is best which governs least," while Lord Macaulay's terse summary was, "The primary end of government is the protection of the persons and property of men."

Of course with the tremendous increase in the extent and complexity of our social, economic, and political activities, alterations in the scope and additions to the extent of governmental operations become inevitable and necessary. To this no thoughtful person objects, but unfortunately the governmental incursions into the new territory are being extended beyond the limits of necessity and even beyond the bounds of expediency into the domain of doubtful experiment.

There is, to begin with, an increasing disposition to give authoritative direction to the course of personal behavior—an effort to mold the conduct of individuals irrespective of their differing views, habits, and tastes to the pattern, which for the time being has received the approval of the majority. Under this process we are losing our sense of perspective. We are constantly bringing the petty shortcomings of our neighbors into the foreground so that the evil becomes overemphasized, while the noble proportions of the good are minimized by being relegated to the background. We have developed a mania for regulating people. We forbid not only evil practices, but we are beginning to lay the restraining hand of the law upon practices that are at the most of only doubtful character. We not infrequently fail to distinguish between crimes and vices, and we are beginning almost to put in the category along with vices and offensive habits any behavior which happens to differ from our own.

I do not, for example, question the moral right of the majority to forbid the traffic in intoxicating liquor, nor its wisdom in doing so. No doubt the world would be better off if the trade were entirely abolished, but some of the States have recently gone to lengths hitherto undreamed of in penalizing the mere possession of intoxicating liquor and—since no one can use liquor without having the possession of it—thereby penalizing its personal use no matter how moderate such use may be. To put the consumer of a glass of beer in the penitentiary along with the burglar and the highwayman is to sacrifice all the wholesome distinctions which for centuries have separated debatable habit from indisputable crime. Such legislation, to say the least, constitutes a novel extension of the doctrines of penology. Hitherto, laws on the subject have taken the form of prohibiting and penalizing the traffic, but not the personal use, which seems to have been quite generally regarded as falling outside the scope of the criminal law. The use of intoxicants or tobacco, however injurious to the user, has not generally been thought to involve the element of immorality. Hence the attempt to coerce an abandonment of such use by punitive legislation directed against the use, however desirable the result itself may be, will inevitably run counter to the sentiment, still rather widely entertained, that the imposition of criminal penalties for any purely self-regarding conduct, can only be justified in cases involving some degree of moral turpitude.

It does not require a prophet to foresee that laws of this character exacting penalties so utterly disproportionate to the offense, can never be generally enforced, and to write them into the statutes to be cunningly evaded or contemptuously ignored will have a strong tendency to bring just and wholesome laws dealing with the liquor question into disrepute.

It is sometimes a matter of nice discrimination to determine, as between the liberty of the citizen and the supposed good of the community, which shall prevail. The liberty of the individual to control his own conduct is the most precious possession of a democracy, and interference with it is seldom justified except where necessary to protect the liberties or rights of other individuals or to safeguard society. If widely indulged, such interference will not only fail to bring about the good results intended to be produced, but will gravely threaten the stability and further development of that sturdy individualism, to which is due more than any other thing our present advanced civilization.

In passing legislation of this character doubts should be resolved in favor of the liberty of the individual and his power to freely determine and pursue his own course in his own way should rarely be interfered with, unless the welfare of other individuals or of society clearly requires it. "Human nature," says Mill, "is not a machine to be built after a model, and set to do exactly the work prescribed for it, but a tree which requires to grow and develop itself on all sides, according to the tendency of the inward forces which make it a living thing."

Human nature is so constituted that we freely tolerate in ourselves what we condemn in others, and we are prone to condemn traits of character in others simply because we do not find the same traits in ourselves. Very often the evil is in the eye of the beholder rather than in the thing beheld, for he is a man of rare good sense who can always distinguish between an evil thing and his own prejudices.

One objection to governmental interference with the personal habits, or even the vices of the individual, is that it tends to weaken the effect of the self-convincing moral standards and to put in their place fallible and changing conventions as the test of right conduct, with the consequent loss of the strengthening value to the individual of the free exercise of his rational choice of good rather than evil. Enforced discipline can never have the moral value of self-discipline, since it lacks the element of cooperating effort on the part of the individual which is the very soul of all personal advancement.

We may, therefore, well pause to consider whether the benefits which will result to society from a given interference of this character are sufficiently important to compensate for the loss of that fine sense of personal independence, which more than any other quality has enabled the Anglo-Saxon race to throw off the yoke of monarchical absolutism and substitute democratic self-government. It must not be forgotten that democracy is after all but a form of government whose justification must be established in the same way that the justification of any other form of government is established; namely, by what it does rather than by what it claims to be. The errors of a democracy and the errors of an autocracy will be followed by similar consequences. A foolish law does not become a wise law because it is approved by a great many people. The successful enforcement of the law in a democracy must always rest primarily in the fact that on the whole it commends itself to a universal sense of justice, shared even by those who violate it. Any attempt, therefore, to curtail the liberties of the citizen which shocks the sense of personal independence of any considerable proportion of the community is likely to do more harm than good, not only because a strong feeling that a particular law is unjust lessens in some degree the reverence for law generally, but because such a law can not be successfully enforced, and a law that inspires neither respect for its justice nor fear for its enforcement is about as utterly contemptible a thing as can be imagined.

Another thing which may well give concern to thoughtful men is the tremendous increase during late years in the number and power of administrative boards, bureaus, commissions, and similar agencies, the insidious tendency of which is to undermine the fundamental principle upon which our form of government depends; namely, that it is "an empire of laws and not of men"; the meaning of which is that the rights and duties of the individual as a member of society must be defined by preestablished laws and not left to be fixed by official edict, as they may be called into question from time to time. The American people have heretofore enjoyed a greater freedom from vexatious official intermeddling and arbitrary governmental compulsion than perhaps any other people in the world. Despotism has found no place among us, because we have been subject to no restraint save the impartial restraint of the law, which has thus far stood superior to the will of any official, high or low.

It is not enough, however, that we should continue free from the despotism of a supreme autocrat. We must keep ourselves free from the petty despotism which may come from vesting final discretion to regulate individual conduct in the hands of lesser officials. To this end the things which organized society exacts from its members must be particularized as far as practicable by definite and uniform rules. Liberty consists at last in the right to do whatever the law does not forbid, and this presupposes law made in advance—so that the individual may know before he acts the standard of conduct to which his acts must conform—and interpreted and applied after the act by disinterested authority—so that the true relation to one another of the conduct and the law may be clearly ascertained and declared. It is, therefore, of the utmost importance that the authority which interprets and executes the law should not also be the authority which makes it. The law must apply to all alike. The making of law is an exercise of the will of the state; the interpretation and application of the law is an exercise of the reason of the judge. The legislator concerns himself with the question, Is the proposed law just in its general application? The official who administers the law has nothing to do with the abstract question of its justice; his function is to ascertain what it is and whether it has been violated. The two functions are so utterly different that the necessity of vesting them in separate hands has been long recognized. To confer upon the same man, or body of men, the power to make the law and also to administer it would inevitably result in despotic government by substituting the shifting frontiers of personal command for the definite boundaries of general, impersonal law. "The spirit of encroachment," said Washington in the Farewell Address, "tends to consolidate the powers of all the departments in one and thus to create, whatever the form of government, a real despotism."

The danger, therefore, which is threatened by the multiplication of bureaus and commissions consists in the commingling of these powers. The authority conferred upon these administrative bodies is becoming less and less limited. The jurisdiction to deal with particular subjects involving the conduct of individuals is conferred in terms which tend to become increasingly indefinite.

While, however, "bureaucracy" is a word which we instinctively accept as connoting an offensive form of government, we must not allow ourselves to be carried away by mere expletives. As the tasks of government grow in magnitude, it becomes more and more difficult for the legislative authority to deal directly and completely with many matters which come within its powers. It therefore is becoming increasingly necessary to devolve upon administrative bureaus and commissions the duty not only of executing but to some extent of filling in the details of administrative legislation, which of necessity must continue to be expressed in terms more or less general and comprehensive.

A serious danger to the citizen in this situation, however, is likely to arise from a failure on the part of the legislative authority to lay down explicitly and with sufficient care the primary standard which fixes the limits within which the power of the bureau or commission is to operate, and another danger lies in the fact that the persons composing the bureaus and commissions under our system of political appointments may be deficient in technical learning for the work which they are called upon to do. The duties to be performed by such bureaus and commissions are sometimes of a highly specialized character, where thoroughgoing study and training are as essential as they are in the case of the judiciary.

There is, moreover, a growing tendency to make the findings of these bodies final, which, to be sure, obviates delay and adds a certain measure of vigor to administrative action, but on the other hand takes away the wholesome restraint afforded by the consciousness of the official that his acts are subject to review.

The result of all this is that there is being developed a system of administrative government which may easily become autocratic and oppressive. The power is conferred in such indefinite terms that the administrative board in exercising its power in effect enacts the rule and then proceeds to enforce it. By way of illustration, let me call attention to the law passed by Congress creating the so-called Trade Commission. Under this law the business operations of anywhere from three hundred thousand to half a million corporations are placed under the jurisdiction, and to a large extent at the mercy of an administrative board of five men. The law declares that "unfair methods of competition are unlawful," which provision the commission is empowered to enforce. The provision, however, is so general and indefinite that no two minds are likely to agree as to its scope and meaning. The powers of the board in this respect, therefore, can not be determined by reference to any primary standard furnished by the law itself, and but for the fundamental guaranties of the Constitution—still subject to the saving hand of the courts of the country—they would be well nigh unlimited. We know what the phrase "unfair competition" means, because the courts have told us. It consists primarily in an attempt on the part of one person to impose his goods or his business on the public as the goods or business of another. The element of fraud is a material constituent. What is meant by the phrase "unfair methods of competition" nobody knows, only that it means something different from the phrase "unfair competition," since it is a rule of law, as well as of good sense, that when the language of the law is altered an intent to change the meaning is presumed. What, therefore, will the commission hold to be "unfair methods of competition"—methods which are legally unfair; methods which are economically unfair; methods which are ethically unfair; or all three and more? Will fraud be considered a necessary element in the transaction? Under this all-embracing generalization business men must look not to the law but to the commission to tell them what they may or may not do. Whenever a case of suspected "unfair methods" is presented, the commission will not ascertain the facts and apply the rule, but will ascertain the facts and make the rule. The determination of each case will involve in effect, therefore, the making of a law applicable not to future facts but to facts already past, and the rendering of judgment thereon.

I may say in passing that there are other extraordinary provisions in this law which are filled with menace, among them the provision empowering the commission "to investigate from time to time the organization, business conduct, practices, and management of any corporation engaged in commerece," and so on, and for this purpose, as well as for the other purposes of the act, the commission is given "access to, for the purpose of examination, and the right to copy any documentary evidence of any corporation being investigated or proceeded against." The effect of this is to vest this board with authority to take possession of and copy all the books and private papers of every corporation which happens to be engaged in interstate commerce, whether these books relate to interstate transactions or not, because the test which determines the power of the board is simply that the corporations shall be engaged in interstate commerce. Being so engaged there is no limit as to the character of the business conduct and practices which the board may investigate.

Surely these provisions are of at least questionable constitutionality; first, because they confer a power on the board to deal with matters which may or may not relate to interstate commerce, and, second, because they empower an administrative board to seize private papers and carry away copies of them without legal process and in apparent violation of the search and seizure clause of the Constitution. But irrespective of this the authority is so dangerous and far-reaching that its complete exercise will never long be tolerated by a people whose government has been builded upon the principle that the most imperious and necessary of all political rights is the right to be secure against the exercise of arbitrary and undefined powers.

The purpose of this Trade Commission law is to restrict competition. The purpose of the antitrust laws is to enlarge competition. To what extent will the administration of the former modify or nullify the latter? The business organizations of the country are confronted with two sets of statutes proceeding upon partially antagonistic principles. Cases will inevitably arise where it will be difficult to determine which principle shall apply—that which forbids or that which enforces competition. After a quarter of a century of litigation the business world has at length ascertained with some approach to certainty what are the limits of its authority to combine. It must now take up the task of learning the limits of its right to compete. How far the work of the courts in expounding the Sherman law will be upset by the administrative enforcement of the trade-commission law can not be foreseen, but in the meantime the business of the country must suffer another long period of anxious and injurious uncertainty. The Trade Commission itself has made little, if any, effort to carry into operation the sweeping powers which the law confers, so that the mischief is still latent, having had no opportunity of becoming manifest. In refraining from exercising these powers thus far the commission has shown itself wiser than the law, and if that course shall be followed permanently we may experience nothing more serious than the amiable efforts of a group of highly intelligent and conscientious gentlemen to give some more or less relevant advice and render some more or less helpful service to the business men of the country, efforts which I am bound to say thus far have been productive of much good and no harm.

Nevertheless, the provisions to which I have called attention remain in the law ready to be invoked at any time with such far-reaching and injurious consequences as at present can not be foreseen.

Not only are the business activities of the country being investigated, supervised, directed, and controlled in such a multitude of ways that the banker, the merchant, and the men of industry generally are afloat upon a sea of uncertainty where, if they succeed in avoiding the mines of dubious statutes by which they are surrounded, they are in danger of being blown up by an administrative torpedo, launched from one of the numerous submarine commissions by which the business waters are everywhere infested, but the Government is invading and is threatening to more seriously invade the market place itself, not as a regulator, but as a participant and competitor. We seem to be approaching more and more nearly the point where the old philosophy that whatever can be done by the individual should not be done by the Government, even though it may be well done, is to be abandoned for the new and dangerous doctrine that whatever can be done by the Government, even though it may be badly done, should not be permitted to the individual.

Steps have quite recently been taken for putting the National Government into the business of manufacturing armor plate, and nitrates for use in making gunpowder, which may, of course, be justified as measures for the public defense, but alternative provision is made for utilizing the nitrate plants when their product is not needed for powder—which, except in time of war, will be almost all the time—for the purpose of producing fertilizers to be sold to the farmers. While much can be said on the score of economy as to the doubtful wisdom of the Government undertaking to make its own armor plate, yet after all it does not involve any departure from established governmental principles. But it is difficult to conceive of any legitimate basis for putting the Federal Government into the business of manufacturing manure as a trade commodity. The Government is building a railroad in Alaska. Some of us opposed that as being a step in the direction of Government ownership, but some excuse may be found for the action in the theory that the Territory is really Government property and that the same warrant exists for improving it as existed in the case of the arid lands whose reclamation was provided for by act of Congress. But Congress has gone quite beyond all this in the passage of the so-called ship-purchase act, which proposes to put the Government of the United States into the ocean carrying trade as a common carrier for hire. The Postmaster General for several years has been insisting that the Federal Government should take over and operate the telephone and telegraph lines, and the demand for Government ownership and operation of the railroads is apparently growing. Personally, I am opposed to all these schemes. Whatever may be said as to the power of a particular State or municipality to engage in some specific business activity. I have never been able to understand how the Federal Government with its precisely enumerated and delegated powers may constitutionally engage in business. Warrant may be found in the post-office clause for the operation of the telephone and telegraph lines, but the only authority, even under the most strained construction, that can be cited as authorizing the Government of the United States to become a common carrier of goods and passengers by land or sea is the commerce clause which gives Congress power to regulate interstate and foreign commerce. I have upon another occasion discussed this question at some length, and I shall not undertake to go into it now further than to say that the power which is conferred is to regulate, not to do the substantive thing which is the subject of regulation. To build a highway or even a railroad may be accepted as a regulation of commerce, since its effect is to facilitate commerce, and thus to condition or regulate it, but the building of a road and the carrying of passengers over the road are two very different things. The building of the road may regulate commerce, but the carrying of passengers and goods over the road is commerce itself, and, under our system, always regarded as a private activity as distinguished from a governmental function. Regulation, however, is naturally and necessarily a matter for the Government, since it is unthinkable that one individual should have the power to regulate the activities of another individual. Had it been suggested to the framers of the Constitution that provision should be made whereby the Federal Government might engage in the carrying trade or in any other form of private as distinguished from governmental business, certainly the suggestion would have been instantly and emphatically rejected. The fathers intended that this should be a civil Government; it was no part of their plan that it should ever become a business organization. Jealous to the last degree of individual rights and liberties, their effort was to abridge rather than to extend the powers of government.

I can not imagine any greater misfortune to the people than for the General Government to acquire and operate the telegraph, telephone, and railroad lines of the country. The duties imposed upon that Government has already grown to vast proportions.

To add the burden of operating all the railroads and telegraph and telephone lines would be to invite disaster. Persons now in the service of the Government already number over a million. If to this number we add all the employees in the service of the great private corporations now operating these instrumentalities, the 3,000,000 or more, if organized—as they undoubtedly would be organized—would practically dictate the policy of the Government. If to the annual rivers and harbors "pork barrel" and the biennial public buildings "pork barrel" we should add an annual railroad "pork-barrel" bill, the public expenditures would increase to such a sum that the $3,000,000,000 Congress would be looked back to as an example of political self-restraint and economy. The Congressman from every district, in addition to asking for a public building, would demand a new railroad station, a branch railroad, and other expensive additions. Between the effort to decrease freight rates in order to cultivate the votes of the shippers and consumers, to increase wages in order to cultivate the labor vote, and the "log-rolling" incident to the making of permanent improvements in order to make each Congressman solid with his constituents, the annual expenditures would be increased to a point beyond the wildest imaginings.

The ship-purchase act in one aspect presents the evil of Government ownership in its worst form, for it does not propose that the Government shall completely occupy the field, but that it shall partially occupy it in competition with its own citizens. The business, it is practically conceded, will not be carried on at a profit, but probably will be carried on at a loss, which, of course, must be recouped from taxes imposed upon the private ship owners in common with the other citizens of the country. Think of a Government in time of peace—for I recognize that anything may be justified in time of war—embarking in a business enterprise and taxing its own competitors to the end that the business may be carried on to their injury and perhaps to their ultimate ruin and bankruptcy, for successful competition between the Government, to whom profits are of no concern, and the citizens, to whom profits are vital, is, of course, impossible.

If the Government were bound to an observance of the same conduct which it enjoins upon the citizen, the situation might present a case under the law forbidding "unfair methods of competition" for the thoughtful consideration of the Federal Trade Commission.

The regulation and control of merely self-regarding conduct, the multiplication of administrative boards and similar agencies, and the invasion of the field of private business, which I have thus far particularized, illustrate rather than enumerate the various tendencies of modern legislation and government to depart from those sound and wholesome principles which hitherto have been supposed to operate in the direction of preserving the individual against undue restraint and oppression.

Class legislation, the most odious form of legislative abuse, is by no means infrequent. In State and Nation statutes are to be found which select for special privilege one class of great voting strength or set apart for special burdens another class of small numerical power at the polls.

Next to the separation and distribution of the legislative, executive, and judicial powers, the most important feature of our plan of government is the division of the aggregate powers of government between the Nation and the several States, to the one by enumeration and to the other by reservation. I believe in the most liberal construction of the national powers actually granted, but I also believe in the rigid exclusion of the National Government from those powers which have been actually reserved to the States. The local government is in immediate contact with the local problems and should be able to deal with them more wisely and more effectively than the General Government, having its seat at a distance. The need of preserving the power and enforcing the duty of local self-government is imperative, and especially so in a country, such as ours, of vast population and extent, possessing almost every variety of soil and climate, of greatly diversified interests and occupations, and having all sorts of differing conditions to deal with. There is, unfortunately, however, a constantly growing tendency on the part of the General Government to intrude upon the powers of the State governments, more by way of relieving them from responsibilities they are willing to shirk than by usurping powers they are anxious to retain. Especially does any inroad or suggested inroad upon the Federal Treasury for State purposes meet with instant and hearty approval. The grave danger of all this is that the ability as well as the desire of the people of the several States to carry their own burdens and correct their own shortcomings will gradually lessen and finally disappear, with the result that the States will become mere geographical subdivisions and the Federal character of the Nation will cease to exist save as a more or less discredited tradition.

These and many other matters afford temptation to further discussion to which I can not yield without undue trespass upon your patience, which I feel has already been quite sufficiently taxed.

Fifty years ago a great French writer—Laboulaye, I think it was—speaking through the lips of one of his American characters, uttered these words of wisdom and of power, words which are as true to-day as they were when they were written:

"The more democratic a people is, the more it is necessary that the individual be strong and his property sacred. We are a Nation of sovereigns, and everything that weakens the individual tends toward demagogy; that is, toward disorder and ruin; whereas everything that fortifies the individual tends toward democracy; that is, the reign of reason and the Evangel. A free country is a country where each citizen is absolute master of his conscience, his person, and his goods. If the day ever comes when individual rights are swallowed up by those of the general interest, that day will see the end of Washington's handiwork; we will be a mob and we will have a master."

It is now as it has always been, that when the visionary or the demagogue advocates a new law or policy or scheme of government which tends to curtail the liberties of the individual he loudly insists that he is acting for the general interest and thereby surrounds his propaganda with such a halo of sancity that opposition or even candid criticism is looked upon as sacrilege.

But the time has come when every true lover of his country must refuse to be misled or overawed by specious claims of this character. Individual liberty and the common good are not incompatible, but are entirely consistent with one another. Both are desirable and both may be had, but we must demand the substance of both and not accept the counterfeit of either. Crimes, we are told, have been committed in the name of liberty. But either the thing that was called a crime was no crime or the name of liberty was profaned, as though one should become an anarchist in the name of order. Liberty and order are the two most precious things beneath the stars. The duty which rests upon us of this generation is the same that has rested upon all the generations of the past—to be vigilant to see and resolute to repel every attempt, however insidious or indirect, to destroy liberty in the name of order, or order in the name of liberty, for the alternative of the one is despotism and of the other the mob.

War-Risk Insurance.

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, September 11, 1917.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, the controlling motive in the consideration of the bill to provide insurance for the enlisted men of the Army and Navy should be to do everything in our power for the soldiers and sailors who are to bear our standards across the seas, and so to arrange the bill that the dependents of these men, left behind, will have every possible assurance of being properly cared for.

In brief, the compelling influence in the pending legislation should be the obligation imposed upon us by virtue of our office, to look after the material welfare of the men who are fighting to preserve the rights of our country and also to protect their dependents.

We need have little fear that too much can be done for them. Too much can never be done for the man who is willing to leave all and chance his life and all he holds most dear for his country. Too much can not be done for the wife whom he leaves behind and who is ready to add her sacrifice to that of her husband. Too much can not be done for the dependents, now left without a breadwinner, by the country for which the breadwinner is ready to die.

While expenditures of millions and appropriations perhaps now unexpected may be made, the question is not primarily one of money, and can be approached best only from the standpoint of patriotism, from the viewpoint of men conscious of a sacred trust imposed upon them.

I shall vote for the measure.

We are living in abnormal times. For three years we have been reading of armies marching out to battle; and now our own troops, from being spectators, have become participants and are moving daily nearer and nearer to the clash of arms. We have a right to be proud of them; theirs is the right to look to us for cooperation. The clamor of the first days of the war having passed away, the country is now settling down to effect a complete and early victory. While no section of the land yields to any other in patriotism, I think I can be pardoned for referring here to the active part Connecticut has always taken in crises of the country.

When in 1776 the delegates from the original Colonies met in Philadelphia to sign the Declaration of Independence, Connecticut was ably represented by Roger Sherman, Samuel Huntington, William Williams, and Oliver Wolcott. These men were invaluable as counselors in the early days of the Republic, and side by side with their names have been written the names of Gov. Jonathan Trumbull, Israel Putnam, and William Samuel Johnson; and who is there that has not been thrilled by the story of the martyr-hero of Connecticut, Nathan Hale?

Typical of her earlier enthusiasm was the State's response to the call for troops issued by Abraham Lincoln when the preservation of the Union was threatened in 1861. Connecticut, during the Civil War, sent to the front at various times 28 regiments of Infantry, 2 regiments and 3 batteries of Artillery, and 1 regiment and a squadron of Cavalry.

Her forces numbered 54,882 volunteers of all terms of service, being an average of 48,181 three-year men and 6,698 more than her quota. This was a high percentage for a State which at that time had but about 80,000 votes and 50,000 able-bodied men on her militia rolls. As to the kind and character of the men Connecticut gave, a mere mention of the names is sufficient. It was Connecticut which gave the country its Secretary of the Navy, Gideon Welles, also Rear Admiral Andrew H. Foote and F. H. Gregory, and Commodores C. R. P. Rogers and R. B. Hitchcock. One of the first victims of the Civil War was Theodore Winthrop, of New Haven, a descendent of Connecticut's first governor, John Winthrop. Prominent among the major generals of the war were Joseph R. Hawley, of Hartford; Alfred H. Terry, of New Haven; John Sedgwick, of Cornwall Hollow; J. K. F. Mansfield, of Middletown. Other names of deserved prominence are those of Brig. Gen. R. O. Tyler, of Hartford; Nathaniel Lyon, of Eastford; G. A. Stedman, of Hartford; and Daniel Tyler and Edward Harland, of Norwich. The death roll for Connecticut was heavy, there being 97 officers and 1,094 men killed in action, 48 officers and 663 men dying from wounds, 63 officers and 3,246 men dying from disease, and 21 officers and 389 men reported missing.

In the present emergency, since April 1 of this year up to and including August 24 last, 2,419 of her sons have enlisted to join those already in the Regular Army; 150 officers and 5,091 enlisted men of her National Guard were taken into the Federal service as of July 31, and other units are ready to be called while she has also furnished a large quota to the United States Navy. In addition she will shortly be represented in the new National Army by her quota of nearly 11,000 men, making a total of nearly 19,000 men given willingly to the cause of her country.

The spirit that has animated her soldiers is noticeable in a marked degree among those left at home to do their share. And in their patriotism the insurance men of Hartford, which is recognized as the insurance center of the United States, will not take second rank. They do not oppose the present bill and have, in fact, offered valuable suggestions and aid to the Federal authorities in framing it. It is to be hoped such suggestions, based on years of experience, will be adopted.

The provisions for soldiers and sailors and their dependents contained in the proposed bill for purposes of study and discussion can be best considered under three headings:

(1) (Art. 2). Provision for financial support for the dependents of sailors and soldiers during the war. This part of the bill can be commended as well drawn.

(2) (Art. 3). Compensation to soldiers and sailors in the case of permanent disability—either total or partial disability—or to their dependents in case of death resulting from injuries or sickness incurred during the war.

(3) (Art. 4). Optional insurance plan by which the soldier or sailor may obtain additional protection against death or total and permanent disability incurred during the war or after the war at normal mortality rates—the Government to assume the cost of the extra war risk.

Articles 3 and 4 can be modified in a manner which will disburse the funds of the Government to the sailors and the soldiers and their dependents in a much more equitable and satisfactory manner.

One purpose which has been advanced for article 4 is that there is a necessity for insuring "loss of insurability" of the men who go to war. Under a properly drawn compensation plan there can be no question of the "loss of insurability" of the men during the term of the war, if the compensation plan (art. 3) is drawn with liberality. By amplifying the list of possible dependents and making more liberal the payments under the compensation plan (art. 3), there can be no question of "loss of insurability." "Loss of insurability" after the war should also be taken care of if the compensation plan is drawn sufficiently liberal. If a soldier or sailor is injured or disabled by sickness sufficiently severe to affect his insurability, he should be eligible for compensation. All men who are not disabled because of the war may obtain standard insurance—there is no "loss of insurability."

To summarize: If the compensation plan (art. 3) is amplified by protecting beneficial interests which are not now mentioned—such as parents, grandparents, brothers, and sisters, if wholly dependent—and the monthly benefits be increased to provide more generous protection, it may be a substitute for article 4, as a source of additional protection, and there is no question of "loss of insurability" involved. A compensation act drawn in such a manner will take care of the soldier or sailor or his dependents if he suffers any injury or other disability which would be severe enough to cause "loss of insurability." To make it more specific, the increase in the monthly benefit, which can be made, to take the place of the money which would be expended by the Government under article 4, the following examples are cited:

(1) Let us take the case of a private, wife aged 30 years, no children. Under article 3, in case this man be killed, payment of $35 a month during the life of the widow until her remarriage is payable. For each $1,000 which the Government would disburse under article 4 this monthly allowance would be increased approximately $6. In other words, if under article 4 the soldier had procured $1,000 of insurance, he would, as a substitute under article 3, provide for his wife in the event of his death during the war an increase in his compensation of approximately $6 a month. The increase in the wife's monthly income would, of course, be greater in proportion with the increase in the amount of insurance.

(2) Widow aged 30, children aged 6 and 4. In this case—if the soldier be a private—the minimum monthly compensation under article 3 is $52.50. For each $1,000 of insurance under article 4 the Government could provide $6.25 a month additional benefit.

(3) Let us take the case of total and permanent disability of a private aged 28. The minimum allowance, excluding nurse benefits, under article 3 is $40 per month, to continue during the lifetime of the soldier. For each $1,000 of insurance that he had procured under article 4 the Government could give as a substitute an increase in his monthly benefit of approximately $3.75.

(4) Permanent partial disability. Even if the man had applied for additional insurance under article 4 there would be no additional protection for the many injuries of this sort, for the reason that article 4 provides only for a benefit in event of death or total and permanent disability. A plan for amplifying article 3 would, however, increase the benefit for the numerous injuries of this nature.

It will be indicated, therefore, that by amplifying article 3—the compensation plan—in the manner suggested as a substitute for the proposed article 4 material additions to the monthly benefits can be made by utilizing the moneys which would have been expended under article 4, and the much more satisfactory method of compensating these men and their dependents will follow. Most men prefer that the benefits be paid during the lifetime of the soldiers or sailors.

The second purpose of article 4 is undoubtedly to forestall pension legislation. Pension legislation has been of two general classes: First, pensions in event of death or disability in the service; second, service pensions, i. e., pension allowances as a reward for certain periods of service. It can be seen that the first class of legislation will be taken care of by a properly amplified and liberalized compensation plan—article 3. Service pensions, however, can not be taken care of by a compensation plan or by an optional insurance plan such as article 4. If the Congress thinks it desirable to attempt to forestall service-pension legislation, the best proposal is to give to each man who enters the service of his country a level amount of insurance. It would be recognized in doing this that this is a gift of the Government to the men for services rendered. Under such a plan a certain amount of insurance—to be fixed by Congress—shall be given to each member of the Army and Navy. This will offer some additional protection it is true, but mainly the idea will be to give this insurance protection because of service to the country.

The present provision of article 4 is inequitable. I can think of no better argument than the point raised by Chairman ADAMSON in the hearings held by the Committee on Interstate and Foreign Commerce, during the statement of Mr. A. L. Hereford. I quote Mr. ADAMSON's remarks, on page 74, part 3, of the hearings of August 24, 1917:

> The CHAIRMAN. I am not hunting for a pretext on which to defeat the bill, but I am rather hunting for something to base it on. I want to ask you a question. By giving the option to the soldiers of taking insurance, one soldier takes it because he feels able, and another soldier does not take it because he does not feel able. They both get killed. The widow of the one who has taken the life insurance gets the insurance and the widow of the soldier who has not taken the life insurance does not get any insurance. Do you not think some benevolent Congressman would immediately introduce a bill for a pension for that widow whose husband was not able to take the life insurance?

In discussing the pension phase of the law, it may be worthy of note here that at the close of the last fiscal year, June 30, 1917, there were 673,111 pensioners on the roll, according to information forwarded to me by Commissioner Saltzgaber. Of these, 646,875 were Army pensioners, 26,025 were Navy pensioners, and 211 were Army nurses. There were 329,226 Civil War survivors, while 33,232 Civil War survivors had died during the year then ending. There were 302,964 widows on the roll, while during the year 20,130 widows had died. The report of expenditures shows that the amount paid by the Government from 1790 to 1917 was $5,215,575,780.94.

Speaking on pension appropriations in the House of Representatives on July 10, 1914, I said:

> I am in favor of keeping down to a judicious minimum the appropriations which must be made. Nevertheless I do not consider it wisdom, economy, or justice to reduce our Government expenditure at the expense of the old soldier, sailor, or widow. Believing that it is only right and just that loyal patriots' service should be rewarded, it has given me pleasure to vote for appropriations providing for the payment of pensions.

My stand then is my stand to-day. Wise expenditure of the public funds must be associated with judicious care of the men incapacitated by the war and of their dependents.

On page 49, report of the hearings on the pending bill, August 17, 1917, Capt. Wolfe, the actuary for the Government, is quoted as having said:

> Twenty-five per cent of the men the first year will take out $2,500 of insurance. Of course, some will take out only $1,000 and some will take out a great deal more than that.

If we adopt article 4, would it not be fairer to the men and their dependents for the Government, at its expense, to give to all enlisted men an equal amount of insurance? This would give to the 75 per cent who would not take out the insurance under the optional plan the same protection given to those who would insure, and would place all on an equitable basis, and at the same time reduce the possibility of future pension claims. Under the plan as proposed the men least requiring insurance protection would be the men most likely to apply for it. The Government can forego the payment of premiums during the war. Indeed, the money covering the payment of such premiums would be small compared with the amount which the Government may be obliged to pay for pensions in future years if this plan, democratic and equitable, is not adopted.

With the governmental guardianship and generosity running throughout the bill, the adoption of this plan will be but more extensively carrying out these ideas. I earnestly hope the change will be made. It will be less expensive in the end and fairer to the enlisted man and his dependents and to the taxpayer.

HON. TOM D. McKEOWN,
OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, September 12, 1917.

Mr. McKEOWN. Mr. Speaker, the patriotism of the American soldier of the war of 1917 will go down in the history of this country side by side with that of the soldier of the Revolution; but the care and comfort afforded the soldier of this war by the American people stand out in bold relief when compared to the poor equipment and commissary of the Revolutionary patriot. In one thing will they equally share, and that is the love and esteem in which they were and are held by the patriotic citizens of their times.

Tories there were in the Revolutionary days, and Tories there are to-day; one as troublesome and despicable as the other. The great majority of the people of the Colonies were in favor of throwing off the yoke of oppression and were so loyal to their principles that no temptation of light taxation deterred them from standing loyal and steadfast for freedom. The temptation to remain a colony was exceedingly great. They were tied to the mother country by tongue, commerce, affection, and blood, but these were not strong enough to quench the longing for freedom and liberty that burned in the hearts of the pioneers of the New World. Cries of "Peace!" and arguments of fatherland and kinship did not deter the progress of the movement for a free, untrammeled people.

The Revolutionary soldier went forth in the beginning of the struggle, furnishing his own equipment and backed by the poorest Government financially on the earth. The soldier and the people at home were accustomed to poverty and the grinding hardships of the early pioneer. The soldier of 1917 is going to the front with the best equipment that money and genius can procure and as the representative of the richest nation on the globe.

Our forefathers of seventy-six wrote their names on the tablets of fame; the soldier of 1917 will prove equally valorous, and will incorporate his name not only upon the roll of honor but will erect in the hearts of free peoples a monument to his memory more lasting, more enduring than any image wrought by the cunning hand of genius.

The soldier of the Revolution fought for the liberty and freedom of the inhabitants of the Thirteen Colonies. The soldier of sixty-one to sixty-five fought for the freedom of millions of slaves; but the soldier of 1917 fights for the freedom of the world, and "freedom" has been the keynote of all our wars—of all our victories!

For their maintenance during their service the soldier of seventy-six was poorly and rarely paid, but the survivors were given large grants of land. The survivors of the war of sixty-one to sixty-five also received land grants. But there are no more fertile acres of public lands to give to the survivors of this war, as public areas for homesteads are exhausted, so it follows that we should give increased compensation to these men, and stand willing to indemnify them against loss of life and limb, and provide term insurance for the benefit of their loved ones.

While I am of the opinion that this bill should be amended in some particulars, yet it is a great measure, and has for its purpose a greater benefit to the survivors of the defenders of the flag of our country and their dependents than any other like measure ever enacted. The spirit of fairness with which the bill has been presented by the gentleman from Texas [Mr. RAYBURN] convinces me that the committee having it in charge is more concerned in endeavoring to assist and compensate the soldiers of this war than for preserving every section and every provision originally written in this measure.

One must have some better reason than the fact that it might have been reported by some other committee, or that experts in pension matters were not consulted, for conscientiously opposing this enactment.

A more splendid body of young men is not to be found upon the earth than the soldier boys of America who are going out to fight in this war. They are physically in fine condition; of the very highest intelligence, and of splendid morals. This Congress has, by law, thrown every precaution around them, to guard as much as possible against the vices which tend to sap their moral and physical strength.

I think we should have gone one step further and provided heavy penalties against the usurers who would take advantage of the soldier and mulct him in larger prices for his necessities than they do other customers. May God have mercy upon and forgive the little, avaricious tradesman who overcharges our patriotic soldiers, because the true American citizen can never forgive him. For myself I hope the days of these criminals may be shortened on the earth, because such people do not deserve to live in "the land of the free and home of the brave."

Many hearts are sad at the loss of the companionship and the presence of our soldier boys, and no place illustrates this condition more vividly and more conspicuously than does this House. Here are Members whose faces and whose actions portray the burden resting on their hearts. What more pathetic scene than to gaze upon our brave and respected Speaker as he goes about his daily tasks without the cheering companionship of his brilliant son? Thousands of other American fathers and mothers have parted, or are soon to part, with their soldier sons. There will be crowded trains leaving loved ones at the stations, and here and there will be the wave of a hand, the glimmer of a tear, as the train passes, and he will be gone, perhaps forever.

When the war is over and the survivors return to receive the thanks and plaudits of a free people, then will we see to it that justice is done and deserving honor is paid to the brave and true ones who helped retain democracy in the world, battling for that result on foreign soil and carrying the Stars and Stripes to the forefront, beyond even the colors of nations compared to which, in history and origin, in point of time, we are mere infants.

I feel it would not be out of place if the Government would lay stress upon the necessity of our soldiers taking advantage of the insurance feature of this measure. There should be a provision relative to their retaining their insurance after the war, requiring the insured to be examined each year. This would help preserve the health of the men, and such physical examinations would lengthen the lives of these citizens. I believe the Government should, as a beneficial measure, require all men and women to be examined physically once a year, after passing the age of 35, in order that their years might be increased.

Soldiers of other wars have returned to their homes after the declarations of peace to find their wives and children suffering in poverty and want and a Government tardy in providing for their unfortunate condition, but, sirs, this certainly will not be even the dream of the soldiers' home-coming in this war. This Congress will look to it that the dependents of our fighting men will be cared for while they are at the front. The citizens who remain at home must earn for the dependent families of those who win our battles. The statement of Capt. John Smith should again be revived: "Those who do not work do not eat."

Soldiers of 1917, emulate the valor of your forefathers of 1776. Enter upon your duties with determination to drive autocracy and despotism from the world and teach all nations that the ships of commerce flying Old Glory shall sail the seven seas, unmolested and unafraid. Go teach the world the true motto of every true patriot: "Give me liberty or give me death."

HON. M. M. NEELY,
OF WEST VIRGINIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Thursday, September 13, 1917.

Mr. NEELY. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include the following letter from Mr. C. Burgess Taylor:

WHEELING, W. VA., August 18, 1917.

Hon. M. M. NEELY,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

MY DEAR SIR: I am in a position to advise you that powerful life-insurance interests in this country are gathering their forces for an attack on the insurance plan proposed by the administration for the purpose of providing for our Army and Navy. Of course, I appreciate the fact that there are many life insurance men in this country whose advice might be valuable in working out the details of an adequate insurance plan, but it is evident that the forces behind this movement are inspired by what they conceive to be the danger of this Government engaging in competition with life insurance companies permanently if this becomes a law.

Of necessity this puts them in a position where their own selfish interests will obscure their vision and warp their judgment. An appeal has been made to me to interpose objections to this measure. This I refuse to do. In fact, if my company should request me to do this, which it has not, I would surrender my position before I would do it. As I see the situation there are two controlling factors which should guide you in this legislation: First, and above anything else, that the largest provision at the lowest possible expenditure to the individual should be made for our soldiers and sailors who may be injured or killed in this war; second, that the provisions of the bill should have especial reference to the elimination of the possibilities of logrolling, pork barrels, and scandals growing out of a pension system.

Of course, there may be details that can be improved or additions that may be desirable, but under no circumstances should the selfish demands of life insurance as a special interest receive any consideration, and I am simply writing this to let you know that you will have my unqualified support in any position which you take in opposition to insurance representatives who are inspired by such motives. The burden of opposition to Government insurance is that the established companies will not be able to compete with this plan.

Speaking for myself, I have only to say that any hardship which might be imposed upon us as representatives of the insurance interests of this country as a result of such legislation, would indeed be a slight sacrifice as compared with the suffering of our soldiers who are called to make the supreme sacrifice for this Nation, and the suffering and anguish that must be endured by those left behind who are bound to them by ties of blood and affection. It seems to me that for those of us who have been exempted by the Government from military service to interpose opposition inspired by our own selfish interests to any legislation which is calculated to alleviate suffering and privations of the victims of this war is very close akin to treason.

I feel sure that it is not necessary for me to make these suggestions to you, but it occurred to me that it might be gratifying for you to know that there are those of us engaged in the great business of life insurance who do not feel that it is your duty to serve our selfish purposes at the expense of the best interests of this Nation.

With kindest personal regards, I am,

Very respectfully, C. BURGESS TAYLOR.

The War With Germany.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JAMES F. BYRNES, OF SOUTH CAROLINA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, September 12, 1917.

Mr. BYRNES of South Carolina. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks in the RECORD, I insert the following patriotic address of Hon. SAM J. NICHOLLS, delivered at Union, S. C., on August 18:

CONGRESSMAN NICHOLLS'S PATRIOTIC ADDRESS.

When I received an invitation from your committee to speak in Union County at a patriotic celebration I was not at all surprised, because, so far as the record shows, Union County is the only county in the United States which furnished more than her quota of men before the draft law was put into effect; therefore, you can see why I was not surprised that patriotic meetings were to be held in your county.

I have spoken with much pride to Cabinet members, to Senators, and to Members of the House about your record, and before I start my discussion of the war proposition I want to again congratulate you upon the splendid record that you have made.

I feel that it is my duty to-day to tell you why we were brought into this war, because I think possibly, holding the position I do, that I am more familiar with the situation than some of you are. You know and I know that no man has fought harder to keep this country out of the terrible conflict across the water than our noble President. Congress was behind him in this matter, and, to be perfectly frank with you, some of us thought we had suffered too much before this wise man gave us the word, "Go."

To begin with, when the Lusitania was sunk and our men, women, and children were sent to the bottom of the sea, the blood of every American citizen rose in his veins and clamored for revenge. Our President said, "Hold! If there is any reasonable way for Germany to explain this terrible tragedy, let us give them a chance to do it." They tried to explain by saying that American citizens should not travel on ships of a belligerent nation. We never conceded this proposition for an instant, but we did, upon their assurance, absolutely sworn to by them, decide that we would await developments and see whether or not they would be true to their pledge and not let the thing occur again. Numerous other cases of the same kind happened and still we took their explanation in each case, hoping almost against hope that Germany really was not trying to force us into the war.

In the meantime Germany had the effrontery to deliberately inform our Government that they intended to sink, not only the ships of belligerent nations but the ships of the United States if they were caught in certain zones, and immediately after this notification they started a wholesale slaughter upon not only the property of American citizens but the lives of your people and mine. Even then, although the whole country and the whole world knew that we had every justification for declaring war, our President desisted, but informed Germany that if these depredations continued we would have to declare a state of war.

While all these murders were being perpetrated our Secret Service men had, of course, been trying to keep up with Germany and find out their real intentions. At this juncture it developed, not by guess, but by direct written testimony, that Germany had made a proposition to Japan and to Mexico to invade our country, murder our citizens, and take our property. They had even gone so far as to promise Mexico the States of Texas, California, and New Mexico in case Germany, with the assistance of Japan and Mexico, could conquer us.

Have you ever heard of a more dastardly attempt to stab us in the back? Here was Germany professing to be our friend, and, at the same time, trying to employ other nations to make war upon us. Even then, after knowing these facts, the President gave Germany an opportunity to explain. He went a great deal further than I would have gone, and a great deal further than the patriotic citizens of Union County would have gone in order to avoid this war.

South Carolina has never sought a conflict, but no man can tell me truthfully that South Carolina ever went so far as to allow her most sacred rights to be invaded without rising up to defend them. These matters which I have told you about are what forced us into this war.

I do not want you to overlook the fact that this country has never declared war on Germany. We have not declared war on Germany. Your Congress has not declared war on Germany. We have declared that a state of war existed between Germany and the United States. It did not take Senators and Members of the House long to come to this conclusion.

Any man that had two grains of sense knows that when our citizens are being murdered and our property destroyed a state of war did exist, and, therefore, it makes me tired, sick, and disgusted when people go over this country stating that your Representatives should not have taken the action which they did.

The proposition is simply this: Under the law any neutral nation is entitled to the use of the high seas. Citizens of the United States have as much right to travel them as you have to travel the roads in front of your homes or the streets in your city. Germany has never been able to deny that this is the law in the case.

When, however, we sought to use the right given us under international law Germany said to us there are certain streets and highways that you can not use, even though you have the right to use them, because you are engaging in commerce with our enemies.

Let us get the proposition down to a plain case: Suppose any of you had business with one of your neighbors, and suppose in order to transact this business you wished to use the public road, when there was no question as to your right to use it, and suppose some man who did not like your neighbor with whom you were doing business stood at the side of the road with a shotgun and told you that you could not pass along this road because he was an enemy of the man with whom you wanted to conduct your relations.

What would have been the result. Knowing you as I do, I know you would have said to him, "I have a right to use this road, and you have no right to stop me, and I am going to arm myself and protect my rights, and if you interfere with me we will shoot this thing out."

That is a rather crude illustration, but that is exactly what we have told Germany, and we are arming ourselves, and we are going to shoot it out. And when we get through the shooting you may rest assured that Germany will not block any more roads.

War is a terrible thing. None of us wanted to get into it. I opposed it as long as there was a chance for us to avoid it honorably. The cost in men and money, the broken hearts, the bloodshed, the suffering of those at home who do not have to go are appalling. I could not but shudder and sigh when I cast my vote as I did.

This war was brought home to me two years ago, when the only brother I had, realizing earlier than we have realized the ruthlessness of these German tyrants, went to England to do his bit to stop them in their murderous course. He to-day fills a soldier's grave on the battle fields of France, but I do not feel that his work was in vain. I only wish that he could have lived to have served his own country in this time of stress. I hope you will pardon this personal allusion. I merely mention it to show to you how well I knew the suffering that this war would bring to our people.

Your ancestors and mine fought for the liberty which you and I now enjoy. Your ancestors and mine by their blood and treasure established a Government that has ever since held the respect of the world. Will you stand quietly by and let a brutal gang of murderers take your liberty away from you, kick you around like a football, and make you the laughing stock of the civilized world?

I know you will not. You are not bred that way. If I thought you would, I would resign my seat in Congress to-morrow, because I would think it was a disgrace to represent you.

Some people are making statements criticizing the administration for declaring a state of war. Some people are criticizing Congress for its action. They have a right to their opinion as to whether or not we should defend our national honor, but that is past history.

The Congress of the United States has decided to defend its national honor. There is no looking back now. We are in this war, and any man who does anything to hinder our success at the front or at home is a traitor to his country and is not worthy of respect of a patriotic citizenship.

Before war was declared we all had a right to our opinion, but since a state of war exists, there can be no halfway ground. Every one of us are either for our country or for Germany. There is no dodging the issue.

Robert E. Lee was opposed to secession, but when his mother State declared for it he resigned his commission in the United States Army and drew his sword to carry out the mandates of his people. You can not make me believe that the people of this country are any less loyal to-day than they were in 1776. You can not make me believe that the people of this country are any less loyal than we Southerners were in 1861. And I know you well enough to know that you will do your duty. The man that deters his country at this time for any reason is the enemy of every patriot who lives in our broad land. Suppose that they should succeed in blocking in any way the early termination of this war. Every day will mean thousands of lives lost; every day will mean millions of dollars spent; and can you tell me that a man who takes this position is a friend of his country?

There have been differences of opinion as to the way of raising the Army to fight this war. I personally believed in and fought with all the might that I possessed for the volunteer system. I gave my reasons in a speech which I made, and which I mailed out to you, for my attitude in this matter. The majority of the House and the administration differed with me and, as between the draft system and the volunteer system, voted for the draft system.

After I had been defeated for the volunteers I voted for a bill which followed the ideas of the majority. It was a question of voting for this bill or not having an army with which to fight this war.

It was such a case as would be in our election system, when in the primary I could not win for my man, and, although I thought that he should have been elected, I voted in the general election for the candidate whom I had opposed. I think this explains to you my position. After the draft bill was passed it became the only law in this land for raising an army, and I propose to uphold the law in every way within my power.

I have talked to you longer than I intended to. I hope I have given you our reasons for getting into this war. We may have been wrong. I do not grant that; but, right or wrong, I am for my country, and I have no respect for the man who is not.

Second War Bond Issue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. CORDELL HULL,

OF TENNESSEE,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

Mr. HULL of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, the second war loan now confronts the United States Government. The chief portion of the loan which the pending measure would authorize is for the benefit of the allied governments, however, and not for domestic purposes. When the loan act of April 24, 1917, was pending, among other things, I stated that "the most powerful blow the United States can strike at this early stage would be to arrange suitable credits for the allies to the end that their armies on the various battle fronts shall be fed, clothed, and otherwise supplied with all the necessary equipment and munitions which will enable them constantly to prosecute their present military operations against the common enemy." This statement is as applicable to present war conditions as it was to those existing in April. I made the further statement on the same occasion that "the fiscal policies which this Government should adopt during the course of the war in order to finance it on sound lines can not receive too serious consideration, for the reason that the wisdom and soundness of its solution will be calculated materially to affect the economic and other affairs of the country both during and after the war." This view is as pertinent now as it was then.

The question as to what proportion of the war expenditures should be met by taxes and what proportion by bonds arose when the April loan was pending and continues to be a fruitful topic of discussion. Commenting on this subject during the consideration of the first loan measure, I said that "my own view is that no fixed rule can be established for all governments, or even for one government." This statement was based upon the idea that many factors must be considered in balancing the amount of taxes and bonds necessary for the prosecution of a given war. The question of whether the war will be of brief or long duration, whether it is a small or a great war, whether the amount of expenditures will be comparatively small or colossal, the question of the country's credit and the relative amount of war taxes the country can bear in the beginning and the increased taxes which it should bear at successive stages, all these are factors deserving consideration. It is the undoubted duty of a government to finance any small war by taxation, and so pay every dollar of the expense "as it goes." As to a great war, such as that in which the country is now engaged, my view from the beginning has been that it should be financed by taxation levied gradually and at successive stages as expenditures increase to the extent of practical endurance, or to the fullest extent reasonably possible, without seriously injuring or dislocating legitimate business. In commenting on our tax resources and tax requirements at that time, I suggested the view in an article given to certain financial publications about August 1, that "the income and excess-profits tax measures could be made to yield $1,000,000,000 each, but that special care should be exercised in arranging their provisions, to the end that they would carve through the business and other profits with accuracy and relative fairness."

The events which have transpired since April, including our rapidly mounting war expenditures to figures far beyond original estimates, have served to confirm the view I then expressed as to the extreme difficulty of determining a fixed rule near the beginning of the war which should measure the relative proportion of bonds and taxes that should be utilized by the Government in the prosecution of the war. As late as May 9, 1917, when the war-revenue bill was reported to the House, the domestic war expenditures for the remainder of the fiscal year 1917, ending June 30, 1917, and for the whole of the present fiscal year, ending June 30, 1918, were estimated to be about $3,800,000,000. The Committee on Ways and Means then reported a revenue measure on the fifty-fifty tax and bond basis. It is now estimated that our domestic war expenditures for the fiscal year 1918 alone will aggregate more than $10,448,000,000. Hence, I repeat that in financing a great war no fixed rule as to the relative proportion of taxes and bonds is possible. The best policy is to levy the largest amount of taxes that can be imposed without actual and serious impairment or disruption of the normal business of the taxpayers, making increases in such tax levies as the war progresses and expenditures swell, and as business adjusts itself to the new conditions which such tax levies create. The remainder of the expenses should be met by the issuance of bonds.

I would heartily approve a levy of $1,000,000,000 each from incomes and excess profits at this time and a higher levy next year.

There has been much discussion as to when the bond issues to defray the expenses of the war should be paid off. Naturally, the bonds to furnish loans to the allies will have to be made to mature at such times as the allies can make payment. A different rule should apply to the bond issues for domestic war purposes. The best policy would be to wipe out such bonded indebtedness as rapidly as the undertaking can be accomplished without tax levies unduly burdensome or oppressive. The time required would depend both on the amount of such bonded indebtedness and the ability of the people to pay taxes to meet it. The chief portion of these bonds issued for domestic purposes should be made optional or redeemable within five years, or near that period, after the close of the war, to the end that the serial bond method might be adopted; at a time, too, when the aggregate amount of such indebtedness will be ascertainable. This would insure the payment of a fixed percentage annually.

The sinking-fund method, even though the law should contain very mandatory provisions, usually results in delay and postponement of the payment of public indebtedness. As a part of the serial-bond plan, I repeat a view heretofore expressed, that it would be wise and feasible to readjust the estate tax rates so as to secure a revenue yield of $200,000,000 annually, the same to be applied as one item only on serial bond payments. The States could still derive almost double the amount of their present inheritance-tax yield and the level of inheritance or estate taxation would not be above the peace level of such taxation in England prior to the war.

In formulating and prosecuting the soundest policy of financing the present war, our Government had many lights by which to be guided. We have our own experience; we also have the present and past experience of Great Britain, a country that has financed more wars, little and big, than any other country in existence. It may here be pointed out that the practice inaugurated by the British Government with respect to the issuance of war loans has been followed by most other warring countries.

The following extract from a Swiss financial publication descriptive of the British policy is of interest:

The continuous issue of short-dated notes attracts the money available as and when it appears in the market, and it is thus drained into the exchequers, which are thereby enabled to provide, day by day, for their current expenditure. The long-dated loans, which are issued from time to time, have as their principal object the consolidation of the floating debt, whilst the provision of fresh funds through appeals to the public in general, and the small investor, to whom the treasury bills are frequently unknown and inaccessible as an investment, only forms a secondary consideration.

It is important in this connection to note that England has pursued the general policy of financing the war by short-term loans, and has only utilized long-term loans for the purpose of absorbing the excess of short-term paper as it has accumulated. She manifests no disposition to abandon this policy. Only three long-term loans have thus far been made by England. This course avoids the locking up of capital in long-term loans and affords the manifest advantage of a constant flow of money derived from savings and profits into the treasury, where it is immediately distributed back into the channels of commerce, trade, and industry. About five different kinds of short-term paper has thus far been utilized, as follows: The war-savings certificate, in denominations of £1 up to £500; exchequer bonds, in denominations of £5 to £5,000, interest payable semiannually and running generally from two to five years; war-expenditure certificates, in denominations running up to £10,000, running generally about two years; ways and means advances, which are sums advanced temporarily to the Government by the Bank of England; and treasury bills of similar short-term nature. These classes of paper are constantly utilized for the twofold purpose of anticipating revenue and financing the war. This floating debt at times has amounted to more than $7,000,000,000, but when it has become too heavy a long-term loan has been made in order to bring down its amount. One outstanding feature relating to the financing of the war by England has been the heavy restrictions imposed on all Government expenditures not immediately required for war purposes and on private expenditures whenever such restriction was possible. Investments of private capital in any but war loans have been prohibited as fully as could be done. The following statement of Lord Cecil, a leading war official, made on August 11, is very pertinent.

The people have responded wonderfully to appeals for voluntary restrictions in food expenditures, and an increasing proportion of all classes is practicing economy in every possible direction, putting the fruit of such economy at the service of the Government in the form of loans. Popular loans have had a wide success, and to-day over 35,000 civilian associations are at work collecting small private war-loan subscriptions.

In floating the English long-term loan of $5,000,000,000 in February last the manner in which the transfer of cash from the money market to the treasury was made without stringency or disturbance was almost remarkable. The greater part was disbursed almost as received for redemption of the floating debt rather than in payment of supplies. In the second place, the Bank of England previously borrowed some $500,000,000 from outside banks, and when the time came to pay for the bonds this money was turned over to the banks for their use. It is also worthy of note that this great loan was subscribed almost entirely by the public. The banks kept out to prevent inflation.

It will be seen that England has issued such different kinds of short-term paper as was calculated to meet the desire and condition of each class of investors, large and small. More than $500,000,000 of war-savings certificates have been taken by the very small investors. Apart from the money which the treasury has secured through this channel and the encouragement to adopt a policy of saving among this class, perhaps the most important benefit derived has been the fact that all this class of investors have become strongly interested in sustaining the Government finances. In making his financial statement on May 2, 1917, Mr. Bonar Law said:

In my judgment there is nothing in connection with the financing of the war which is so satisfactory as the way in which men of small means have contributed to the expenses of the war through this medium.

At the close of the Napoleonic wars England's debt was $4,000,000,000 and her national income was $1,250,000,000. At the beginning of the present war her income was about $12,500,000,000. At this latter rate she could now go in debt $40,000,000,000.

Up to July 24 last England had loaned to her allies and the dominions $5,125,000,000, of which amount $730,000,000 was loaned to her dominions. During the last fiscal year England loaned her allies alone $2,700,000,000. In the budget for the present fiscal year ending April 1, 1918, $2,000,000,000 was included for the allies. It is thus seen that England has been making loans and making provision for loans to her allies since the United States entered the war, notwithstanding the expectation that the United States Government will make similar loans in considerable amounts. The English debt at the outbreak of the war was $3,256,000,000. This amount has been increased during the war by the further sum of $19,325,000,000, making a total debt of $22,581,000,000 up to August 4, 1917. Since May 6, 1917, the average daily expenditures have been $32,075,000 per day. If this rate of expenditure keeps up, England will have to borrow during this fiscal year ending April 1 next some $7,000,000,000, making a total of $29,581,000,000. English statesmen estimate that their debt at the close of the war will bear an average interest rate of 5 per cent. This would involve an interest expenditure of near $1,500,000,000 per year after the 1st of April next, according to the foregoing.

The British prewar interest level ranged around 3 to 3½ per cent. She floated her first long-term war loan at the rate of 3½ per cent—but the bonds were sold at 95—subject to income tax, normal and super. She floated her second loan at the rate of 4½ per cent, subject to like income tax. Other loans, such as war-expenditure certificates and treasury bills, are also subject to this tax. The conversion privilege was given to the purchasers under the former 3½ per cent loan and also to holders of consols. About $1,320,000,000 was converted into the 4½ per cent loan. As the demand for money grew stronger both the 3½ per cent and 4½ per cent bonds went to a discount. In February, 1917, England made her third long-term loan. In connection with this last loan she had $10,245,000,000 of convertible securities. This last great loan was offered to the public on alternative terms. The interest level at that time, income tax included, was estimated to be around 5½ per cent. The normal income tax was 25 per cent. The proposal of bonds at 4 per cent, par value, subject only to supertax, was only subscribed to the extent of 2 per cent of the total subscriptions. The other offer of a 5 per cent bond at 95 and subject to both normal and super income tax was generally taken by the public. This carried an interest rate equivalent to 5½ per cent. It is thus seen that the first English war loan was practically on a 4 per cent basis, the next on a 4½ per cent basis, and the next and last on a 5½ per cent basis.

It has long been the policy of the English Government to tax the interest on its public debt. The last long-term loan, in February, carries no conversion privileges. Purchasers of the first 3½ per cent loan were allowed to convert into the 4½ per cent loan, but were denied conversion rights in the later 5½ per cent loan, although holders of the 4½ per cent and certain other securities were allowed such conversion privileges. The expenses of floating the last English loan may be of interest. A commission of one-eighth of 1 per cent was allowed bankers, stockbrokers, and financial houses on allotments made in respect to cash applications, not including applications for conversion. The additional expense item to the government is represented to have been $375,000. It is interesting to note in this connection the statement of Sir Thomas White, minister of finance, made in the Canadian Parliament on August 7, 1917, relative to the expense of floating the recent $100,000,000 Canadian loan in the United States. This loan was issued at 98. J. P. Morgan & Co., who headed the underwriting syndicate, received $1,750,000, being commission at the rate of 1¾ per cent.

France has been proposing long-term loans, tax free, at interest rates from 5 to 5¾ per cent.

Germany has floated six important loans, carrying interest rates averaging near 5 per cent. As a rule, European Governments have been offering their bonds at below par and redeemable at par, so that the nominal interest rate is often misleading. The German Government has resorted to every possible method in order to make her loans a success. She has considerably extended the subscription period and also the period during which payments shall be made. The final payment of her last loan embraced a five-month period. Lengthy notice is given as to the intention of the Government to issue a loan. The Government announced on the 1st of June that the fifth loan would be issued at the end of September. Special facilities are given to small subscribers. The Government has limited transactions on the bourse and required bankers to aid in the prevention of investment by the public in industrial securities. Large financial institutions refused to sell industrial shares to the public on credit. The banks have been able to dispose of their war-loan holdings without loss because the stock was not allowed to fall to a discount. The banks, by arrangement with the Government, raised their deposit rates, provided the deposits were earmarked for the loan. These and numerous other methods have been adopted in Germany in aid of the flotation of her various loans. Owing to the isolated situation of Germany and all her financial operations, but little value can be attached to her methods of financing. The seventh German war loan, it is announced, will be open for subscription September 19, with 5 per cent bonds issued at 98 and 4½ per cent treasury certificates carrying a bonus entitling the holder to 110 to 120 at redemption.

Until recently, at least, the interest level in most of the important countries of Europe has ranged around 5 to 5½ per cent and over. As far back as May last Russia floated a loan of $1,545,000,000 at 85, bearing a nominal interest rate of 5 per cent. During the same month Japan floated a domestic loan of $20,000,000 at 95 and bearing 5 per cent interest, which was in effect a 5¼ per cent rate. With the balance of trade against her and her wealth considerably diffused and scattered, Canada has been paying rather high interest rates. She is now preparing to issue her fourth domestic war loan, amounting to $100,000,000, at an interest rate of 6 per cent. The conversion privilege was dropped in her recent loans, but has since been allowed by appropriate action since they were made.

The example which the war financing policies of another country offers may be only valuable to the United States to the extent that conditions are similar. For instance, at the outbreak of the war England had $20,000,000,000 loaned to people and concerns in foreign countries, of which $2,000,000,000 was loaned to persons in the United States. This huge amount of wealth has been largely available to England as a ready means of financing the war at each successive stage. She has not only been able to sell her securities to other countries, but to have these immense individual loans called, as it were; whereas the United States, prior to the war, had always been a borrowing Nation and owed some $4,500,000,000 abroad. She is now called upon for the first time, not only to become a lending Nation, but to lend to the extent practically of financing in a measure all important countries, including South America, and the various allied Governments. This is a huge undertaking, but I have the utmost confidence that the American people are capable of coping with it. To do so, however, will call forth the greatest available yield in all lines of productivity. Our capacity to produce is almost unlimited. From the profits and savings of the people engaged in each of such lines must come the chief resources necessary to do this worldwide financing successfully. Of course existing surplus and savings already accumulated, and such portions of capital as may not be indispensable to the normal operation and development of our financial, commercial, and industrial affairs will also be utilized. The average annual corporate financing in this country has been about $1,650,000,000. Add to this the amount done for foreign countries during 1916, which is $1,110,000,000, and also the amount of our securities repurchased from abroad during that year, which is $1,100,000,000, there results a total of $3,860,000,000. This amount of financing for the last year did not in the least tax the capacity of this country.

Coming now to the question of war loans, the Government has already floated a loan of $2,000,000,000 at 3½ per cent, tax free, for the benefit of the allies. The second war-loan measure now pending proposes a 4 per cent interest rate subject to the additional or super income tax. The almost complete lack of comment in the financial and trade publications relative to the terms of the proposed loan is somewhat strange in view of the magnitude and importance of the loan. A number of considerations worthy of discussion arise in connection with the proposed and future loans which the war is expected to require. Should they be short or long-term loans, in the main? Should they be subject to tax, and if so, to what extent, when, and how? Should each successive loan carry the conversion privilege, and if so, to what extent? Is the interest rate proposed suitable in the light of all existing conditions? These and other questions naturally arise in the minds of both Government officials and prospective investors.

Naturally, at this third-year stage of the war, the money markets of the world show a somewhat higher rate of interest on government bonds than at its beginning. During former wars peace or neutral countries maintained lower rates of interest than the belligerent countries. This condition does not obtain at present, however, in view of the almost universal existence of the war. The result is that gilt-edged securities of any government, possessing even unlimited resources with which to pay, do not receive quite the same interest advantages that would otherwise be obtainable. Naturally, the citizen or investor desires an interest rate reasonably satisfactory, in addition to the patriotic motives inspiring him to make the purchase of government securities, and also that the capital value will not decline. As to the recent issue of 3½ per cent bonds, tax free, it must be evident that they are entirely acceptable as an investment to those who are subject to high rates of income tax when compared with standard investments yielding 6 per cent subject to such tax. To the smaller and middle class investors who would either scarcely or not at all be affected by the additional or superincome tax, the proposed 4 per cent bond would be correspondingly more attractive.

It would appear during the past few days from the operations in financial centers that many of the large income-tax payers are stocking up on State, county, and municipal bonds which are tax free. The real value of the Government bond in this country is more or less affected by different considerations. The interest rate would come first; the taxation of such interest would naturally be considered even in fixing the interest rate. The desirability and hence the real value of a Government bond would also be affected by the existence of a large amount of tax-free State and municipal securities which are available to those who might otherwise take the Government bonds. These local securities, tax exempt, aggregate more than $4,500,000,000, and are worth from 4 per cent to 4¾ per cent net to investors. It has been difficult to gauge the real value of the $2,000,000,000 3½ per cent bonds already floated on account of the prospective issue of a large amount of additional Government bonds and also by reason of the conversion privilege contained in the 3½ per cent bond. The experience of other leading countries during the war when engaged in successive bond issues has been that many have termed the interest rates too high, while others have as strongly insisted that they were too low. One factor always present in such circumstances has been the constant efforts of persons and groups of persons to create artificial fluctuations in the value of such bonds. The underlying motive for their course appears to have embraced the question of both conversion privilege and higher interest rates. I think it will soon become important for this Government to adopt a modified form of the English expedient of stabilizing our bond values by providing against depreciation in the market prices and capital values due to such artificial agitation. The English method provided that the treasury should set aside monthly a sum equal to one-eighth of 1 per cent of the amount of each loan to form a fund to be used for purchasing bonds of either loan for cancellation whenever the market price falls below the issue price. The English limitation on this fund was $50,000,000; it could be made less in this country. Under this method whenever the amount set aside reached $50,000,000 further payments for this purpose are suspended until the unexpended balance falls below the maximum amount prescribed for redemption purposes.

In floating bonds for war purposes the matter of primary consideration is to make a successful sale in order to get emergency funds. The next question, of secondary importance, is to so conduct such financing as to protect the taxpayers from unnecessary burdens in meeting the interest during and especially after the war. As a rule war bonds have sold at a premium after the war. Our sixes issued in 1861 first declined, but at the end of the war were 110⅜, and they reached 128¾ in the year 1876. Our five-twenties of 1862 went to 125¼ before 1870. At one time during the Civil War the gold value of United States notes was 38.7 per cent and the real interest paid by the Government was 15½ per cent. The average nominal interest paid by the Government during the Civil War was about 6 per cent in gold. This average rate was gradually cut down to 4½ per cent following the war. In 1793, when France declared war on Great Britain, the British consols stood at 97. They went to 47¼ in 1798; they gradually rose from 1815 until some years later they reached their prewar value. Naturally, the length and result of the war are strong factors affecting value and interest of bonds.

The large and rapidly increasing volume of tax-free State, county, and municipal bonds is becoming a serious problem in connection with the huge war financing of the Federal Government. The desire to get the lowest possible rates of interest has naturally been a strong incentive to States and local governments to fall into the policy of issuing tax-free bonds. The fact that at the outbreak of the war we had some $15,000,000,000 of property in this country exempt from all taxation raises sharply the question as to how far the Federal Government and the States should go in permitting larger blocks of wealth to become securely locked up in tax-free securities. The Supreme Court of the United States has always held that under our dual form of government prior to the sixteenth amendment the Federal Government could not by any statute tax the agencies or instrumentalities of the State and local governments, and, vice versa, that the States could not tax Federal agencies. Apart from the question of power, the question of policy also arises. It is not wise policy to allow 48 States to impose varying tax rates on Federal securities, and, on the other hand, it is a questionable policy as to whether the Federal Government should undertake to impose taxes on State and local bonds unless fiscal considerations should make it a matter of last resort. The States, at least, should be given an opportunity by concerted action to establish uniform rates on their bonds. If they should fail or refuse to do this and the exigency should require it, the Federal Government might have no other recourse than to undertake to impose a uniform tax. The possibility or probability that our huge block of State and local tax-free securities may soon be brought within the range of some kind of taxation will in a measure offset the otherwise injurious effect they may have on the Federal bond market. The fact also that such bonds are taxable in all other States except the States where issued, and the further fact that most of the States, following the war, will probably prosecute tax reforms to the extent of dealing comprehensively with intangible and other personalty will have a saving effect on the Federal bond situation.

The Secretary of the Treasury has fixed the recent $2,000,000,000 issue for the allies at a 15-30 year basis. Since we do not expect the bonds issued as loans to the allies to become a burden upon our own people, the terms of redemption and maturity will naturally conform to the wishes and necessities of the allied Governments to whom the proceeds are loaned. A different consideration arises in connection with the flotation of bonds for domestic purposes. The economic history of all important commercial countries has been that a long period of high prices is generally followed by a longer period of depression. For example, after the Baring failure the rate of interest on money in England was very low, averaging near 2 per cent for nine years and until the Boer War. This experience is especially true when the causes of high prices and commercial and industrial activity have been world wide. In the present circumstances the cause is due not to the ordinary business boom attended with excessive speculation, but is due to war. It remains to be seen as to whether after the four or five years of commercial and industrial activity due to rehabilitation and reconstruction, which will naturally follow the ending of the war, the world will lapse into a period of business depression and low prices in accordance with the rule of commercial, financial, and industrial experience just stated. It is true that following the reconstruction period of previous great wars we have seen very low rates for money. The fact, however, that the present war will leave the capital of the world greatly depleted will have to be considered.

This leads to the question as to the terms of redemption, maturity, and so forth, of our bonds. It is suggested by some that we need have no special concern as to the question of interest or taxation at present for the reason that the bonds can be refunded into lower rates of interest following the war. This view is ordinarily correct. We should be mindful of the fact, however, that if the war should continue another year the world would have $125,000,000,000 to $150,000,000,000 of war debt to be thus refunded, and the United States would have $25,000,000,000 to $30,000,000,000. In the light of probable conditions after the war—the fact that no capital will be obtainable from other countries and the further fact that most corporate financing, except of a temporary nature, will be postponed until the end of the war—will render it very difficult to refund this huge amount into lower rates of interest within any short period of time. The policy of issuing long-term bonds during the war until the interest rate gets too high above the ordinary peace level may not prove advisable, but instead it may be found to be good fiscal policy to rely on short-term loans bearing such high rates of interest as might exist during the acute stage of the war and when money is in greatest demand. This course would avoid the possible danger by use of the conversion privilege of swinging the entire public debt up to the highest interest rate to which money may go during the most pressing stage of the war.

Thus far the Secretary of the Treasury, upon whose shoulders has fallen the chief responsibility of devising sound policies for financing the war, has performed his duties with great ability and sound business judgment. I think he can be relied upon thus to sustain himself through the course of this arduous period with as much credit as any American citizen who has in the past or who might now occupy his position. He has suggested that the present proposed loan carry interest rate of 4 per cent, subject to the additional or superincome tax. In view of his good judgment and his superior facilities for ascertaining the true conditions of the money market and the financial resources of the country, I cheerfully acquiesce in this proposal, as I deem it the duty of every citizen no less informed to do. I have for some time been of opinion that in amassing the great war debt which the Government is being compelled to incur the right of the Government to tax the interest on this debt, either now or following the war, should not be surrendered. At the best, the amount of the world's capital which will be found to be exempt from taxation at the close of the war for a generation will be appalling. With the right to tax reserved, the curse of a bonded aristocracy can be avoided and the interest advantages accruing to the bondholders can always be kept on a level justly proportionate to interest advantages derived from other sources. Few greater evils could arise than the entire tax exemption of our public debt growing out of the war, especially if a period of depression and hard times should follow the reconstruction period, which would present a situation in which would be found one class of idle and wealthy bondholders owing no financial obligations to the Federal, State, or local governments, and another class composed of the masses subject in their privations to enormous taxes to pay both the interest and the principal of such bonds and other expenses of the Government. Such condition would greatly conduce to socialism. There is room for discussion as to the method of dealing with these tax questions. The suggestion has been made that an alternative bond proposal be offered in the way of a 3½ per cent tax-free bond in order that persons subject to the higher income tax rates which would render the 4 per cent superincome tax bonds uninviting might avail themselves of a bond bearing this lower rate of interest without tax. This, of course, is equivalent to compounding a flat income tax of 12½ per cent, which, deducted from the 4 per cent rate, would leave the suggested 3½ per cent rate. This would still fail to meet the difficulties sought to be obviated by the imposition of the supertax on the 4 per cent bond, and that is to keep the interest advantages of the large and the small investor more nearly on a parity when compared with the interest advantages derived from a standard investment at 6 per cent.

Since the capital value of the bond must be based upon its net value after deducting income tax, in comparison with other securities which are available for investment, the problem of offering and maintaining relatively fair interest advantages to all classes of investors, in the light of the effects of the graduated income-tax rates, is a most difficult one. Since the terms of the present proposed loan have already been decided on by the Treasury and by the House, it is scarcely necessary further to discuss the tax and interest problem. The effect of the proposed terms of 4 per cent subject to supertax is the compounding of the present normal income tax of 4 per cent in a suggested interest rate of 4.16⅔, subject to all income tax, which would leave a flat 4 per cent interest rate subject to supertax. Where full power to tax is given, the interest rate does not become of so much importance. It is said that if the interest rate for forthcoming Government loans should be fixed at 4½ per cent, subject to both normal and additional or super income tax, this would depress the industrial-security market. This view is hardly sustained, for the reason that the imposition of the tax would prevent such conditions from arising.

In one aspect the war burdens of the United States Government are made unusually heavy. This is due to the fact that prices in all lines had practically doubled when the United States entered the war. This entails almost double costs in the aggregate. When it is considered that the Government is paying to the citizens these enormously high prices for all supplies, every consideration of patriotism requires the fullest cooperation with the Government in paying taxes and in the work of securing loans on the most satisfactory terms possible to be had. The real success of a loan depends not only upon the amount of money secured but the widespread character of subscriptions by the public generally.

To maintain the sound credit of the Government as the war progresses, and its consequent ability to borrow on the most satisfactory terms, requires the largest measure of taxation, as war financing most important to avoid as far as possible is inflation. While Europe is still nominally on a gold basis she is not so in fact. I wish I had the space to set out the figures showing the floods of what is practically fiat money that has been issued and cast afloat over there. To finance the war as far as possible by taxation and to purchase bonds to the fullest possible extent out of earnings, profits, and savings will aid most in avoiding inflation.

The motto of every citizen should be to produce and to save. He should then be content to turn over to the Government, if necessary, the maximum amount of his profits and savings above the portion strictly necessary for personal and business requirements. Gladstone said "it is more difficult to save a shilling than to spend a million." If the war should continue for another year or more, the extreme necessity for producing and saving with a view to aiding the Government to the fullest possible extent will later become far more apparent than now. No citizen should lag in his support of the Government during the war.

War-Risk Insurance.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. JOHN M. ROSE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, I am in receipt of a letter from one of my constituents, a physician, from which I quote as follows:

I am writing you to get your influence in the matter of soldiers' insurance, to the effect that legislation in this respect will permit the Government to pay the premiums on any insurance that a soldier may now carry in an approved "old-line company" up to the amount the Government would insure that individual, as many of us have a form of insurance that we do not wish to drop for the reason that the Government insurance may cease after the war is over and we may be disabled so that we are not insurable, or we may have to take out insurance at an increased age, and consequently an increased premium.

During the discussion of section 24 I undertook to bring this condition to the attention of the House, and in the hope that something may yet be done to safeguard the interests of the soldiers I again call the attention of the Members to the matter contained in the extract quoted.

We have been legislating for a period of five months and during that time have made appropriations and bond issues for billions of dollars to secure food and munitions for ourselves and our allies, and only a short time ago provisions were made for raising more than $11,000,000,000 to be used for the purposes of the present emergency, and many times while the bill was pending but a handful of Members were present in this Chamber.

The present bill has been pending for at least five legislative days and has been given closer and more thoughtful attention than any of the war measures yet considered. In my opinion, this bill is of equal if not surpassing importance to any of the great war measures thus far considered, as it undertakes to care for the injured soldiers or those dependent upon them and not with the implements to destroy life. It is a scientific attempt to provide for the immediate needs of our soldier boys, and while it may be truthfully said that we were entirely too liberal with ourselves and too reckless with the rights of posterity in the methods adopted in the revenue and bond bill, I feel constrained to say that we can not be too liberal and too generous in our effort to properly care for those who will actually fight our battles and for those who are depending upon them.

I do not desire to assail our present pension system, as it has been the means of great good and was the best system that could be devised at the time of the passage of the various laws covering the payment of pensions, but in the light of present-day needs the plan has outlived its usefulness, and it is high time that something be done by which it is possible to supply the present wants of the soldiers rather than to force them to run the gantlet of expert officials who require, and rightly so under the present laws, compliance with conditions which in many instances are well nigh impossible.

I am willing to be governed by the opinion of the heads of the several departments as to the best methods of securing compensation or pensions for our soldiers, and do not want to believe that the widening or extending of the policies of the Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department will result in effecting a great political machine, as that would be unpatriotic and ungenerous and a total disregard of the pronounced policy of the present administration, and I am not ready to impute such motives to our officials.

The extension of time which claims for pensions or compensation may be filed and considered, and the placing of all soldiers and sailors engaged in the present emergency, upon an equal basis, is a sound policy and should tend to popularize the proposed law and secure for it the approval of those who have heretofore taken part in any of our wars.

The attempt to limit the time to one year, during which claims may be filed for compensation and pension, was defeated only after a long, hard struggle, and I am happy to say that conditions under which we have acted since pension legislation was first established, and with which we are all familiar, have been partially retained.

We are all proud as citizens of the United States to claim our citizenship, and sometimes we are loath to assume responsibilities; but living as we do in a country where all men are presumed to be equal, and all alike responsible for the defense of the Nation, and its institutions, we who remain at home, while performing functions that are necessary, should act with the greatest possible liberality toward the men who offer their lives in the defense of the country, and this bill attempts, and I hope will, give to the men and their families, without unnecessary delay, the assistance and comfort which the country owes to them who fight the battles. The soldier always has been and should be the object of our special care; and the fact that under this bill liberal provisions are made for the soldier and those dependent upon him should be considered as an acknowledgment of our gratitude of the men who are willing to risk their lives that our Government might live.

While I am not satisfied with all of the provisions of the bill, because in many of its sections it is too indefinite and uncertain, I can see no basis of sound criticism against it as a whole, and being of the opinion that our soldiers and sailors are deserving of all the Nation can properly do for them, I shall support the measure.

The Judge and the Statute.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY J. STEELE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 14, 1917.

Mr. STEELE. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address delivered before the judicial section of the American Bar Association at Saratoga Springs, N. Y., on September 4, 1917, by WARREN GARD, Representative in Congress from the third congressional district of Ohio. The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED BEFORE THE JUDICIAL SECTION OF THE AMERICAN BAR ASSOCIATION AT SARATOGA SPRINGS, N. Y., ON SEPTEMBER 4, 1917, BY WARREN GARD, REPRESENTATIVE IN CONGRESS FROM THE THIRD CONGRESSIONAL DISTRICT OF OHIO.

THE JUDGE AND THE STATUTE.

The framers of the Constitution of the United States, in the preamble thereof, said:

We, the people of the United States, in order to form a more perfect union, establish justice, insure domestic tranquillity, provide for the common defense, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty to ourselves and our posterity, do ordain and establish this Constitution for the United States of America.

It is therefore seen that one of the very first purposes of the Constitution was to establish justice.

There can be nothing higher than this in any governmental function—the establishing of full, fair, and complete justice between Nation, State, men, and women.

To-day, with the greatest armed conflict the world has ever known raging fiercely across the seas, our own country contributing of its treasure and its citizens in defense of those principles we have held ever sacred and necessary to the continuance of this democratic republican form of government, I am of those who hope when victory shall come to the cause of the United States, "when the war drums throb no longer," that an "enduring peace" "based upon justice and fairness and the common rights of mankind" will rise from battle field, burned cities, towns, and countryside, and the buried and unburied dead; that then the nations shall agree upon an international code of laws, adopting the words of our Constitution, and "establish justice, insure tranquillity, promote the general welfare, and secure the blessings of liberty."

Surely the futility of war's horrors and its utter barbarism will appeal to the minds of the people generally and a tribunal be created where international affairs may be considered and determined from the evidence and by the processes of reason.

Justice is the triumph of reason, and the justice which is recognized and adhered to by nations will be the triumph of civilization.

Coming from the law-making side of this Government to its law-interpreting side, I feel I meet a realization by you representing many courts that the great changes now being made in our civil affairs will not all be reversed, but may be added to in that a greater, stronger, wider power may vest in departments of the Government to promote the general welfare.

From the old days when the protection of property was the chief object of legislation to this day is a far cry, for the legislation of the day must affect and protect the rights of people, many of whom have not and never will have ownership of property.

Legislation protecting the rights of men, women, and children is the most important legislation which will probably be submitted for interpretation, and therefore of vital importance is the subject, "The judge and the statute."

By constitutional division, Article I relates to "legislative powers"; Article II recites the "executive powers"; and Article III defines the vesting of "the judicial power."

It is, of course, commonly understood that in the powers granted each of these divisions by the Constitution each is supreme.

So long, therefore, as there be no question of conflict the Congress makes the national laws, the executive enforces these laws, and the courts interpret them.

Just a few years ago agitation was quite widespread against the action of courts in setting aside as unconstitutional certain legislative enactments, both in States and the Nation, and criticisms were made that we were ridden with what were called "judge-made laws."

This agitation was not confined to the impractical or the ignorant, but it attained the dignity of indorsement by aggressive political leaders, even one political party going upon platform record with professed remedies of change in the judicial system.

The recall of judges and the recall of judicial decisions, how much did we hear of them and how for a time they did attract the public attention.

At the present time—since the seventeenth amendment to the Constitution of the United States, which provides that "the Senate of the United States shall be composed of two Senators from each State, elected by the people thereof"—the judges of Federal courts are the only persons of constitutional authority under our scheme of government who are not directly elected by and responsible to the people.

The judge of a court controlled by the Federal Government is given his appointment "during good behavior," and he alone does not have to take his stewardship back to the public for approval or disapproval.

Surely, then, a realization of tremendous trust should be in men who hold these extraordinary commissions.

It has been questioned if the policy of appointing judges for a life tenure is in accord with republican institutions.

Among the reasons for the creation of a life tenure of Federal judges one undoubtedly was that at the time of the adoption of the Constitution judges were so appointed in the different State jurisdictions, but nearly all the States now elect their judges; most of them elect by the people, and a very few by their legislatures.

Some States, desiring to hold in all things the judiciary separate and apart from partisan politics, have enacted legislation which provides that the judge must be elected by the people from a so-called nonpartisan ballot, upon which the names of the candidates appear without party designation or indication.

Theoretically this is entirely sound, but in practice it does not always work out in the way its proponents thought.

One who is a candidate for a judicial position is most often only well known in a limited locality, for a hard-working lawyer is employed either in his office or in the courtroom, and therefore is not generally of wide acquaintance throughout a State or, indeed, in a very large district.

Then, too, the political parties still make nominations for these judicial positions and strive to elect their nominees.

It is the experience of States having this nonpartisan law that the ticket containing the names of the judicial candidates receives not in excess of 70 per cent of the votes cast for the regular or partisan ticket.

This is accounted for principally by the fact that many voters have no personal acquaintance with any of the judicial candidates, who must depend upon their personality and have back of them no platform or declaration of principles from which the voter may choose to make his expression.

It is general with State-wide judicial candidates that their fortunes follow those of the dominant political party, but to the credit of the judiciary, Federal and State, appointive or elective, be it said that its conduct is independent of politics and, except in extremely isolated cases, free of corruption.

Much of its criticism has been the result of what is called judicial usurpation.

Article VI of the Constitution of the United States provides:

> This Constitution, and the laws of the United States which shall be made in pursuance thereof, and all treaties made or which shall be made under the authority of the United States shall be the supreme law of the land, and the judges in every State shall be bound thereby, anything in the constitution or laws of any State to the contrary notwithstanding.

Section 2 of Article III of the Constitution provides:

> The judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and equity arising under this Constitution, the laws of the United States, and treaties made or which shall be made under their authority; to all cases affecting ambassadors, other public ministers, and consuls; to all cases of admiralty and maritime jurisdiction; to controversies between two or more States; between a State and citizens of another State; between citizens of different States; between citizens of the same State claiming lands under grants of different States, and between a State, or the citizens thereof, and foreign States, citizens or subjects.

Upon this language is the power of the courts founded and by this language is their power limited.

In considering this language it is well to understand that of all the countries of the world which have written constitutions and laws the United States is the notable example of adherence to the principle that the court may uphold or set aside a legislative enactment.

It is upon this, apparently, that the whole case of discontent is rested.

From this arose the proposition to recall judges and to recall judicial decisions. Some of our States, indeed, have laws for the recall of judges, which laws are honored more in not being used than in the strict observance of frequent use.

Indeed, carried to a radical conclusion, such recall must mean a demoralization of the morale of the bench, the taking away of necessary independence of thought and action and the substitution therefor of popular approval or disapproval as evidenced by the tumult of the day.

A limited portion of the population, entirely ignorant of the facts or of the law concerning a given case, may temporarily decide that the judge making even a correct and honest decision, but one which has fallen foul of public sentiment, should be removed by their recall.

That this opinion of the electorate may be transitory does not avail; that it may be wrong brings no redress to the wronged.

Clearly, then, any plan which would permit even an entire State electorate, with little or no knowledge, to recall a judge who may have rendered a just but temporarily unpopular judgment is fraught with much danger.

If used at all it is incontrovertible that it should be safeguarded by conditions which would place it at a time when popular fury should not take the place of reason and when ignorance of the facts could be succeeded by the fullest information.

Even more potential for harm was the proposition to recall judicial decisions.

If based upon a wider application than a legislative veto of a judicial decree it would work untold danger by destroying decrees which were the result of careful study and consideration.

But this is a government "of the people, by the people, and for the people." That this may continue the judiciary should be independent, fearless, and honest.

It can not continue if the judiciary arrogate to itself powers it does not properly have, and in its extension of authority usurp the constitutional functions of the law-making body.

The radical would destroy the principles of court procedure and substitute in its stead a vague system of personal responsibility and judgment based on conditions as they appeal to the individual opinion of the judge sitting in the case and by so doing he convicts himself of error when he first complains that judges have too much power, and then by conferring upon them absolute power without other restriction than the whimsicalities of the judge.

It is apparent that the recall of judges and recall of judicial decisions will not remedy that at which certain criticism of the day is directed.

With the thought in mind that it is only the most unusual case when the character of the judge is such as to suggest his recall and that the usual criticism is the dislike of decisions he may render, we come to consider very practical methods of remedy and relief.

I have seen and been a part of the very cumbersome machinery necessary to the impeachment of a Federal officer.

Its almost interminable length of accusation, investigation, and trial, with the whole of the Senate of the United States sitting as a court, nullifies almost at once its usefulness as a measure of removal.

The reluctance to give over all of the time of one-half of the law-making body of this entire country for a long period to the trial of an accused judge in itself constitutes a barrier to many proceedings.

Impeachment proceedings, therefore, should be made workable and after all the safeguards of complete investigation have been afforded one accused and there appears absolute evidence in support of the charges of impeachment, it would seem that the hearing of these charges could be given to a committee of the Senate in numbers small enough to permit each member thereof to be present at all times, and that they receive the evidence of all witnesses, hear all of the accusation and its denial or explanation, listen to the argument of prosecutors and those appearing for the respondent, and then make a report with all evidence printed to the full body of the Senate that all members thereof may then vote.

With 96 Members of the Senate one can readily see that a very small part of this membership is present in the consideration of impeachment proceedings daily; that with few exceptions the members come and go and hear little of the evidence as it is developed.

It is a quasi judicial function, which certainly can be the better performed by a small selected committee, which makes a full report to the Senate.

Then there is the possibility of a method of removal for cause.

It seems reasonable that with the power of appointment of persons to serve "during good behavior" there should be the concurrent power of removal for cause.

The importance and the dignity of the office and its necessity to the community life of the day are so great that it may very properly be assumed that no arbitrary removal would be made by the Executive unless the case be one calling for immediate and drastic action.

The Congress retains power over the courts, since there is but one constitutional court, and the creation and maintenance of inferior courts are always and at all times for congressional consideration and action.

Not alone, therefore, is there a safeguard of the Congress having the power to ordain and establish all courts inferior to the Supreme Court, but aside from the very limited constitutional jurisdiction conferred on the Supreme Court the Congress is the body which provides what its jurisdiction is to be.

From the fabric of the Constitution and the decisions in the best-considered cases, in some of which the minority opinions are of strong present-day appeal, it follows that the expression of the written or statute law and its propriety, wisdom, and policy are for the legislative body and not for the courts.

I bear in mind that it is the business, the independent and unimpeded business, of the courts to interpret the laws as made in State general assembly and National Congress, and that this interpretation should be made by the application of recognized rules and principles, and not at all by the personal views or bias of the judge.

Nothing is more subversive of correct interpretation than for one in such interpretation to give the law his personal approval or disapproval, to express as a personal opinion that it was properly passed or should not have been passed, to impugn the motives of legislators, to take from his store of bias or prejudice in making judicial interpretation of a disputed law.

The just judge now approaches with his most able consideration the question of interpretation of the written law.

How shall he do this? What elements must he consider? Where is the "Hitherto shalt thou come, but no further" of the case?

Without question it is the legislative intent which is to be sought out, but how is this to be determined?

The rule of strict construction of the language employed has sometimes been adopted, but it seems to me that this is too narrow and constricted a rule for universal application, for some trivial clerical error may appear, some possible mistake or inferior choice in punctuation, which strictly and literally construed may make for a state of affairs never in the legislative mind.

It is the legislative mind which is to be probed, and not the judicial mind substituted in proper interpretation.

The courts of to-day have access to and may properly consider matters extrinsic in giving interpretation to the statutes so that the collective mind of the legislative branch be made known.

The expressions of the individual Members of Congress—using that for an example—may be varied and various, but there is finally secured from debate and consideration by the majority rule, that rule which with us stands for the control by the people, the collective mind of the lawmaking body.

It has been truly said that "law is the development of ideas."

As conditions and ideas change with each day, so these may with all their changes be given proper construction by the principle established in a statute. Therefore the rule in interpretation should be, I most respectfully submit, that the true legislative intent should be sought and that it should be obtained from all means at hand to learn what were the conditions under which the law was passed, what the reason for its passage, what its language is, what particular thing or things preceded it and caused it to be taken up by the legislature, and, lastly, with all possible information before the court of the origin, consideration, and final passage of the law, the interpretation be made as for the best of public interest which the statute seeks to advance.

Legislative bills as introduced are sometimes very crudely and inartistically drawn, but the refining process of submission to particular committees and consideration by them usually puts them in form in which the meaning and purpose are made manifest.

Sometimes in the debate amendments are proposed which are not in harmony with the original intent of the bill and such amendments may be adopted, but even these can be understood and given interpretation in determining what was the purpose of the bill.

Running through the warp and woof may always be seen the controlling pattern, hidden sometimes by careless construction, sometimes by confusing addition or amendment, but as a guiding principle revealed.

The well-known rule of statutory construction is that the statute should not be set aside if reasonable doubt of its constitutionality remain.

In courts of highest resort some States require that before a statute be set aside as unconstitutional this fact must be concurred in by an almost unanimous opinion, one State, I believe, going so far as to hold that if more than one of the judges of the court refuse to concur with the finding against the constitutionality of a measure, it shall not be set aside.

With the determination of the guiding principle then may be logically considered the trend of after events, and its application to those events for the statute should be given liberality of construction upon the principle involved, and there need be no departure from the rule that a remedial statute should be liberally construed and a penal statute strictly construed.

Much has been said of "supremacy."

The supremacy of the court is often referred to as overriding an act of Congress.

Those who have maintained strongly for judicial rights have complained about the unbridled supremacy of the Legislature.

Since laws made and construed must still be carried out, we have heard, too, of the supremacy of the Executive.

The truth should be that there be no supremacy in any of these three branches and that the only and great supremacy should be that of the Government of the United States.

In dealing with my subject as I have, I felt it unnecessary to comment on the authority of the courts to declare an act of Congress void since the reasoning of Chief Justice Marshall in Marbury v. Madison (1 Cr., 177) has been followed in decisions to this present day. He said:

> It is emphatically the province and duty of the judicial department to say what the law is. Those who apply the rule to particular cases must of necessity expound and interpret that rule. If two laws conflict with each other, the courts must decide on the operation of each. So, if a law be in opposition to the Constitution, if both the law and the Constitution apply to a particular case, so that the court must either decide that case conformably to the law, disregarding the Constitution, or conformably to the Constitution, disregarding the law, the court must determine which of these conflicting rules governs the case. This is the very essence of judicial duty.

One of the most powerful of decisions announced in 1858 by Chief Justice Taney may well be considered in the events of this day and the days to come in our country, since it speaks a message of authority, of strength, and of governmental endurance:

> The Constitution was not formed merely to guard the State against danger from foreign nations, but mainly to secure union and harmony at home, for if this object could be attained there would be but little danger from abroad; and to accomplish this purpose it was felt by the statesmen who framed the Constitution, and by the people who adopted it, that it was necessary that many of the rights of sovereignty which the States then possessed should be ceded to the General Government, and that in the sphere of action assigned to it it should be supreme and strong enough to execute its own laws by its own tribunals, without interruption from a State or from State authorities. And it was evident that anything short of this would be inadequate to the main objects for which the Government was established; and that local interests, local passions or prejudices, incited and fostered by individuals for sinister purposes, would lead to acts of aggression and injustice by one State upon the rights of another, which would ultimately terminate in violence and force, unless there was a common arbiter between them, armed with power enough to protect and guard the rights of all by appropriate laws, to be carried into execution peacefully by its judicial tribunals.
> The language of the Constitution by which this power is granted is too plain to admit of doubt or to need comment. * * * But the supremacy thus conferred on this Government could not be peacefully maintained unless it was clothed with judicial power equally paramount in authority to carry it into execution, for if left to the courts of justice of the several States conflicting decisions would unavoidably take place, and the local tribunals could hardly be expected to be always free from the local influences of which we have spoken. * * * Accordingly, this power was conferred on the General Government in clear, precise, and comprehensive terms. It is declared that its judicial power shall extend to all cases in law and in equity arising under the Constitution and laws of the United States, and that in such cases, as well as the others there enumerated, this court shall have appellate jurisdiction both as to law and fact, with such exceptions and under such regulations as Congress shall make. * * * This judicial power (p. 520) was justly regarded as indispensable, not merely to maintain the supremacy of the laws of the United States, but also to guard the States from any encroachment upon their reserved rights by the General Government. And as the Constitution is the fundamental and supreme law, if it appears that the act of Congress is not pursuant to and within the limits of the power assigned to the Federal Government, it is the duty of the courts of the United States to declare it unconstitutional and void. * * * No one can fail to see that if such an arbiter had not been provided in our complicated system of government internal tranquillity could not have been preserved. * * * In organizing such a tribunal it is evident that every precaution was taken which human wisdom could devise to fit it for the high duty with which it was intrusted. * * * So long, therefore, as this Constitution shall endure this tribunal must exist with it, deciding in the peaceful forms of judicial proceedings the angry and irritating controversies between sovereignties which in the other countries have been determined by the arbitrament of force.

President Taft, in his message to Congress December 7, 1909, said:

In my judgment, a change in judicial procedure, with a view to reducing its expense to private litigants in civil cases and facilitating the dispatch of business and final decision in both civil and criminal cases, constitutes the greatest need in our American institutions.

In this connection I take the liberty of quoting from a very excellent brief filed in support of S. 68 (H. R. 3828), a bill "disregarding technical errors" and for "reforming procedure":

The American Bar Association, speaking for the bar of every State, urges upon Congress to reform these abuses and in the administration of justice in the Federal courts to redeem the promise of Magna Charta that justice shall be denied or delayed to no man, and that the administration of justice shall not be cumbrous, dilatory, and consequently expensive.

The last few years have witnessed history-making legislation, all builded upon that great foundation which our Supreme Court has well characterized as "public or general welfare."

In times of peace we have seen the judicial ratification of the just principle that a man is liable in taxation according to benefits received, and the principle of the income tax has received its long-delayed accord; that principle which makes an assessment upon moneys taxable which too long escaped, and has therefore removed a tremendous burden in taxation from the shoulders of the poor.

Likewise have we seen judicial sanction given the rights of labor—the great creative force of our Government—and to the care in environment of those who toil surrounded by dangerous machinery or appliances, and those who in the depths of mine or on rushing railroads give their strength and health that our national life may be preserved and made progressive.

With the declaration of war, from the Constitution have been drawn powers to "raise and support armies," "to provide and maintain a navy," "to make rules for the government of the land and naval forces," and "to make all laws which will be necessary and proper for carrying into execution the foregoing powers and all other powers vested by this Constitution in the Government of the United States or in any department thereof."

Ex parte Milligan:

The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false; for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence.

By the authority of this great instrument during the present emergency we have said to the conscienceless speculator, who would lay unholy tribute upon the necessities of our daily life, and to the predatory, who seek unconscionable advantage of the stress of our Government in the furnishing of utilities for the very perpetuity of our national life, that the President of the United States, the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, shall be vested with complete control of foodstuffs and fuel and utilities of warfare, and that a fair and reasonable price may be fixed as compensation to be paid therefor, but that the urgency of the national situation shall be no ground for even affording opportunity for privilege or power, no matter how great, attacking us in our inherent rights of "life, liberty, and pursuit of happiness."

Then, too, has been builded by legislative enactment the greatest citizen army the world has ever seen.

Passing the excitement and enthusiasm of the flag-waving period we are now in the grim and ghastly business of war and in a very few weeks with solemn tread will march a great army of the flower of the youth of the land, young men not exulting in war, but holding themselves in readiness to obey their country's command in time of national danger.

It is indeed a monument to those peaceful processes of our law that we, a free people, of a Government deriving its just powers from the consent of the governed, have in good time and good stead caused to be assembled this mighty fighting force that the rights of liberty and justice may prevail.

An Americanism of unswerving and loyal devotion is the answer to those who carpingly would criticize, for with our entrance into the great war there is for all within our gates one citizenship—American; one cause—constitutional liberty; one result—a victory for justice, freedom, and enduring peace.

The High Cost of Living.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN A. ELSTON,
OF CALIFORNIA,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,
Friday, September 14, 1917.

Mr. ELSTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave heretofore granted to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the speech delivered by Hon. William Kent, former Member of Congress from California and at present a member of the United States Tariff Commission, at the Washington conference on the high cost of living, July 30, 1917. The speech is as follows:

SPEECH AT THE WASHINGTON CONFERENCE ON THE HIGH COST OF LIVING, BY WILLIAM KENT, MEMBER UNITED STATES TARIFF COMMISSION.

As the first speaker at this conference, with a limited time at my disposal, I shall undertake the task of making a rough general outline of the causes of the higher cost of living, both temporary and permanent, as I find them. The subject is complex and the greatest fallacy will come from trying to make it simple and attributing it to any one of a number of causes, or to the present abnormal war conditions.

In every time of panic, stress, or change, under our economic system, it is always the poorest, those least able to bear the burden that most keenly feel the distress. We must face this alarming fact with the realization that unless through legal agencies, perhaps through stretching the law to fit its purpose rather than its letter, we must meet this strain and see that all our people are fed and clothed out of the wages they earn, or we may have a serious revolt against obvious injustice.

To tabulate some of the causes of the present high prices I would list the following:

(1) Depreciation in purchasing power of gold.
(2) Illy distributed population.
(3) Illy devised transportation.
(4) War as affecting the natural flow of foreign trade.
(5) Men withdrawn from productive enterprise for Army service.
(6) Useless effort or malemployment.
(7) Monopoly, whether by trusts or "gentlemen's agreements."
(8) An overloaded distributing system as opposed to an underworked system of transportation.
(9) Private ownership of land and natural resources and public utilities.
(10) Unreason of purchasers and greed of sellers.

To expand these topics in a brief way, I first call attention to the simplest factor of all—the depreciation of the purchasing value of gold. A consideration of this subject carries with it the absurd wastefulness of a metallic standard whereby before the man with the ham can exchange the ham for a pair of shoes he must send some one to freeze in Alaska or to roast in the desert, and pay him for his time, expense, and risk in producing a medium of exchange. A metallic standard is only necessary on account of the stupidity and dishonesty of men, and of governments, especially of governments which up to the present time have never seemed trustworthy when it came to limiting the supply of fiat money or of establishing a scientific basis upon which such fiat money, even if issued in moderate quantities, would be justified in its denominations. Some one will yet appear to work out the loosely framed program of Coxey of noninterest-bearing bonds, based on productive and permanent public improvements, which bonds will be utilized as currency, redeemable out of taxes so as to avoid overissuance. This may seem millennial, but for a government to pay interest on bonds issued for permanent publicly created values and furthermore to pay for the extravagant luxury of a gold standard is obviously foolish. Interest will doubtless be justified for extraordinary and wasteful expenditures, such as war, but that is another story.

Another primary factor not connected with war is found in our illy distributed population. The cities, which have two functions—distribution and manufacture—are tremendously overloaded, and the army of unnecessary toilers doing honest work in enlarging the city make it still more burdensome; the vast army of useless clerks and business solicitors represent another great waste, while rural regions that with sane land laws and adequate capital could through industry be made enormously productive are largely lying idle.

Moreover, in this maladjustment we find our old friends, the artificial industries, that forever levy taxes on the valuable industries and pile up population where it is not needed and where it must be artificially supported.

Then there are many other forms of malemployment; servants that do not add to the country's production or to the efficiency of those who may need a certain amount of assistance to make them more efficient in performing the duties of organization and leadership.

The vast army engaged in the liquor traffic is pure waste, and all up and down we find men who are working hard but doing useless things—sometimes doing the wrong thing in the right place, sometimes doing the right thing in the wrong place.

Then we find that even where business is well conducted and well fitted to its location that it is oftentimes subject to the monopolistic control of trusts and "gentlemen's agreements," so that instead of lowering the burden of cost the results of efficiency, natural resources, and invention go into private hands instead of reaching the public in lower prices.

We find a tremendously overloaded distributing system. Indeed, until lately, an overwhelming proportion of the output of our colleges went into professions and business instead of into production. Moreover, our system of agents, jobbers, wholesalers, retailers, is both a waste and a burden, for each must add a profit, and how large that profit shall be depends upon the patience of an ill-informed public.

No one better than I remembers the bitter fight made by little country stores against the parcel post. The mail-order houses, just because they were working on correct economic principles, have profited marvelously.

As a Nation we are indulging in the most expensive distributing cost. England is selling our meat cheaper than we get it at home. The former Tariff Commission found certain kinds of cotton fabrics much cheaper here than in England, and yet the English public bought the goods for less than our people paid.

Under the private ownership of our transportation lines we find waste and bad adjustment. We find railroads occupying rival freight yards and rival stations in the great cities, when all should be interlocked. We find the most incoherent and insane system of car distribution, where railroads vie in stealing each other's cars until they are collected and run back empty to headquarters. There can be no unification short of Government ownership and operation, and it will be found that the so-called wastefulness of public operation will by such unification prove a great relative economy.

Not our tariff system has built up our past prosperity. Our natural resources, our ingenuity, our pioneer spirit have made us rich as a Nation. And all the time we are prodigally wasting these resources, foolishly releasing them from public into private hands, with the expressed belief that by putting them on the tax roll we are adding to the national wealth. The time must come, and that soon, when we must recover them, and we must hold those not yet parted with.

The opinion is general that we must take over our public utilities, transportation, and transmission of intelligence; but when we are considering the public retention and assumption of natural resources it is strange that most of us forget the most important of all these resources, and that is the land itself.

The most serious phase of this situation of high prices is that it tends to make the rich richer and the poor poorer and still more accentuates the difference between the "house of have" and the "house of want." "Laissez faire" has completely broken down and the sacred natural law of supply and demand has been repealed. While we are speaking of added prices as following this so-called law we are compelled to wonder whether these added prices are productive in nature, or whether they merely tend to deprive the less fortunate of things they need and to bestow them on those with bank accounts. It is easy enough to talk about taking a long view of such situations and to show that high prices will in a series of years tend to increase production and thereby lower prices; but while we are waiting for such readjustment the valuable may starve and the parasitic grow fat. Against this remedy there also stand out the possibilities of men refusing to compete if it is to their advantage to form combinations, and always and ever there is the increment added to the land by prosperity in any given line.

The question of rising prices due to increased land values reminds one of a building raised on jackscrews, temporarily braced with timbers, and then having put under it permanent construction. We shall never have 40-cent corn on $200 land. We can regulate the railroads and other public utilities on the basis of investment or inherent value, regardless of capitalizations. Can we not see the absurdity of considering inflated land prices as legitimate capitalization calculated to bring interest returns forever?

It would appear that, much as we dislike it and much as we object to State interference, we shall have to practice a great deal more of it before we can practice less. In this we are but interfering with prior private interference. In a small way and an immediate way it is the same old struggle between anarchism and socialism—anarchism representing the millennium and socialism a conveyance toward that destination.

In this war time we rely in toto on our Federal Government. It is called upon to levy taxes, to draft men, to furnish supplies for the common welfare; and yet under our absurd constitutional system the Federal Government is unable to reach the fundamental sources of wealth, whether it be the city real estate, mineral lands, water power, or farm property. In the very midst of this need of Federal strength we find the Senate heedlessly endeavoring to squander the public domain and the resources in oil and water power, thereby weakening the only agency that stands between us and acute danger, while every man who objects to any necessary form of control or taxation uses the Federal Constitution as the foundation for his argument.

If our contest prove long and severe the Federal Constitution will not recognize itself in a looking-glass, or else the United States Government will be crippled and hampered beyond measure by the constriction of the baling wires that bind us, placed there by men who, however good or wise, lived a hundred and fifty years ago, and were neither prophets nor sons of prophets.

There is no danger but that the American system of land tenure will come in for plenty of analysis and criticism at a meeting where single taxers are gathered. There are certain things concerning which I disagree with some of my friends of that enthusiastic and thoughtful school. I do not believe that if Henry George had lived he would have confined his revenue system to the taxation of land, either as abstractly perfect or concretely feasible, and I think he would have recognized the fact that after taxing all the rental value out of land and forcing the owner of the land to the trouble of cashing his crops and turning in his taxes no benefit of holding title would appear. Just as millions of acres of chopped-over timber land have been permitted to revert to the State rather than to irritate the owner with taxation charges, in the same way this taxing of the unearned increment would eventually throw the land back to the taxing community. The taxation plan would be self-destructive and a leasing system would take its place, an evolution to be devoutly sought, and one only to be reached through taxation or revolution.

It makes no difference how long these leases should run, they might be perpetual provided the terms and conditions were, as varied from time to time, observed by the occupant. Such terms and conditions would, of course, require the highest and best use of the property in the public interest. The single tax, if crudely applied, would inevitably lead to the waste and destruction of timber. The single tax, carrying with it the old sanction of fee simple title, would never prevent such eternal destruction as is found, for instance, in Sacramento Valley of California, where to secure one crop of gold the most fertile land in the United States, situated under the most ideal climatic conditions for crop production, is totally destroyed for this one crop, yielding perhaps $1,500 an acre, when the same land through the life of the world would yield one-third as much per annum in terms of produce.

There is no need for me in this outline to go into detail describing the "old man of the sea"—the value which the public creates by its demand for land and by the improvements of transportation and invention, which forever and a day carry an apparently innocent but really deadly interest charge, which must be added to productive and distributive costs. As soon as we have assumed more and more ownership of public utilities we must be driven to see that land is the greatest of all public utilities and should be so considered and treated as such.

Moreover, single-taxers must recognize that although free trade is the ultimate end and goal not only of commercial welfare and lowered costs but also as the preeminent means of doing away with war, yet at this stage of the world and for a long time to come we shall be forced, the most liberal of us, to advocate exceptions and to regard the march toward free trade as a long process of adjustment, of reciprocal trade, and trading treaties.

We are at the parting of the ways. Our old ideas and theories of "laissez faire" and competition have gone by the board. The greedy schemes of the powerful, working together with unrestricted immigration, has created vast divergencies of wealth and opportunity. "Keep out cheap goods, import cheap labor" have been two inherent postulates of our national scheme. We divide our patrimony of land and resources with the ragtag and bobtail of the world in theory, but later, in practice, find these resources taken over by those who already have too much. We can not keep up democracy with unfit and oppressed people doing the voting. We must face about and create a new political economy. Our resources, including land, must be retained and recovered. Whether we like it or not, we shall inevitably come to a Government regulation of prices. We must have a land-leasing system for many reasons, and if we had one now and all the land were in the ownership of the Federal Government there would be no trouble about raising revenue. It would be merely a matter of increasing public rentals, in kind or its equivalent. The farmer who raised a big crop of $2 wheat would be turning in the same percentage to the Government, probably a larger one, as his profits would be greater on his share; the city dweller would pay more land rent in terms of cash. The manufacturer of steel would be turning over to the Government the equivalent or more than the equivalent of a percentage based on what are nearer normal prices.

Consider what would have been the status of this city if the Government had retained the fee title and had leased the land. Several generations of land speculators would not have reaped where they have not sown. There would have been complete control of the plans of improvement and funds beyond dreams for making a city worthy of our Nation.

I have given but a sketch and an outline of some of the matters that have occurred to me in connection with the topic of this meeting.

In closing let me call your attention to a phase of psychology at the time of the San Francisco earthquake. No one can claim that the population of San Francisco was free from evil elements. But at the first outbreak of the great calamity little Gen. Funston marched down the street of the shattered town and forced the mayor to sign a proclamation that looters would be shot. A few great souls went to work cheerfully in the task of relief and helpfulness. As a result of the combination the community became more orderly, kindly, cheerful, and temperate than ever in its history. It was only partially due to the sternness of the law that order was preserved; a much greater element was the fact that men's minds were turned in the right direction.

The laws that we shall pass and that we shall enforce can not create value, but they have the potentiality of acting as suggestions that will turn the tide in the right direction. Like many a lost tenderfoot, we have been following the wrong end of the compass needle. About face!

Our War for Law and Civilization.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. FREDERICK N. ZIHLMAN,
OF MARYLAND,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, September 15, 1917.

Mr. ZIHLMAN. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address by HENRY W. TEMPLE, of Pennsylvania, delivered at the annual meeting of the Maryland State Bar Association at Atlantic City, June 21, 1917.

The address is as follows:

OUR WAR FOR LAW AND CIVILIZATION.

During the past 25 years two apparently contradictory tendencies have attracted the attention of all students of international affairs, and particularly of all who hate war and the unspeakable evils which accompany it. Preparations for war were being made on an unprecedented scale, while at the same time projects for the peaceable settlement of international disputes were not only discussed, but to an extent formerly unknown were made the subject of international negotiations. Treaties of arbitration became common. The peace conferences at The Hague attempted to establish international courts of arbitration, and there were not lacking those who saw in this movement the realization of Tennyson's dream of "the parliament of man, the federation of the world."

Many of the men who took part in these peace conferences were statesmen who, in developing the policies of their own countries, were earnest advocates of military preparedness and favored large armies and powerful navies. There was not necessarily any inconsistency between these two courses. In many cases they were symptoms of the same mental state. Men feared war and wished to prevent it, but at the same time feared that it was likely to come upon them. In the peace conferences they attempted to devise ways of preventing war, while in their national budgets they prepared to meet the disaster if their efforts to perpetuate peace should not be successful.

It may be that some who took part in these conferences were not sincere. There were persistent suspicions that this was true, and it may now be said that the development of events has since seemed to justify the suspicions. However that may be, these statesmen saw two divergent roads which the development of the world might follow. The two possibilities represented two ideals of government, two ways of ruling the world—by violence or by law.

At the beginning of the war Germany announced that in case of military necessity she would be bound by no law. The imperial chancellor, in a speech delivered before the German Diet on August 4, 1914, said:

> Gentlemen, we are now acting in self-defense. Necessity knows no law. Our troops have occupied Luxemburg and have possibly already entered upon Belgian soil. Gentlemen, that is a breach of international law. The French Government has notified Brussels that it would respect Belgian neutrality as long as the adversary respected it. But we know that France stood ready for an invasion. France could wait; we could not. A French invasion in our flank and the lower Rhine might have been disastrous. Thus we were forced to ignore the rightful protests of the Governments of Luxemburg and Belgium. The injustice—I speak openly—the injustice we thereby commit we will try to make good as soon as our military aims have been attained. He who is menaced, as we are, and is fighting for his all can only consider the one and best way to strike.

Treaties became scraps of paper. Law existed only to be broken.

Unfortunately we sometimes hear it said that there is no law among nations, nothing that is legally binding upon them in their dealings with one another. It is true, of course, that there is no body of rules enacted and enforced by a sovereign political body to which the nations owe obedience; but there are settled habitudes which for an indefinite time past have been recognized by the community of nations as the standard of what is just and right; there are ancient and general usages to which the nations have given their consent and which are enforced in the courts.

International law is recognized by the Constitution of the United States in the clause by which it gives Congress power to punish offenses against the law of nations. From the beginning of our Government it has been recognized and enforced by the Supreme Court of the United States. In Ware v. Hylton, 1796, Justice Wilson said:

> When the United States declared their independence they were bound to receive the law of nations in its modern state of purity and refinement.

In the case of the Nereide, 1815, Chief Justice Marshall said that in the absence of any act of Congress "the court is bound by the law of nations, which is a part of the law of the land."

In the case of the packet Habana, 1899, Mr. Justice Gray said:

> International law is a part of our law, and must be ascertained and administered by the courts of justice of appropriate jurisdiction as often as questions of right depending upon it are duly presented for their determination. For this purpose, where there is no treaty, and no controlling executive and legislative act, or judicial decision, resort must be had to the customs and usages of civilized nations; and, as evidence of these, to the works of jurists and commentators, who, by years of labor and research, and experience, have made themselves peculiarly well acquainted with the subjects of which they treat. Such works are resorted to by judicial tribunals, not for the speculations of their authors concerning what the law ought to be, but for trustworthy evidence of what the law really is.

That is the attitude of the United States toward international law. It is the doctrine of our Constitution, of our courts; beyond doubt it is supported by the public opinion of our people. I hope that will always be our attitude. I hope that in our foreign policies treaties will never become scraps of paper, and that in the conduct of war we will never act upon the doctrine that necessity knows no law. I am confident that we will never disregard the rightful protests of other nations against acts of injustice or answer them with the announcement that we hope to remedy the wrongs when our military purposes have been accomplished.

The contrary doctrine is set forth in the German chancellor's speech, which I have quoted above. That utterance sounded the very keynote of German methods. Throughout the war, when military necessity has demanded, or when even military advantage has seemed to suggest a disregard of the law of nations, the law has been disregarded. The first hostile move began with the invasion of Belgian territory in disregard of international law, as the chancellor has admitted, and in flagrant violation of international treaties.

From the beginning of her national existence Belgium had been a neutralized State. In the treaty of November 15, 1831, by which the great powers had recognized Belgium's separation from Holland and erection into an independent nation, all these powers, including Prussia, had solemnly guaranteed Belgium's permanent neutralization. This guarantee had been repeated in the treaty of 1839, to which again Prussia was a party, and in the treaty of London of May 11, 1867, which neutralized Luxemburg, Prussia again being one of the signatory powers.

In 1870, at the beginning of the Franco-Prussian War, England entered into two treaties. In one of them England, Belgium, and Prussia were the parties. England covenanted that in case France should violate the neutrality of Belgium, England would become the ally of Belgium and Prussia. In the other treaty France was the third party. It was agreed that in case Prussia should violate Belgium's neutrality England would become the ally of the other two in defending that neutrality. One might have supposed that with more than 40 years' warning Germany would know that England's attitude would be the same in 1914.

Germany's obligation to respect and even defend the neutrality of Belgium did not rest alone upon these treaties, nor upon that principle of international law which requires that the territory of neutrals may not be used by a belligerent. Germany had renewed her obligation by pledges given in 1913, and again as late as July 31, 1914, four days before the promise was broken.

At a meeting of the budget committee of the Reichstag, April 29, 1913, according to the semiofficial Norddeutsche Allgemeine Zeitung:

> A member of the Social Democrat Party said, "The approach of a war between Germany and France is viewed with apprehension in Belgium, for it is feared that Germany will not respect the neutrality of Belgium."
> Herr von Jagow, secretary of state, replied, "Belgian neutrality is provided for by international conventions, and Germany is determined to respect those conventions."

On July 31, 1914, the German chancellor, Von Bethmann-Holweg, assured Baron van der Elst, the Belgian secretary general of foreign affairs, that Germany had no intention of violating Belgian neutrality. To the request that Germany make a public declaration to that effect he replied that such a declaration would weaken Germany's military position with regard to France, who, being assured of her safety on the northern side, would concentrate all her energies on the east. Two days after this promise was given Germany demanded permission to send her troops through Belgian territory and in another two days the assault on the fortifications at Liege began.

With cynical disregard of the treaty of 1839 and later treaties, the imperial chancellor, Dr. von Bethmann-Holweg, had asked the British ambassador in Berlin if England would fight "for a mere word, for a scrap of paper." England fought for the scrap of paper, because that paper was a treaty still in force.

Of course, England's interests were involved. The scrap of paper would never have existed if each of the powers that signed it had not believed that their various interests would be safer with an independent Belgium than if Belgium were in the hands of any one of the rivals. The motives of nations, like the motives of men, are complex. Treaties, like other contracts, are usually entered into from motives of self-interest, but when the obligation has once been assumed every consideration of honor, of loyalty, of mere self-respect, requires that it be fulfilled. At enormous cost England has kept her pledge. Germany, for the sake of military advantage, invaded Belgium, breaking her treaty, violating international law, disregarding the rightful protest of Belgium, as was callously confessed by the German chancellor, but hoping to remedy the injustice when her military aims had been attained.

From the beginning of the war Germany has paid no attention to international law or to the customs and usages of war which have grown up in the last 300 years to mitigate its horrors. On the contrary, there has been an evident attempt to increase the terrors of war for the purpose of impairing the morale of Germany's enemies, including not only the military forces but the civilian population. The purpose of influencing governmental policies by deliberately increasing the frightfulness of war has been frequently proclaimed by the German authorities.

Early in the war a few patriotic civilians in Belgium violated the law which forbids civilians to fight. They took chances in firing upon German sentries or into marching columns of German troops. However patriotic such men are recognized to be, they are guilty of an offense against the laws of war and are subject to the death penalty. They are not lawful combatants. Germany, however, announced and acted on the policy of punishing a community for the act of an individual, and in one well-authenticated instance 110 men and women were lined up before the guns of the firing squad. After a few volleys from the squad a machine gun was turned upon the victims and a hundred and ten dead bodies were left in a heap as a punishment for the act of one or two men.

The bombardment of undefended coast towns and summer resorts on the east coast of England was a violation of the customary laws of war and a breach of treaties which Germany had signed. Germany's use of poisonous gases and of liquid fire has led the allies to resort to the same methods in retaliation. The Zeppelin raids over London, since they produce no military effect whatever, are inexcusable offenses against the law of nations and against humanity, for which a portion of the English people are demanding retaliation. The British Government has not yet been willing to attack undefended cities in Germany to avenge the women and children killed in England by these raids.

Above all, the submarine policy that Germany has adopted was not only an offense against her enemies, but also a crime against nations with which Germany was not at war. Merchant ships of all nations were destroyed without regard for the rights of the neutral crews on board, and even without any attempt to save the lives of women and children among the passengers. Germany has behaved in this fashion not only toward her enemies but toward the citizens of neutral and friendly powers, until at last Germany has no friends among all the nations of the world.

Enemy merchant ships are, of course, subject to capture, and may be destroyed if adequate provision is made to place the passengers and crew in safety. On the other hand, merchant ships of neutrals may not ordinarily be destroyed, even when they are subject to capture, but must, if possible, be taken into a friendly port to be passed upon by a prize court. In no case is it lawful to kill by any means the passengers or crew of either a neutral or an enemy merchant ship, except in lawful combat when the vessel resists an attempt of a belligerent warship to exercise the right of visit and search or the right of capture. Even after resistance the crew of the captured ship may not be slaughtered, but must be treated as prisoners of war. Before the war this provision of international law was also German law. The prize code issued by the German naval staff as general orders, June 22, 1914, six weeks before the outbreak of the war, contains the following:

> If an armed merchant vessel of the enemy offers armed resistance, such resistance may be overcome with all means possible. The crew are to be taken prisoners of war. The passengers are to be left to go free unless it appears that they participated in the resistance.

This was in harmony with international law. But since the war broke out Germany, in this particular as in many others, has modified her code. She now declares that merchant ships must not be armed, and that commanders and crew of armed merchant ships will, when captured, be treated as pirates. In accordance with this ruling, Capt. Fryatt, the commander of a British armed merchant ship, was put to death for resisting capture.

We have not gone to war with Germany merely because she has violated international law. Every sentiment of humanity was outraged at the treatment of Belgium and of the civilian population of northern France, but we are not fighting because our sentiments have been outraged. It was not the Lusitania horror that brought us into the war, although more than 100 American citizens, many of them women and children, were drowned with hundreds of others when that vessel was unlawfully destroyed. We did not even go to war when American ships, sailing under the protection of the American flag, were sent to the bottom under Germany's first submarine policy. According to the proclamation of the German Government, that policy, which took effect February 4, 1915, was directed solely against enemy ships. If neutral ships were destroyed, Americans among them, it was because of the difficulty of distinguishing between the enemy and the neutral. American ships were destroyed, and for a long time we submitted and accepted Germany's apologies and insincere expressions of regret, although our blood boiled while we did it.

The new policy which went into effect February 1, 1917, was announced in a note which, among other things, contains the following paragraph:

Under these circumstances Germany will meet the illegal measures of her enemies by forcibly preventing after February 1, 1917, in a zone around Great Britain, France, and Italy, and in the eastern Mediterranean, all navigation—that of neutrals included—from and to England, and from and to France, etc. All ships met within that zone will be sunk.

This meant that American ships found within 400 miles of the British or French coasts or anywhere in the Mediterranean, except within very narrow limits, would be sunk. For what Germany called the illegal measures of her enemies we were to be punished, our ships were to be sunk. Following this announcement several American ships were actually destroyed by German submarines. Each of these attacks was a separate act of war upon the United States, and we were obliged either to submit to this aggression or resent it.

Always in maritime war a belligerent has a right to blockade the coast of an enemy, but this was not blockade. Germany did not proclaim a blockade of the British or French coasts, and did not pretend to be acting under the law of blockade. Always, also, in time of war a belligerent has a right to seize contraband goods destined for the use of the enemy. Germany did not pretend to be operating under the law of contraband.

If American ships had been captured for a breach of blockade or for carrying contraband, there would have been no objection on the part of the Government of the United States. But the loss of the property involved is the sole penalty for these offenses. Death has never been the penalty for breach of blockade or for carrying contraband. If an American ship had been destroyed while resisting capture or resisting an attempt on the part of the German naval forces to exercise the right of visit and search, there would have been no protest on the part of our Government. But this was not even charged against any American vessel. They were destroyed, Germany said, because of alleged illegal measures of Germany's enemies.

Visit and search is necessary in order that the commander of a belligerent warship may know whether the vessel he has halted is subject to capture. In exercising this right an officer of the warship will go on board the merchant vessel which he has halted and will examine the ship's papers. These papers will include such documents as (1) the certificate of registry, which will show the nationality of the vessel; (2) the clearance papers, which will show its destination and thus enable the officer to determine whether the vessel is bound to a blockaded port and subject to capture for that reason; (3) the manifest of cargo and invoices, which will enable the officer to learn what kind of goods she may be carrying and, if she is bound for an enemy destination, to decide whether the vessel is subject to capture for carrying contraband. If she is subject to capture, and if it is impossible to take her into port, it is always necessary before destroying her to place the passengers and crew in safety and to take these papers in order that the case may be properly presented to the prize court. When the vessel is sunk without visit and search, the property and the papers which are the evidence in the case necessary to determine the ownership of the property, its destination, its character as contraband or otherwise are sent to the bottom and never can be placed in possession of the prize court.

During the whole of this controversy many good people were misled and confused by German sympathizers who said that England's blockade was starving German women and children and therefore Germany was justified in her submarine campaign, the purpose of which was to shut off England's food supply. In answer to this it may be said that though starvation is horrible, reduction by famine has never ceased to be recognized as a legitimate weapon of warfare. In 1870, when the German Army starved the city of Paris into surrender, the authorities of the city asked the German commander for permission to send the women and children out of the city and through the German lines to a place of safety. The answer was that since it was his purpose to reduce the city by famine the German commander could not permit the removal of "useless mouths." As to starvation by blockade, universally recognized principles of the law of neutrality, developed and established during hundreds of years, recognize the right of a nation at war to blockade its enemy and shut off all commerce even with neutrals, including commerce in foodstuffs. Neutrals submit to this interruption of their trade with a belligerent provided the blockade is carried on according to certain principles which the whole civilized world has agreed to. These principles permit the seizure of neutral property after visit and search, and confiscation also, if the property is condemned upon a hearing before a lawful prize court. The law does not permit the slaughter of passengers and crew who may be on board a vessel subject to condemnation. If England's course was unlawful Germany was bound not to retaliate in any way that would require the commission of crimes against neutrals.

Germany has claimed that the invention and development of the submarine boat has modified this universal law guaranteeing the rights of neutrals. Germany demands that she be permitted to do to neutral traders with this newer and more deadly weapon what the law does not permit her to do with any weapon. Germany claims that there has been no law for the regulation of submarine boats. Our reply is that the law was never based on the nature of the weapon, but was founded entirely upon the rights of the neutral. Those rights are not modified by the invention and development of a newer and easier way of violating them. The law against murder is not a law to regulate the use of certain weapons; its purpose is to protect life. A man accused of murder would have little chance of acquittal if he based his defense upon the fact that in taking his victim's life he had used a weapon that was unknown when the law against murder was enacted.

Germany herself has admitted that her submarine warfare is conducted without regard to the law of nations. On January 7, 1916, the German ambassador in Washington, acting under instructions from the foreign office in Berlin, wrote to the State Department as follows:

German submarines in the Mediterranean had from the beginning orders to conduct cruiser warfare against enemy merchant vessels only in accordance with general principles of international law, and in particular measures of reprisal as applied in the war zone around the British Isles were to be excluded.

German submarines are therefore, permitted to destroy enemy merchant vessels in the Mediterranean—i. e., passenger as well as freight ships, as far as they do not try to escape or offer resistance—only after passengers and crews have been accorded safety.

This document, dated more than a year before the second and more general war-zone policy was adopted, is Germany's plain statement that her orders given to submarines, requiring them to operate in accordance with international law, applied only to those operating in the Mediterranean and not to those operating in the war zone around the British Isles.

Germany has claimed moral justification for disregarding neutral rights on the ground that her course is a reprisal or retaliation for certain illegal measures put into effect by her enemies. The German propaganda in American newspapers has gone further in making this claim than any official communication our Government has received from the German authorities. They have asserted that England first mined the North Sea contrary to international law, and that Germany's use of the submarine was in reprisal for this.

England first adopted a mine-laying policy October 20, 1914. Another proclamation to the same effect was issued by the British Government on November 3, 1914, and has frequently been quoted by German propagandists as furnishing justification for the conduct of the Imperial Government. This is the date which these propagandists have fixed as marking the first use of mines in this war.

I wish to call attention to a communication from the German Government in which the German foreign office at Berlin declares that Germany began to lay mines on the trade routes to English ports on August 7, 1914, three days after the war began. This communication is dated November 7, 1914. The fifth paragraph of this German document is as follows:

In the British protest the charge is made that the German Government never issued any proclamation as to the places where mines were laid. This charge is not founded in fact. On August 7, 1914, the German Government communicated to all the neutral powers that the trade routes to English ports would be closed by mines by Germany. Neutral shipping was, therefore, notified of the fact of the laying of the mines and of the zones where it had to look out for German mines. If the German Government did not give the exact situation of the various mines, this may well be understood from the conditions which forced the laying of the mines.

I ask you to compare with this announcement a note signed by Count von Bernstorff and addressed to the Secretary of State, bearing date of September 10, 1914. It begins as follows:

MR. SECRETARY OF STATE: By direction of my Government I have the honor respectfully to bring the following to your excellency's knowledge: No foundation for idea prevalent among neutrals abroad that because of the blockade of German ports sea trade with Germany is tied up. No port is blockaded and nothing stands in the way of neutral States' sea trade with Germany. The assertions from England that the North Sea has been infested with mines by Germany are wrong.

The statement that nothing stands in the way of neutral States' trade with Germany seems to be an acknowledgment by Germany that up to the date of that note, September 10, 1914, England had not placed mines on trade routes to German ports. The last sentence seems to deny what Germany admitted later under date of November 7, 1914, as quoted above, that, on the contrary, Germany had laid mines on trade routes to English ports as early as August 7, 1914. It is obvious that since the first mines used in the war were those laid by Germany on trade routes to England three days after the war began, they could not have been resorted to in reprisal for what England only began to do on October 20, more than 10 weeks later.

What Germany has termed "England's unlawful blockade of neutral ports" is said to have been the cause of other reprisals on the part of Germany. This raises a very interesting question. We all remember complaints which were made not only by shippers in this country but by our Government as well, and at least in some instances rightfully made, against certain acts of Great Britain in the conduct of her blockade. Goods shipped from our seaports to ports in Norway, Sweden, Denmark, or Holland have been seized by British war ships and held for adjudication by British prize courts. Why should vessels carrying goods to neutral countries be seized? If in discussing this question I seem to start a long way back, the process is like that of the contestant in the broad jump, who runs for several yards before he comes to the "take-off." The run is an essential part of the undertaking.

To understand the doctrine of continuous voyage and the later doctrine of ultimate destination one must go back to the war between France and England which began in 1756—the Seven Years' War—the American phase of which is known in this country as the French and Indian War. At that time the law of France, like the law of the United States to-day, permitted no foreign vessels to engage in the trade between the home country and its island possessions. When the war broke out France opened this traffic to foreign ships. The English prize court held that neutral vessels engaged in this trade, which was closed to them in time of peace, were practically in the service of France—were really French vessels by adoption—and subject to capture as if they were actually of French registry. This doctrine was embodied in what is known as England's "rule of war of 1756."

The same situation arose again in the war between France and England which broke out after the French Revolution. By this time the thirteen American Colonies had become independent, and it was American vessels that now began to perform French service by carrying goods from the French West Indies to France. It was not long until the ingenious Yankee skippers devised a plan for evading the rule. To avoid making a voyage from Martinique to France, they would take out clearance papers at Martinique for some American port and there take out new clearance papers for the real destination in France. Under this plan the ship's papers would never show a direct voyage between two French ports.

The British prize courts held that the interposition of a neutral port between the port of origin and the true destination was a subterfuge, and that the two voyages from Martinique to Charleston and from Charleston to Marseilles constituted in fact one continuous voyage. Under this doctrine, vessels were condemned by the prize courts for violating the rule of war of 1756. The doctrine of continuous voyage was applied also to British vessels which traded with the enemy and attempted to evade the law by interposing a neutral port between the British port from which they started and the French port which was the true destination.

By the time our Civil War broke out the doctrine of continuous voyage was fairly well established, but its application had been confined almost exclusively to the rule of 1756 and the law forbidding trade with the enemy. American courts accepted the doctrine of continuous voyage and applied it in new ways. We applied it to the law of contraband and also to the law of blockade. Vessels that sailed from England to Cardenas in Cuba or to Matamoras in Mexico and to other neutral ports were seized by our cruisers and condemned by our prize courts on the ground that the contraband goods which they carried had an ultimate destination in the Southern Confederacy, or that the noncontraband goods were destined for blockaded territory.

The most remarkable of these cases was that of the Springbok, a British sailing vessel bound from London to Nassau, in the Bahamas. We captured this British vessel, which had sailed from one British port to another British port, on the ground that the cargo which it carried was intended for transshipment at Nassau to an unknown destination in the Southern Confederacy. The voyage of the Springbok was to be finished at Nassau. She was to discharge her cargo there and return to England.

In previous wars no ship had been held under the doctrine of continuous voyage unless captured after she had cleared from the interposed port with papers which showed unmistakably an enemy destination. We captured this vessel on the first leg of the voyage, when there was no intention that the vessel should ever clear for an enemy port. It was the cargo only that had an enemy destination. The doctrine of continuous voyage of the vessel had given birth to the doctrine of ultimate destination of the goods.

Appeal was taken by the British owner of the vessel from the decision of the prize court in New York to the Supreme Court of the United States. While this appeal was pending the British Government, February 20, 1864, informed Lord Lyons, its minister at Washington, that they had considered the judgment of Judge Betts in the case of the Springbok and had decided that they could not officially interfere in the matter, adding:

> The complicity of the owners of the ship with the design of the owners of the cargo is, to say the least, so probable on the evidence that there would be great difficulty in contending that this ship and cargo had not been rightly condemned.

Those who maintain that the decision in the Springbok case was right do so because they believe the law is a living thing which grows and develops as conditions change. Those who believe that the decision of the Supreme Court was wrong might say that the development of the doctrine of ultimate destination of the goods from the doctrine of continuous voyage of the vessel was a violent distortion of the law.

In the present war Great Britain has accepted and applied the American doctrine of the ultimate destination of the goods. It is true that she applied that doctrine more extensively than we did during the Civil War, and in one or two particulars has applied it in new ways. It is also true, I believe, that our State Department has protested against these new ways of applying the doctrine, and in letters to the British foreign office has said that in these particulars England's course has been "illegal and indefensible." This claim on the part of our Government may be compared to the action of an attorney who, while trying a case, finds it necessary to file an objection to a ruling of the court in order that he may have ground on which to base an appeal. But it is utterly beyond reason to say that England's extension of the doctrine of ultimate destination is an offense against the laws of humanity, or that it in any way justifies the German submarine policy. It slaughters no noncombatants; it drowns no women and children; it does not shock and horrify mankind. It is a dispute about the law, which can be settled by diplomatic means. If it is ultimately determined that England's course has been wrong, any damage that has been done may be repaired by indemnity.

It should be understood that Great Britain has not claimed any right to blockade neutral ports nor to seize cargoes which are in good faith bound for Holland or Denmark. She has, however, maintained that certain ports of Holland are the natural ports of entry for large portions of the German Empire, and she has claimed the right to apply the doctrine of ultimate destination to goods which are to be carried through Holland to Germany.

Before I turn again to consider the lawlessness of the Imperial Government of Germany and the political philosophy which goes far to account for that lawlessness I wish to call attention to a decision of the judiciary committee of the privy council which illustrates the high regard for law which is characteristic of the nations with which we are associated in this war for law and civilization.

The Zamora, a Swedish ship bound from New York to Stockholm with a cargo which included 400 tons of copper, was captured by a British cruiser and sent into a British port as prize. Before hearing the claim for condemnation on the ground of the contraband nature of the cargo the prize court was applied to by the Crown for an interlocutory order which would deliver up the copper upon deposit by the Crown of a bond covering the value of the goods, the bond to be held by the court pending the adjudication of the case. The Swedish owner of the copper appealed from the order which authorized the Crown to requisition the goods, basing the appeal on the contention that the decision of the court, though in accordance with an order of the King in council, was contrary to international law. The judicial committee of the privy council, which is the court of last resort in prize-court cases, in the course of its opinion said:

> In the first place, all those matters on which the court was authorized to proceed were or arose out of acts done by the sovereign power in right of war. It followed that the King must, directly or indirectly, be a party to all proceedings in a court of prize. * * * Rights based on sovereignty were weighted and the Crown accepted for most purposes the position of an ordinary litigant. A prize court must, of course, deal judicially with all questions which come before it for determination, and it would be impossible for it to act judicially if it were bound to take its orders from one of the parties to the proceedings.
> In the second place, the law which the prize court was to administer was not the national, or, as it was sometimes called, the municipal law, but the law of nations; in other words, international law. * * * It was obvious that, if and so far as a court of prize in this country was bound by and gave effect to orders of the King in council purporting to prescribe and alter the international law, it was administering not international but municipal law, for an exercise of the prerogative could not impose legal obligation on anyone outside the King's dominion who was not the King's subject. If an order in council were binding on the prize court, such court might be compelled to act contrary to the expressed terms of the commission from which it derived its jurisdiction. * * *
> If the court is to decide judicially in accordance with what it conceives to be the law of nations, it can not even in doubtful cases take its directions from the Crown, which is a party to the proceedings. It must itself determine what the law is according to the best of its ability, and its view, with whatever hesitation it be arrived at, must prevail over any executive order. Only in this way can it fulfill its function as a prize court and justify the confidence which other nations have hitherto placed in its decisions. * * *

On this part of the case, therefore, their lordships hold that order 29, rule 1, of the prize court rules, construed as an imperative direction to the court, is not binding. (The Times, Law Report, April 7, 1916, and American Journal Int. Law, April, 1916.)

England's highest court declined to be bound by an order of the King in council because it deemed that order to be contrary to international law, and announced as a mere matter of course that it could not take its orders from one of the parties in the case. In this war, which we have entered for the defense of our rights and the maintenance of law, as the foundation of civilization, we may be proud of our association, both with the republic which helped us to win our independence and with the great democracy under the forms of a monarchy from which we inherited our institutions and our respect for law. The English people realize more fully than we do that in the War of the American Revolution we were fighting for the rights which Englishmen claimed under their own law, and that our success hastened the reestablishment of those rights in England, so that in fact our success in that war contributed to the establishment of liberty in both nations.

England regards the law; Germany announces that military necessity overrides all law and justifies the violation of solemn pledges. In a note of February 16, 1915, shortly after the announcement of the German submarine policy in its first and milder form, the German foreign office made the following statement:

It is very far indeed from the intention of the German Government * * * ever to destroy neutral lives and neutral property. * * * The commanders of submarines have been instructed, as was already stated in the note of the 4th instant, to abstain from violence to American ships when they are recognizable as such.

Exactly one year later, February 16, 1916, the German ambassador expressed the regret of his Government for the loss of American lives on the Lusitania. In the course of the note he said:

Germany has * * * limited her submarine warfare because of her long-standing friendship with the United States; and because by the sinking of the Lusitania, which caused the death of citizens of the United States, the German retaliation affected neutrals, which was not the intention, as retaliation should be confined to enemy subjects.

Both these statements were disregarded when, on February 1, 1917, Germany began to do that which she had declared it was her intention never to do to neutrals by proceeding to sink all ships—those of neutrals included—found within certain parts of the open ocean. This violence to neutrals, contrary to law and in disregard of pledges, was in harmony with the invasion of Belgium and with Germany's whole policy of lawlessness and frightfulness in the conduct of the war. It is in harmony with Von Treitschke's moral philosophy as expressed in his essay on "The State in Relation to the Moral Law." He maintains that Christian ethics furnish no rigid standard even in private morals, but come at last to this, that every man attains his highest perfection when he has recognized and developed the most essential part of himself.

Having laid this foundation, Von Treitschke applies the standard of what he calls "deeper and truly Christian ethics" to the State. He maintains that the very personality of the State—its most essential part—is power, and, therefore, the highest duty of the State is to uphold and maintain its own power. In his view the duty of the State to assert itself remains always absolute. Weakness must always be condemned as the most disastrous and despicable of crimes, the unpardonable sin of politics. In his view it is the highest morality for a State to violate its treaties if such a course is necessary to maintain its power. I quote a paragraph from the essay referred to:

It is a further consequence of the essential sovereignty of the State that it can acknowledge no arbiter above it, and must ultimately submit its legal obligations to its own verdict. We must beware of judging a great crisis from the advocate's Philistine standpoint.

When Prussia broke the treaty of Tilsit the civil law would have pronounced her wrong, but who would dare assert now that she was guilty? * * * This applies to international treaties less devoid of all morality than that which Prussia was compelled to conclude with France. Every State reserves to itself the right to be the judge of its own treaties, and the historian must not condemn without searching deeper to discover whether it is fulfilling its unqualified duty of self-maintenance. Every moral judgment of the historian must be based on the hypothesis of the State as power, constrained to maintain itself as such within and without. * * * That is to say, that moralists must first recognize that the State is not to be judged by the standards which apply to individuals, but by those which are set for it by its own nature and ultimate aims.

If that is the philosophy which has actually been accepted by the leaders of the German Empire, it will account for much that Germany has done, which, according to the standards of the rest of mankind, has been so thoroughly out of harmony with all law and all treaties which Germany was bound to observe that no man could have believed beforehand that such a course would be followed by any civilized nation. There are yet many, not familiar with the evidence furnished by the diplomatic correspondence of the German foreign office and by other German documents, who are not convinced that Germany has done these things, but believe that she is wronged by malicious accusations of her enemies.

It is only when we have grasped the idea that German statesmen and German university professors and other leaders of thought and policy sincerely believe that Germany has a mission to accomplish in the world which justifies her in resorting to any means that will maintain her own power and advance her own purposes—it is only when we realize this that we can understand the complacent good conscience with which the German Empire commits its crimes against humanity.

The underlying philosophy which has influenced many leaders in Germany was never set forth more plainly than in Nietzsche's book, Beyond Good and Evil (Dr. Oscar Levy's edition of Nietzsche's complete works, vol. 5, p. 224):

Let us acknowledge unprejudicedly how every higher civilization has hitherto originated. Men with a still natural nature, barbarians in every terrible sense of the word, men of prey, still in possession of unbroken strength of will and desire for power, threw themselves upon weaker, more moral, more peaceful races (perhaps traders or cattle-raising communities), or upon old mellow civilizations in which the final vital force was flickering out in brilliant fireworks of wit and depravity.

The essential thing, however, in a good and healthy aristocracy is that it should not regard itself as a function either of the kingship or the commonwealth, but as the significance and highest justification thereof—that it should, therefore, accept with a good conscience the sacrifice of a legion of individuals, who, for its sake, must be suppressed and reduced to imperfect men, to slaves and instruments. Its fundamental belief must be precisely that society is not allowed to exist for its own sake, but only as a foundation and scaffolding, by means of which a select class of beings may be able to elevate themselves to their higher duties and in general to a higher existence; like those sun-seeking climbing plants in Java—they are called Sipor matador—which encircle an oak so long and so often with their arms, until at last, high above it, but suported by it, they can unfold their tops in the open light and exhibit their happiness.

This expression of Nietzsche's teaching that the superman has developed beyond the restraints of good and evil is likely to be received by those not familiar with it with incredulous amazement. It is nevertheless true that Nietzsche teaches that Christian morality is to be classed with that ethical type which he calls slave morality. It is good for the weak among mankind who favor it because its virtues suit their weaknesses and because the virtues of the strong may require the sacrifice of the weak. The supermen who stand above the common herd have no need of the Christian virtues or of the standards fixed by slave morality. They must, as Treitschke says, develop the most essential part of themselves or, as Nietzsche says, "accept with a good conscience the sacrifice of a legion of individuals in order that a select class of beings may be able to elevate themselves to their higher duties."

Von Treitschke's sublime confidence in the superiority of German institutions and German civilization as compared with those of any other people, together with his conception that it is the duty of the State to maintain its own power and assert itself and accomplish its mission in the world, when combined with this conception that the race of superior beings is free from the moral obligations of "slave morality" will go far toward accounting for his advocacy of the duty of violating treaties when national self-maintenance demands it.

This is not the philosophy of the great mass of the German people, if we may judge them by the vast majority of German-Americans who chose this country for themselves and their children rather than the land of their birth. It was not the philosophy of Carl Schurz, the German-American diplomat, soldier, and statesman; nor of Franz Sigel, the German-American soldier who saved Missouri to the Union in 1861. It was not the philosophy of Francis Lieber, the German-American publicist who was the author of Lincoln's "General Order No. 100," which, in 1863, formulated the customs and usages of civilized warfare and which at a much later date furnished much of the foundation for the laws of land warfare adopted at The Hague—laws which Germany is now systematically disregarding. These men were revolutionists in Germany and fought there for principles which, if they had prevailed, would have prevented Prussianism from becoming a menace to civilization. Treitschke repudiates these men, as they would have repudiated him. This German philosopher and historian says:

The individual should feel himself a member of the State, and as such have the courage to take its errors upon him. There must be no question of subjects having the right to oppose a sovereignty which in their opinion is not moral. * * * When the Hugeunots in France had their religion proscribed and were commanded to worship their

God under forms which their deepest conviction held to be un-Christian, conscience drove them from their fatherland, but we must not praise the fine temper of these martyrs for religion from the standpoint of the theologian without recognizing the tragic guilt which is always blended with such compulsion. * * * In modern times there have been radical parties who have in their vanity imagined themselves faced with a similar struggle, which in fact had only a subjective existence in their own exalted imagination. This was the reason why a number of the German-Americans forsook their fatherland. It is foolish to admire them for this. (Treitschke's Politics, vol. 1, p. 106.)

The issues at stake in this war are plain enough. On the one hand are those nations that believe in law as the foundation of civilization, in law that binds nations as well as men, that believe also in the binding obligations of a treaty.

On the other hand, is Germany with the allies which she dominates? By the chancellor's speech at the beginning of the war, by many announcements of the foreign office in Berlin, by her conduct in Belgium and in the submarine war zone, Germany is thoroughly committed to the doctrine that international law is not binding upon the nation whose advantage it is to break it; that treaties have no force when they cease to be of service to the government that signed them; and that all principles of humanity may be shocked and all moral sentiments outraged if a policy of frightfulness seems to promise military advantage to a government that finds itself in difficult straits.

We are associated in this war with nations whose ideals are like our own. Can we win? Not unless we prepare as we have never prepared yet. The people of this country seem not to have realized that there is any danger of defeat. The truth is that war came upon us and found us sleeping. Two and a half years of conflict on the other side of the world had not aroused us to the necessity of preparing for defense. Much has been done since war was declared; possibly some things have been done which will have to be undone; but if we are to get our weight into this war soon enough to win it for law as the ground and safeguard of the civilization of the world, we must have the hearty cooperation of all the people.

If the submarine campaign should be so far successful as to bring the people of England to the verge of starvation, England would be forced to accept whatever terms Germany might dictate. France could not maintain herself alone on the western frontier. It has been exceedingly fortunate for us in our unprepared condition that our enemy is held behind the steel wall of the armies and navies of our allies and that, because of this, we are permitted to have months to make that preparation without which we would be doomed to certain defeat. We must export all the food we can possibly spare to England and France, for if their soldiers and their people are not fed we shall have to bear the full force of Germany's power without the aid of France and England. In that case the fighting would be on our own side of the Atlantic.

Now that we are in the war we must win it for our own sake. Every consideration of self-interest demands whatever sacrifice may be necessary, but it is not only for our own sake that we must win. If civilization depends on law and righteousness and not on unrestrained power, then civilization is at stake. The world must not be controlled by rulers who believe themselves to have a mission which frees them from moral obligations and places their policies beyond the judgment of good and evil.

The Alaska Railroad.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. C. C. DILL,
OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, September 17, 1917.

Mr. DILL. Mr. Speaker, under leave to extend my remarks on the item in this deficiency bill on the Alaska Railroad I desire to insert in the RECORD a statement of the Hon. CHARLES A. SULZER, Delegate from Alaska, on that item. Mr. SULZER has been called away by death in his family and has been granted an indefinite leave of absence by the House or he would have made these remarks in person. They are as follows:

REMARKS BY MR. SULZER.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the Members of the House to the item in the urgent deficiency bill providing for $4,000,000 for the continuation of the work on the Alaska Railroad until July 1, 1918.

This item was inserted in the bill as a result of an estimate submitted by Secretary of the Interior Franklin K. Lane to the House. A hearing was held before the subcommittee of the Committee on Appropriations on Friday, July 20, at which time Secretary Lane emphasized the continued rise in construction materials and increased labor costs as a reason for the need for this additional money.

The Alaskan Railroad enterprise of the Government will stand in history as one of the greatest achievements of this or any other administration. It is a master stroke of empire building, a project that means the direct development of an area as large almost as the country of Sweden, and the hastening of development of an additional area as large as the German Empire in Europe and Denmark combined. With nearly the whole world steeped in war, and every agency everywhere bent on preparation for the destructive enterprises of the battle field, the Alaskan Railroad project stands out as the greatest constructive undertaking in the world to-day.

If there ever was any time in the history of the Nation when a railroad project such as this is necessary, it is the present time. The war industries are crying for rare metals, for copper and iron and coal from which to turn out the necessities of war. Alaska has vast stores of tungsten and platinum ores, veritable mountains of copper, and immense beds of coal. These are being directly developed by this Government railroad, which is opening up the vast interior section, through the Susitna and Nenana Valleys. The Matanuska coal fields are being pierced by the line of steel which the Government engineers are laying down. Already several veins are being opened up, and with proper encouragement in the form of better leasing regulations active mining soon will be in full swing.

Every agency of the Government is cooperating in the effort to make the railroad do its work quickly and bring the rich resources of our frontier to the markets and factories and shops of the world.

The United States Geological Survey has a staff of experts investigating the mineral resources along the route of the railroad, so that the tungsten, platinum, and other ores which the energetic Alaskan prospector has found will be speedily developed. The Board of Road Commissioners of the War Department, under the supervision of Brig. Gen. Wilds P. Richardson, is cooperating splendidly with the Territorial road commission in the development of the vast mining and agricultural country adjacent to the railroad. The Forest Service is conducting investigations with a view to possible paper and pulp development along the railroad line. In short, the administration has organized its whole machinery to make the railroad achieve rapidly the objects for which it was conceived and projected.

The railroad unquestionably will succeed; the empire it opens will support thousands and tens of thousands of people, and pour out untold riches from its fields, its mines, and its forests.

Through the kindness of Mr. H. A. Meyer, assistant to Secretary Lane and in charge of the affairs of the railroad in Alaska, I am able to give the following outline of the work as it was on September 10:

The Alaska Northern Railroad, purchased by the Government and running from Seward to mile 71, at Kern Creek, is being rehabilitated. The first 25 miles from Seward are completed and able to handle any traffic. From mile 25 to mile 71 the road is being rehabilitated, but is usable. From mile 71 to Potter Creek, mile 100, a distance of 29 miles, extraordinary heavy work is encountered requiring blasting through practically solid rock. Here the line runs along Turnagain Arm, and in this district the grading work has made some progress.

Rail has been laid and the road is in operation southward from Anchorage, at mile 114, to mile 100, and northward to mile 175, with a branch at Matanuska, 38 miles from Anchorage, to Chickaloon, the heart of the Matanuska coal fields, a distance of 37 miles. It will thus be seen, with the exception of 29 miles of work along Turnagain Arm, rail has been laid from Seward to Chickaloon, a distance of 189 miles, and 23 miles additional on the main line. All efforts are now being made toward closing this gap. This it is hoped to do in 1918.

Northward on the main line from mile 175 to mile 230 grading work is in progress and will be completed this season. Track laying here will proceed as rapidly as the weather will permit. From mile 230, Talkeetna, to mile 250, Dead Horse Hill, the grading is well advanced, but will not be finally completed until 1918. From mile 250 to mile 260 the right of way has been cleared. From mile 260 into and through Broad Pass engineering and preliminary work has been done to mile 360. At mile 360 the Nenana coal field is reached, and from this point to the town of Nenana, at mile 415, 9 miles of track have been laid, 32 miles of grading have been practically completed, and 14 miles have been cleared and partially graded. From mile 415 to Fairbanks, at mile 470, the clearing has been completed and grading is underway.

It will thus be seen that to date 192 miles of rail are in operation.

With the additional funds requested it is the intention to lay rail along Turnagain Arm, and from Nenana southward to the Nenana coal fields. This work should be completed in 1918, and when this is done there will be two units of operation, viz, from Seward into the Susitna Valley, with a branch to the Matanuska coal fields, which will permit of the shipment of Matanuska coal to tidewater at Anchorage and Seward, and from Nenana to the Nenana fields, so that shipments can also be made from the Nenana fields to the country tributary to Fairbanks.

There should be no faltering in the work. There should be no curtailment of funds for the construction of the railroad. The money has all been raised, and Congress should willingly and heartily lend every aid to the commission by supplying the funds as they are needed.

The press has spread a report through Alaska that has caused no little worry among the pioneers there. It has given rise to a feeling that the Government might curtail the building of the railroad because of the high cost of supplies. I have assured those who have anxiously inquired of me that they need not worry. Congress can be depended on to see that no injustice is done, for Congress realizes the greater good that comes to the people of the Nation by the development of Alaska's vast and wonderful resources.

The following telegram from the Nenana Commercial Club, at Nenana, Alaska, in the interior, epitomizes the view of the pioneers in the matter:

NENANA, ALASKA, September 14, 1917.

Hon. CHAS. A. SULZER,
Delegate from Alaska, Washington, D. C.:

Nenana people alarmed that railroad construction may be suspended. One thousand people, home builders and business men, came here at the invitation of the Government and purchased lots on the promise of the Government that railroad construction would continue. The real and personal property investment here now is over three-quarters of a million dollars. The Government has this phase of the situation to consider now. If suspension policy is adopted, bankruptcy and destitution will cover not only Nenana but the entire interior country. Its suspension would mean a great exodus to the States. Alaska's clock of progress, settlement, and development would be turned back a quarter of a century.

NENANA COMMERCIAL CLUB.

The Government, through the engineering commission, has laid out and developed town sites at both ends of the railroad line. At public auction sales the future of the country has been explained and the lots in the new town sites placed on the market. The following recapitulation shows the sales of lots that have been held under the auspices of the engineering commission:

Town site.	Total lots sold.	Sale price.
Anchorage	1,108	$216,845
Matanuska	59	9,815
Nenana	349	129,705
Seward	140	27,655
Total	1,656	384,020

The people of Alaska to a man are behind the administration and the President in the conduct of the present war. Her sons are in France, in the aviation training camps, in the Navy, and in the cantonments.

The loyalty of Alaska challenges the loyalty of any State in the Union. Since the 2d of April, when this session of Congress convened, I have not received from a resident of Alaska one single, solitary protest against war, conscription, taxation, or any other of the war measures. I have yet to hear the first murmur of protestation from these pioneers who have given their lives that a new empire might be given to the United States. What other section of the country can show a like record for loyalty to and abiding faith in the administration?

I shall insert here an editorial from the Juneau (Alaska) Empire, edited by John W. Troy, which appeared at the outbreak of the war. It gives the feeling of Alaskans in the crisis, and I am glad to say that the people of the Territory have more than fulfilled the hopes voiced in the editorial:

PRESIDENT'S APPEAL AND ALASKA.

The appeal of President Wilson to the American people should be read and carefully considered. Every one in America who would render service to his country should heed the request of him who is commanding the fight. It suggests a duty to everyone, irrespective of whether he can go to war or not, and that duty is to do all within his power to aid in making his country more productive.

Alaska's duty in the crisis which confronts the Nation is more to produce than anything else. The country will need the products of the Territory more than ever before. Copper and fish and gold are all necessary in the work that is before the Nation. The man who adds a pound of fish or other food, a pound of copper, or a dollar more in gold to the country's wealth is doing a service that could be performed in no other way.

Never before in the history of Alaska was the duty for cooperative work to increase production so plain. Heretofore the obligation for unity has been to Alaska and the men, women, and children who constitute her population and those who will join them and those who will come after them. Now, this duty has broadened until it has become a matter of patriotic loyalty to the Nation and humanity itself. The duty to aid through harmony in action and purpose, through cooperation and industry is as broad as the cause for which America has taken up arms. Patriotism demands that the United States shall not fall in the slightest degree behind the best possible thing in the performance of the task she has set for herself, and Northern Americanism demands that Alaska shall not permit a single Commonwealth in the land to come nearer a full compliance with duty's demand than she comes.

Alaskans are Americans first of all. Their first obligation in the present crisis is to their country. That can only be performed in an honest, earnest, energetic, and patriotic effort toward harmony and cooperation in utilizing all the resources of the Territory to their uttermost.

Every ounce of gold is that much more power to drive the wheels of industry, every bushel of potatoes or other food means that much more for the general supply of the Nation, and every ton of copper adds to the force of the blow the country will strike for democracy and liberty.

And may I not call to the attention of the Members the following little item which appeared in an Alaskan newspaper, which tells a story of loyalty perhaps without an equal in the whole country:

A splendid example of patiotism is exemplified in the stalwart person of A. A. Willis, a passenger last night southbound on the Mariposa, who mushed from Iditarod 400 miles over the trail to Anchorage to enlist. Upon arrival at Anchorage he was informed that recruiting stations had not yet been established in Alaska, and he continued his journey to the States.

As soon as the declaration of war reached Iditarod and the President's plea went out for fighting men, Mr. Willis left his lucrative placer claim, heeded the call, and figuratively shouldered his musket and set out for the nearest recruiting station to offer his services to his country.

It is no mean thing to make the trip this time of year, when the head waters of the innumerable creeks and rivers are breaking up; when the snow has melted, making dog teams impracticable, and the journey has to be made on foot, encountering many perils and hardships and experiencing the disagreeable elements. There must have been some rare incentive for a young man to start out alone on a trip of that nature. It is good to know that this incentive was actuated from love of country—his country. It is glorious to know that this Alaska is full of just such men who are willing to sacrifice their life's blood for their country's flag and in support of the Government.

Deportation of Aliens.

OF
HON. JOHN L. BURNETT,
OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 14, 1917.

Mr. BURNETT. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, through me as its chairman, has reported House bill 5667, known as the alien-antislacker bill. It is a bill of great importance, and we hope within the next few days, possibly by Tuesday, to secure its consideration under a special rule.

In order that Members may be advised as to its purpose and scope I will here insert the bill and the report and make a brief analysis of it:

A bill (H. R. 5667) to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes.

Be it enacted, etc., That any alien eligible by existing law to become a naturalized citizen of the United States, who is a native or subject of a country that is engaged in war with Germany, or with any of the other central powers of Europe, and who but for his alienage would be subject to the selective draft under the act of May 18, 1917, or under any subsequent modification or change of said act, who by himself or by anyone else heretofore claimed, or shall hereafter claim, exemption from said selective draft on account of being an alien, shall forever be denied the right of becoming a citizen of the United States, or of any of its possessions, and shall as soon as practicable be deported to the country of which he is a subject or citizen.

Any alien who may have been exempted from said selective draft on account of his alienage prior to the passage of this act may, within 60 days after the passage of this act, withdraw such exemption and submit himself to the operation of said selective draft, and in that event shall not be held to be within the operations of this section as to the forfeiture of citizenship and deportation: Provided, That the President is hereby authorized to make such rules and regulations as may be necessary to enforce the provisions of this section.

SEC. 2. That after the expiration of 60 days from the passage of this act the President of the United States is authorized and empowered, under such rules and regulations as he may prescribe, to draft any alien in the United States to perform such mental or physical labor on the farms, in the manufacturing establishments, or other enterprises in the United States as he may deem necessary or proper: Provided, That the President may exempt from the draft authorized by this section such individuals or classes of aliens as he may believe for the best interests of the United States: Provided further, That the expenses of carrying out the provisions of this section shall be paid out of the Treasury of the United States.

SEC. 3. That after 30 days from the passage of this act no alien who is a native or subject of any country that is engaged in the war with Germany, or with any of the central powers of Europe and who is subject to military duty in the country of his nativity or of which he is a subject, shall be permitted to enter the United States except by permission of the President of the United States, and any such alien so entering in violation of this section shall be deemed unlawfully in this country and shall be deported at the expense of the steamship company, railroad company, or other transportation company by which such alien entered the United States. Any steamship company, railroad company, or other transportation company of any nature whatsoever, or any individual who brings in or aids or assists in bringing in any alien excluded by this section shall be fined not less than $1,000 or by imprisonment for not exceeding one year, or both such fine and imprisonment, and any steamship or other water transportation company against which this fine is assessed shall not be granted clearance papers until such fine is paid or secured in such manner as the Secretary of Labor shall prescribe.

The Secretary of Labor is empowered to hear and pass on all violations of this section and to assess and collect the fine provided herein, and to adopt such rules and regulations as may be necessary to carry out the provisions of this section.

SEC. 4. That this act shall not apply to accredited officials of foreign Governments nor their suites, families, guests, or servants.

SEC. 5. That this act shall only remain in force during the continuance of the war with Germany, except as to the provisions of section 1 hereof.

[House Report No. 127, Sixty-fifth Congress, first session.]

Mr. BURNETT, from the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, submitted the following report:

The Committee on Immigration and Naturalization, to which was referred H. R. 5667, to provide for the deportation of certain aliens, and for other purposes, reports the same to the House without amendment and recommends that the bill be passed.

The effect of the first section of the bill is to prohibit aliens who are natives or subjects of countries which are at war with Germany or with any of the other central countries of Europe from ever becoming American citizens when they have claimed or shall hereafter claim exemption from the selective draft. The section also requires the deportation of such aliens as soon as it is practicable to do so.

The committee realized that the deportation of many of these aliens could not be accomplished at once on account of the impossibility of immediately securing ships or other means of transportation, and hence made it as soon as practicable.

The second section gives the President authority to draft any alien of any age and from any country to perform mental and physical labor on farms, in manufacturing establishments, and in other enterprises as he may deem necessary.

The third section excludes from admission to this country or any of its possessions all aliens subject to military duty in the countries engaged in war with Germany and the other central powers of Europe, and puts a penalty of fine or imprisonment on any steamship or other transportation company or any individual bringing in or aiding in bringing in such alien.

Section 5 limits the operation of this act to the duration of the war, except as to the provisions of section 1, which refer to the denial of citizenship and to deportation.

There is at this time a crying necessity for some law of this kind, especially for the drastic features of sections 1 and 3.

From all over the country comes the cry of the rank injustice of forcing American citizens into the war while alien slackers are here in vast numbers enjoying the peaceful privileges of our country and immunity from fighting for the very integrity of their own countries.

As this bill was originally drafted by the writer of this report (see H. R. 5369), section 1 required aliens who would be subject to military duty in their own countries to take out first papers within 60 days or be deported. Mr. CAMPBELL of Pennsylvania, a member of the committee, offered an amendment, now embraced in section 1 of this bill, which the committee thought wiser and more just than the original section 1. In this the writer fully concurs, especially in view of the doubt that exists in many minds as to whether first-paper men are such citizens as can be subjected to the selective draft. This bill, the committee believes, does not conflict with either international law or with any existing treaties. By this bill the option lies with the alien to either submit to the draft or to be deported.

During the Civil War very similar questions arose under the draft law then being enforced.

In Moore's International Law Digest, volume 4, page 56, it is said:

"In 1863 certain able-bodied male persons of foreign birth, who had declared on oath their intention to become American citizens, were called upon for military duty in the United States. On this the British Government suggested that British subjects who had merely declared their intention to become American citizens, but had not exercised any political franchise in consequence of such declaration, ought to be allowed a reasonable period after the passing of the act to exercise the option of leaving the United States or of continuing residing therein with the annexed conditions. The United States Government thereupon allowed 65 days to such persons to exercise their option, and the British Government refused to interfere on behalf of any intended citizens who had not availed themselves of the opportunity."

In those cases the aliens were drafted where they did not exercise the option of leaving. This bill is really not so harsh as that action on the part of our Government. Under this bill the aliens may either voluntarily submit to the draft or forfeit the right to citizenship and be deported. The right to confer citizenship and the right to deport aliens is peculiarly within the province of the Federal Government. We may deny the former to any on whom we think citizenship ought not to be conferred, and we may deport any who are or become undesirable citizens.

Certainly an alien subject of a country at war with the central powers becomes most undesirable here when he is able-bodied, within military age, has no dependents, and yet refuses to fight either for this or for his own country.

To continue them here in large numbers will be a source of constant and increasing irritation, especially in communities where there are large numbers of them. Besides, under the population basis of drafting, communities where there are large numbers of aliens suffer most unjustly in the proportions of American citizens who are drafted on account of the presence of such aliens.

This is not intended as a bill to restrict immigration permanently, nor as a supplement to the immigration bill passed last year. It is a bill which its advocates believe to be an exigency measure, made necessary by the war.

It is intended to remedy to some degree a most serious and unjust condition in many sections of the country by the presence of thousands of aliens who are evading the draft law, while native and naturalized citizens have to go to the battle fields of Europe whether they want to go or not.

I was opposed to the passage of the draft law and did everything in my power to defeat its passage, but now that it is the law it is my duty to advise obedience to it and to do what I can to see that it does not fall harshly on American citizens while subjects of the allied countries escape it.

Subjects of the countries in war with Germany and her allies who are in this country, and who have not had enough patriotic love for our country to take out their first naturalization papers, ought not to be permitted to stay here and evade conscription and service while even the very existence of their own native lands is at stake. Yet we are confronted by exactly that condition.

It is not so serious in the South, for we have not yet suffered the blight of the immigration of large numbers of that class of people.

But our brethren in the North and some portions of the West are, on account of the evasion of the draft law by aliens, face to face with a grave and serious situation. Several Members from communities where there are large numbers of alien slackers tell me that they often taunt our working boys with the fact that while they have to go to Europe to fight, they—the slackers—will stay here and get their jobs. Some Members have told me that if these conditions are not remedied riots and bloodshed will be the result. On August 1 what is known as the McCumber resolution was passed by the Senate requesting the President to secure the consent of the allied nations to the application of the draft law to their subjects in this country. During the discussion of this resolution several Senators expressed the opinion that nothing would come of it because of the long time such negotiations would consume. Nothing has come of it except to delay more drastic legislation and possibly aggravate the injustice to many communities where American boys have been drafted who would not have been but for the presence of so many alien registrants.

The first section of the bill forever denies to aliens who are eligible to become American citizens the right of becoming citizens, and makes them subject to deportation if they have claimed exemption or should hereafter claim exemption from the selective draft.

Nothing is said in this section about any treaty, and I am fully satisfied that it does not contravene any treaty.

We have treaties with Italy, Serbia, and with one or two other countries at war with Germany or with some of her allies, which exempts their citizens and subjects who are residents in this country from compulsory military service. This bill does not undertake to enforce military service, but merely says to such alien slacker, You are unworthy of ever becoming an American citizen, and unworthy of residence in our country. It is no violation of either treaty rights or of international law to say by law who is unworthy of becoming a naturalized citizen. We have just such laws as to Chinese, Japanese, and many other Asiatics, and no one can fairly contend that we did not have the right to pass them.

There is no treaty in the way of our declaring by law who are undesirable aliens and ordering their deportation. Certainly an alien is undesirable who refuses to return to his own country to fight for its very existence and at the same time takes advantage of his alienage to keep from going into the armies that are being organized here to fight in part for the very country of which he is a citizen or subject. In volume 4, Moore's International Law, on page 68, it is said:

> A State has the right to expel from its territory aliens individually or collectively unless treaty provisions stand in the way. * * *
> Some writers have essayed to enumerate the legitimate causes of expulsion. The effort is useless. The reasons may be summed up in a single word, "The public interest of the State."

On page 71 of the same volume it is said, quoting the views of Secretary of State Marcy:

> It is a sovereign right belonging to every independent power to determine whether it will or will not receive foreigners within its territorial limits as residents, and having granted such permission, it has the same right to determine whether it will or will not revoke it and send such persons out of its country.

Many other citations could be made from Moore's excellent works on this subject.

My able colleague on the committee, the gentleman from Illinois [Judge SABATH], has suggested two or three amendments to section 1 which strike me quite favorably, and which he will no doubt offer on the floor when the bill is considered.

One is to give the alien an opportunity to leave this country before deportation.

The other is to allow those who volunteer in our armies or submit to the draft to return to this country after his honorable discharge, within a reasonable time, without being subjected to the tests and examination required by our laws of an ordinary alien.

Many aliens have already volunteered in our armies and others have submitted without challenge to the selective draft.

Without some such provision as that last referred to many of them could hereafter only come back like other ordinary immigrants even though they may have incurred disabilities while fighting with our armies, and although they might be entitled to pensions and insurance just as our own citizens are. This seems to have been entirely overlooked in all the legislation heretofore proposed or enacted. The Chamberlain bill which passed the Senate a few days ago contains such a provision limited to only those who have heretofore declared their intention of becoming citizens of the United States. This limitation strikes me as hardly just or fair.

The second section authorizes the President to draft any alien in this country, whether alien enemy or neutral, to perform such physical or mental labor on farms, in manufacturing establishments, and other enterprises as he may deem necessary or proper. The Chamberlain bill confines such draft to subjects of an enemy or allied enemy country. I believe this restriction to be wrong. Many neutral aliens are in this country immune from the draft and yet enjoying all the benefits and privileges of a prosperous country, and certainly if, in the judgment of the President, the occasion should arise, they ought to be compelled to do their bit in civil life to carry on this great war or to help support our people while it is going on. The third section prohibits the admission to this country of aliens who are subject to military duty in countries at war with the central powers of Europe.

Section 1 only applies to aliens who would be subject to the draft but for their alienage. Section 3 proposes to keep out all those subject to military duty in the countries at war with Germany and her allies. Other countries do not have the age limit and other restrictions on the draft that ours does, and without the provisions of section 3, this country will continue to be the refuge and rendezvous of thousands of slackers from the allied countries. For instance, Canada has passed, or is about to pass, a draft law in which I believe the age limit will probably be from 20 to 45 years. Section 3 of this bill, if adopted, will keep out thousands of refugees to this country whom even under section 1 we could neither draft nor deport.

Section 5 of the bill provides that the act shall remain in force only during the continuance of the war, except as to the provisions of section 1. It would not be right to limit section 1 to the duration of the war, because the provision depriving those affected by it of the right to become citizens is intended to be perpetual, and also because it may be impracticable to deport many till after the termination of the war. I believe that this bill is much more just, and will be much more effective, than the Chamberlain bill for several reasons.

The first paragraph of the first section of that bill excepts from its operation those who have not been residents of the United States for more than one year. That exception is fundamentally wrong. It leaves a loophole for the thousands of Canadians and other slackers who have rushed to this country to avoid military service in their own countries. A Member of Congress from one of the New England States told me a few days ago that he had no doubt but that there were 10,000 Canadians now in New England who have come over the border to escape the prospective draft. The immigration of French to this country has also increased greatly during the last year. While immigration from most of the countries has greatly decreased, that of the French, as shown by the immigration records, has increased from 18,166 in the year ending June 30, 1914, to 24,405 for the year ending June 30, 1917. There must be some significant reason for this. The principal vice of the Chamberlain bill is in the fact that it leaves to diplomatic agreement the drafting of those with whose countries we have treaties preventing compulsory military service.

That means more delay, just as was predicted by Senator Chamberlain would occur under the McCumber resolution.

Our bill does not wait on any negotiation, and yet does not violate any treaty.

There is at least one of the allied countries that I fear will never consent to the drafting of its citizens here, because they prefer to have them stay here and fill their wallets with American gold and send it back home to be put in circulation there.

Again, the Chamberlain bill has nothing like section 3 of our bill, which will prevent the continued flooding of this country with men running away from military service in their own countries. This is a most serious omission. I have heretofore pointed out other objections to the Chamberlain bill. I have no pride of authorship in the bill we have reported, and want to do everything possible to expedite the passage of some such legislation, but I do most earnestly insist on giving our American citizens a law that will mean something when it is placed on the statute books and not be a mere palliative makeshift.

War-Risk Insurance.

HON. EDWARD E. ROBBINS,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

Mr. ROBBINS. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen, we have had before us for the past six legislative days the discussion and consideration of this bill, and it is quite apparent, as we are about to vote on its final passage, that it will be adopted by this House with probably few, if any, dissenting votes.

The real purpose of this bill is to abolish the pension system, which has existed in this country since the Revolutionary War, and turn to a new, different, and, we believe, a better method of indemnifying and protecting the defenders of our country and their dependents; that is, we propose to insure the soldiers and carry the principle of life insurance and annuity payments which largely prevails now in civil life over to the soldiers, sailors, and marines who defend their country on the field of battle and by military service.

We have departed in this war from the plans of all previous wars by enacting a conscription law, and we are about to force into the military service, without consulting them, all physically fit men between the ages of 21 and 31. The universal prevalence of life and fraternal insurance and annuity indemnities against sickness, death, and physical incapacity is such now that a majority of these young men will have such protection, which we are told by the actuaries of experienced life insurance companies is carried on the lives of young men of 21 at the rate of $8 per thousand per year.

We have forced these young men into military service—placed them in extrahazardous occupation—and the insurance companies, instead of continuing the insurance, are compelled, in self-defense, either to cancel it, on account of the additional risk arising from the military occupation, or to charge extra premiums.

Now not only have we forcibly changed the insurable status of these young men, but we have cut down their earning power from their usual wages or salary, which nowadays is from $75 per month upward, to $30 or $33 in foreign service, which is double the salary heretofore granted to a soldier. If, therefore, their insurance is increased from $8 per thousand to $58 per thousand and their earnings are reduced from $100 per month to $33 per month, it is a simple demonstration of the fact that all the insurance of the soldiers must be dropped, canceled, and lost. This is so unfair that to meet such contingency the present bill has been devised.

It is proposed in this bill to retain a portion of the soldiers' wages and apply it to carrying this life insurance and the balance of the amount required shall be paid by the Government. Policies varying from $1,000 to $10,000 can be taken by the soldier and carried in this way.

The bill further contains the provision that this insurance is to be distributed, in cases of death, in payments according to the schedules contained in the bill, to the wife, children, and dependents therein named and not paid in a lump sum, which experience has proven is a very excellent method in granting relief to those who are inexperienced in business and unaccustomed in investing and caring for large sums of money.

The taking of the insurance is optional, but the allotting of it to the families and the dependents of the soldiers is compulsory, and the United States must pay to the family or the dependents an amount equal to the amount allotted by the soldier. That is, the taking of the insurance is optional but the payment of the amount realized on the policies in case of death is compulsory.

As to the other feature of the bill, the payment of indemnity against injury or like conditions, the provisions setting forth the compensation for the various injuries, and the amount distributed to the injured or the dependents, is fixed by schedules and obligatory in the bill.

There are several exceptionally good features in this bill. One of them I have just alluded to, that appeals to me most strongly, is the payment of the insurance in monthly installments, thus giving a widow or beneficiary, who ought to receive the money or amount in such sums as they can properly take care of, and will in all events prevent the wasting away of the money as is frequently the case where a lump sum is paid in case of death.

Another feature of this bill which is very commendable is that during 120 days from the soldier's enlistment if he dies or is killed in the service he is regarded as insured, this period being given for the purpose of permitting the soldier to look into the matter, investigate, and decide whether he wishes to insure under the Government plan through the Bureau of Insurance in the Treasury Department of the United States or not.

It is the intention of this bill to entirely eliminate the present pension system. I can not proceed further without stating that I believe it is a mistake to establish a new bureau to carry on this soldiers' insurance plan. It ought to be turned over to the Pension Office and handled there by the present force, which is a completely organized force, has a large building, with ample room to enable this to be efficiently done without any additional expense for quarters on the part of the United States Government.

Those of us who have been going around through the different departments in their work are disgusted with the great number of officials and clerks in various buildings located all over the city, many of them, as I observe in going about the departments, rendering inefficient and very imperfect and incomplete service. I myself have seen clerks sitting and talking for fully an hour without pretending to do any work, while I waited in an anteroom. Hence I feel that this new bureau that is being established here in the Treasury Department is just that much useless expense placed upon the Government, and will fill the Government with useless officeholders and burden the taxpayers with additional taxes. The party in power talks of economy and efficiency, and their great apostle Cleveland said, "Public office is a public trust," but it seems to have lost sight of both the principle of economy and efficiency in governmental affairs at this time.

The only great danger in this proposed departure from the pension system to the insurance system is the question of expense. I am quite well aware in the city of Pittsburgh and also of Philadelphia, and also, I am advised, in the city of New York, where attempts were made to pension school-teachers, that it was found impracticable, because the teachers would not pay in sufficient premiums to create an adequate reserve fund to meet the annuity distributions and death payments which the policies called for. In Pittsburgh the system was entirely abandoned, in Philadelphia it was also discontinued, and in New York it had to be radically changed. The recent receivership of the old strong financial fraternal society known as the Royal Arcanum indicates that unless an adequate reserve fund is created and maintained the demands of the policyholders arising from death can not be met.

However, the proposition before us is a different one. It is not a business proposition in the sense that the Government is to be adequately protected. The Government is forcing these young men into a hazardous occupation, where according to statistics 10 per cent of them will be killed, 25 per cent more will be maimed, crippled, and physically disabled in this horrible, bloody, and life-destroying war. No business principle such as controls insurance companies will apply to this situation. These men who die will leave dependents who must be cared for, if not by the General Government then by the poor boards of the local community. It would be scandalous to think that under these conditions the widow must become a pauper, or that the soldier himself who may come home crippled, maimed, and diseased shall become a charge on his community.

The Government can not pay in a financial way enough to these men. This proposition rests on the principle which provides that these men who have fought, lost their lives, or become disabled shall receive some compensation throughout the rest of their lives or during the dependent period of those whom they must support as a meager addition to the low wages the Government has paid them. That is to say, these men are going to suffer and risk their lives in defense of our country, and our Government must maintain and support them during the rest of their lives if they are injured, or their dependents during dependency, and in this way make good the duty and obligation it owes them and discharge a patriotic duty.

We can not stop to reason out what the probable expense will be under this bill, because that is not controlling. We are dealing with a proposition that is too important for speculation. What we mean by this bill is to adequately and surely protect our soldiers. The statistics upon which insurance actuaries build their tables are indeed very frivolous arguments against the enactment of this proposition into a law. These should not be at all considered.

It is stated that the probable expense for the first and second years would be as follows:

	First year.	Second year.
Family allowances	$141,000,000	$190,000,000
Death indemnities	3,700,000	22,000,000
Compensation for total disability	5,250,000	35,000,000
Compensation for partial disability	3,209,000	21,000,000
Insurance against death and disability	23,000 000	112,009,000

But that certainly is not a large expenditure of money considering the fact that it is based on an army of a million men in the field.

Compared with the pension system, now in operation, since the War of the Revolution, it seems to me to be much more rational, far more just, and a very much more expeditious plan.

When the young man enters the Army, he is physically fit, he has passed an examination. No other examination is required. He becomes insured on his own account; if he is killed, the proofs of his death are furnished by the military records and his insurance is payable immediately in payments according to the schedule in this bill. If he is injured, the hospital reports prove that fact, and before he arrives home his annuity payments are going to his dependents. What could be simpler, fairer, and better for a soldier who is generally in the position of helplessness, and in this instance in a foreign country, unable to attend to any matters of business or give proofs required by the Pension Bureau.

In comparing this system with the pension system, in 1916 we paid in payments to the soldiers of the Rebellion $159,155,090, in 1917 $160,895,054, yet the War of the Rebellion is 52 years in the distant past. On the 30th of June, 1916, there were on the pension rolls, soldiers of the War of the Rebellion to the number of 362,277, and June 30, 1917, 329,226.

These figures show that while the number of pensioners have decreased 33,051 during the year ending June 30, 1917, yet the amount of pensions paid has increased. No one is sorry for this. In fact, there is universal rejoicing that the Government is still making adequate payments to the soldiers, their widows, and dependents of the War of the Rebellion. It is one of the greatest debts of gratitude that our country can pay, and the universal approval of the payment to these soldiers in all these 52 years is a modest acknowledgment of the debt of gratitude we owe them. But the system has objections that the insurance system will meet and overcome.

There is a large amount of dissatisfaction among the soldiers themselves, claiming that pensions are inequitably granted. That men who have seen hard and long service are often inadequately compensated, while others who have seen little service draw larger pensions.

Then there is complaint that the old soldiers who have become helpless do not receive enough and that widows ought to receive more.

So many of these claims have come to my attention that are meritorious and right, and yet under the present pension laws no relief can be obtained, except by special legislation, which is well-nigh impossible of procurement under the slow, cumbersome methods of Congress, that I am willing to support the insurance and indemnity system proposed in this bill, which I believe will avoid all the objections to the pension system and give to our present Army much better protection for the arduous and dangerous service to be rendered to our country during the war.

We have entered this war to defend our country against the attacks of militarism under the lead of the German Kaiser. Military oligarchy is the implacable foe of every free republican form of government. It now understands that if free democracy is to prevail, autocracy supported by militarism must perish.

So it makes war on us. Without cause or justification the Imperial Military Government of Germany caused 23 of our ships to be sunk on the high seas, 226 of our citizens to be murdered, excluded our commerce from the ocean, filled our country with criminals and spies, burned our factories and blew up buildings and bridges, plotted to dismember our precious Union by giving Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona to Mexico if she would make war on us, and moreover, wanted Japan to attack us.

These young men who are entering the army of liberty are giving up all, staking their life for the defense of their country. For them we can not do too much. Let us do everything we can that it may not be said of us, as of old, that "Republics are ungrateful."

Senator Thomas M. Patterson.

OF
HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,
OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, September 15, 1917.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I am herewith inserting some brief addresses and newspaper editorials upon the life and character of the late Senator Thomas M. Patterson, of the State of Colorado.

I could insert hundreds of eloquent eulogies to his memory, but these few are typical and so completely reflect the sentiment of my State that I will only accompany them with a few words myself.

I can not hope to add anything to these sincere tributes, but having known and admired him from my boyhood days I would feel derelict in my duty to him and to my State if I did not lay a brief wreath of affection upon the grave of a departed friend, who for nearly a half century was one of the most distinguished citizens of the West.

His life is an inspiration to the youth of our Commonwealth. Throughout his long and busy life he discharged his full duty as a citizen, a soldier, a lawyer, an editor, and a patriotic statesman. He was of that type of man who makes States and Nations great and lead in the march of human progress. He was a typical western American. He believed in a square deal and fair play, and was always ready under any and all circumstances to stand up for human freedom and equal opportunity. His heart always beat for the welfare of common humanity. He was preeminently a fearless and ready fighter—a fighter in the court room, a fighter in politics, and a fighter for the public welfare. He always fought in the open. He was always aggressive and there was no cessation. He struck hard and never flinched from the return. His courage never failed, and he had the profound knowledge, the energy, and eloquence to achieve success. He was a power with whom all parties had to reckon. He was often charged with making trouble, and he did. But at least nine times out of ten he was making trouble for those who ought to have trouble made with them. He stood foursquare to the great problems and work of upbuilding the West. He helped make Colorado the great land of opportunity that it is to-day. He was Colorado's greatest newspaper man and Democracy's greatest evangelist. He made the ladders on which he climbed to success. His mind was like a rare gem—many-sided and all of them bright. He was a prodigious and indefatigable worker. His capacity for hard work amounted to a genuine genius. His adversaries would necessarily have to stop sometimes for sleep and rest, and when they appeared the next morning would find themselves beaten. His whole life exemplified what may be accomplished by untiring energy, unswerving honesty, and a heroic determination to make a success at whatever one undertakes. I was a member of the Colorado Legislature that elected him to the United States Senate, and I watched with admiration his marvelous career for 35 years.

He loved Colorado, and the State owes him an everlasting debt of gratitude. His life work forms a conspicuous part of the history of Colorado. He thoroughly and honestly believed in our people, and the pioneers of our State—especially the miners and the tens of thousands of laboring people generally—will always revere his memory. He richly deserves my idea of the highest tribute that can be paid to any citizen or official, namely, he kept the faith; he fought a good fight; he nobly performed his duty to the last; and every man, woman, and child in the State of Colorado is better off for his having lived.

When the future historians of our State shall write the faithful record of the men who made Colorado truly great, the name of Thomas MacDonald Patterson will forever shine with a brilliant luster among the West's greatest men.

A brave soldier, a model husband and father, a great lawyer, a publicist, a great editor, a successful business man, an eloquent orator and skilled debator, a tireless worker for the development of our State, an uncompromising and never conquered champion of the rights of the poor and friendless, one of the ablest Senators the West has ever sent to Washington, a man whose experience extended throughout the birth and growth and was always an active part in the civilization of the West. Such was Colorado's gifted son; such was the distinguished career of Senator Patterson's half-century of the rarest ability, vigor, and energy devoted to the upbuilding of Colorado and the upholding of the rights of her citizens.

Colorado will not look upon his like again. If a selection were to be made at this time of the two most distinguished citizens of the Centennial State whose statues should be selected to be placed in the great historic Statuary Hall in America's Capitol, it is no reflection upon the galaxy of her departed distinguished citizens to say that I believe the overwhelming sentiment of Colorado's million citizens would designate Senators Thomas M. Patterson and Henry M. Teller, who was for 30 years Colorado's "grand old man" in the United States Senate.

Senator Patterson had no fear of anything in this world or the next, and when the court of last resort issued its final summons to him he manfully bade farewell to his family and all earthly things and quietly journeyed to that undiscovered country from whose bourne no traveler returns.

> With a cheery smile and a wave of the hand,
> He has wandered into an unknown land.

The sentiment of the bench and bar of Colorado is fittingly expressed in the following memorial addresses and eloquent and sincere tributes to the memory of Hon. Thomas M. Patterson.

At the memorial meeting of the Denver Bar Association, held March 26, 1917, the judges of the district court sitting en banc, Mr. Horace N. Hawkins spoke as follows:

Mr. Chairman, members of the Denver Bar Association, ladies and gentlemen, we meet to-day to pay tribute to the memory of departed members of our association. When one upon whom death has laid his hand has lived to old age, has climbed to the topmost round of the ladder of distinction, and has been permitted to see the ripened fruit of his life's work, no note of sorrow need be struck in our tributes. It is a matter for rejoicing that after a long and useful life the end came to Senator Patterson before his splendid intellect had been seriously weakened, or his magnificent body crippled by the ravaging march of time.

Thomas M. Patterson was born in County Carlo, Ireland, November 4, 1839. When he was 10 years of age, the family embarked on a sailing vessel, and after a month on the ocean reached the harbor of New York, and the eyes of the young Irish lad first beheld the promised land of America, a land in which he was destined for over half a century to play no inconspicuous part.

In 1853 his father moved from New York to Crawfordsville, Ind., and there Senator Patterson worked in his father's store at the jeweler's trade, a trade that had been the calling of his forefathers for generations in Ireland. Later, attracted by newspaper work, he learned to set type on the Crawfordsville Review. He then set out for Indianapolis, walking the entire distance, paying for his food and lodging en route by repairing the farmers' clocks and watches. At Indianapolis he worked as a printer.

Then came the war, and he, in 1861, enlisted on the Union side. His brother, James Patterson, who also enlisted, was killed in the Battle of Winchester.

After Senator Patterson's discharge from the Army he became a student at Asbury University, now De Pauw University, at Greencastle, Ind. Later he attended Wabash College at Crawfordsville. In 1862 he married Miss Catherine Grafton, a member of an old Virginia family.

After leaving school he studied law in the office of M. D. White at Crawfordsville, afterwards a Member of Congress from that district. He was admitted to the bar in 1867 and practiced at Crawfordsville until 1872, when he came to Denver. His practice at Crawfordsville was entirely successful, but he longed for a larger field of work. Another reason for Senator Patterson's coming to Colorado is very interesting in the light of what occurred after he reached here. He had evidenced some fondness for politics in Indiana, and it was agreed in the Patterson family that it would be best to curb this tendency. So Mr. Patterson said that he would come to Colorado—that Colorado being a Republican State, there would be no temptation for him to take part in politics. In 1873 and 1874 he was city attorney of Denver. About this time he formed a partnership in the law with Charles S. Thomas. In 1874 he was elected Territorial Delegate to Congress, and was instrumental in securing the passage of an act enabling Colorado to take her place among the States of the Union. From 1876 to 1878 he was a Member of the lower House of Congress from the new State. In 1878 he was defeated for reelection. In 1879 and for some years afterwards he was actively practicing law as a member of the copartnership of Markham, Patterson, Thomas & Campbell, the firm having offices in both Denver and Leadville. Later the firm became Patterson & Thomas, probably the best known law firm ever in Colorado.

In 1888 Senator Patterson was a candidate for governor, but was defeated. He continued the practice of the law until 1892, when he announced his permanent retirement from practice for the purpose of devoting himself to the editorship of the Rocky Mountain News, in which paper he had purchased a controlling interest. Senator Patterson was at this time 53 years of age, and stood at the top of the legal ladder in the West. He had achieved as many legal victories as he cared for and he had no intention of ever practicing law again. Then came the terrible panic and financial troubles of 1893, and these drove him back into at least a partial resumption of his law work. So in 1895, 22 years ago, the partnership composed of Senator Patterson, Edmund F. Richardson, and Horace N. Hawkins was formed. This partnership, Patterson, Richardson & Hawkins, continued until 1905, at which time Mr. Patterson again announced his retirement from the practice of the law. In 1901 Senator Patterson reached the goal of his political ambition, being elected United States Senator from Colorado. The next year, 1902, in connection with Mr. Richard Crawford Campbell, he bought the Denver Times from David H. Moffat, and for several years Senator Patterson operated and conducted both of said papers.

He was not a candidate for reelection to the United States Senate.

In October, 1913, he sold the Rocky Mountain News, the Denver Times having been disposed of some time prior thereto. At this time Senator Patterson was nearly 74 years of age, and it would seem that he was entitled to some rest from the arduous work in which he had been engaged since his early manhood. But no sooner had he retired from the newspaper field than he was back actively and vigorously at work in public service for the people of Denver. Without pay or compensation of any kind he went to work in the Denver Union Water Co. case that was pending in the Federal court, and day in and day out fought as a lawyer without compensation in that case.

In 1914, at the age of nearly 75, he was prevailed upon to again make the race for governor. He made no effort to secure the nomination, but at the primaries he was overwhelmingly nominated. He failed of success at the election. Senator Patterson accepted his defeat in this instance with the same calmness and imperturbability that had characterized other defeats during his long years of political activity in Colorado. He was as undaunted in defeat as in victory. Within a short time after the election he began to work on the great question of fair freight rates for Denver and was actively at work on this question up to the time of his death, which occurred July 23, 1916, he having at that time reached nearly the age of 77 years.

To review the great work that Senator Patterson did while in Washington as the Representative of the people of Colorado would take far more time than can possibly be granted me on this occasion. When the great fight for statehood came up Patterson was Colorado's valiant champion, and our constitutional convention, held in 1876, adopted a resolution commending him for the successful fight he had made. One of the first acts which he secured the passage of in Congress was the donation by the Government to the city of Denver of the land on which the East Denver High School building was erected. This was while he was in the lower House. One of the last things he did in the Senate was to secure an appropriation for Denver's new post office. He was at all times active and diligent in every work that would aid and benefit Denver and Colorado. He was not a mere party man while in the Senate. Upon occasions he refused to be bound by his political caucus and supported President Roosevelt in numbers of measures. He at all times while in the Senate showed a lofty spirit of independence.

A history of his activities in political matters would take hours to relate. For 40 years he was a leader in Colorado's political battles. For many years Colorado was naturally a Republican State, and Senator Patterson, as the leader of the Democratic Party, went down to defeat over and over again. The usual stereotyped statement would then be made: "Tom Patterson is dead politically." But at the next election he would again, with undaunted courage, lead his forces to battle. He kept this up until he not only saw his own party in power, but he himself on the crest of the wave, reached the highest office in the gift of the State—the highest office in the United States to which he, of foreign birth, could ever aspire. When his election to that great office was announced he left the hurrahing crowds of enthusiastic friends and admirers and hastened to his home to give the news to his wife and daughter.

In politics Senator Patterson was a leader; never a follower. In 1892 he led the fight of the silver forces at the Democratic national convention and with his minority report hurled defiance at his party and predicted its defeat. He left the Democratic Party and became one of the leaders of the People's Party. In 1900 he was chairman of the national convention of the People's Party. In that year Colorado was given the signal and unusual honor of furnishing presiding officers at the national conventions of all the three great political parties.

As a newspaper editor, Senator Patterson's writings were quoted all over the United States. He never wavered in his devotion to a cause. He conducted his newspaper entirely independently from his law office and would never allow a case to be taken in the office which would in any way interfere with the policy of his newspaper. He would not only not take such a case himself, but he would not permit a partner of his to do so. During his ownership of newspapers he was often in conflict with great companies and corporations on questions of public affairs. He steadfastly refused any employment of himself or his law firm by such companies. On one occasion, when he was advocating through his paper a tariff on a certain commodity largely produced in Colorado, the business manager of his newspaper accepted a page advertisement from a great company producing this commodity. After thousands of copies of the paper had been printed, Senator Patterson discovered the advertisement and caused it to be taken out, the papers destroyed, and the money returned to the company. No one ever could truthfully say, during his ownership of the Rocky Mountain News, that it could either be bought or bulldozed.

Shortly after I came to Colorado, in 1893, there was a great religious warfare on in this State. Members of one particular church were being denounced for no other reason than their membership in that church. Visitors poured into Senator Patterson's office by the dozen, some coaxing, some threatening, in order to secure Senator Patterson's support in this religious warfare. I saw Senator Patterson, not once but dozens of times, pound on his table and told his visitors that he would see the News in the lowest pit of bankruptcy before he would consent to abuse men because they belonged to a particular church. Over and over again during Senator Patterson's ownership of the News, business men threatened to institute boycotts, and did institute them, on account of his course. He met them all fearlessly and vanquished every such effort to control the columns of his newspaper. His was at least one newspaper in the United States whose business columns did not control its editorials.

At one time a great corporation of Denver had him arrested on a criminal libel charge, and also sued him for a hundred thousand dollars damages each day for a long period of time. We had in the office at that time something like $3,000,000 of lawsuits against Senator Patterson for alleged libel. I never saw him, during all these days of storm and stress, at all worried over the outcome or show any fear as to the result. He was upon every occasion willing to fight it out with his adversaries and take whatever consequences might come.

As a lawyer, Senator Patterson occupied, up to the time of his death, the highest rank. It is my belief that as an advocate he never had in Colorado a superior and few equals. His very successful trial of a number of important criminal cases gave him the name of a great criminal lawyer, but the records of the Colorado courts will show that he participated in many great civil trials with equal success. He was in the important mining Apex trials in the Leadville district; in the famous Stratton will case at Colorado Springs; in the great Burns and Doyle litigation in Colorado Springs and Council Bluffs; and in most of the great and important cases while he was actively practicing at the bar; and into whatever case he went he was a tower of strength. In his lawsuits he was an indefatigable worker. It is no exaggeration to say that he was one of the hardest workers that ever came to the Colorado bar. He burned the "midnight oil" long past the midnight hour. One without his magnificent physique could never have performed the work that he did. He kept his health far past middle age by his temperate life. He used neither liquor nor tobacco in any form. He fought as hard in his lawsuits for the poor man or woman who could pay him little or nothing as he did for the rich, and his great legal ability was never mortgaged to any one company or corporation. He never charged a working woman a cent in his life, and he handled many cases and matters for working women. The humblest citizen, even though a negro, could go to his office and consult him without charge, and if Senator Patterson believed the man had not received a fair deal he was ready to start a lawsuit for the man, no matter what might be the wealth and power on the other side. He was never coerced by threats or fear of personal violence. After the first great strike at Cripple Creek was over hundreds of criminal cases were brought against the miners. Their first lawyer was tarred and feathered for defending them. Senator Patterson, in the face of threats of similar treatment, took up the gauntlet, went to Colorado Springs and successfully defended the men. In my long association with him I never saw him quail before adverse criticism. At no time in his life did he bend a fawning knee to men in high places, whether they were bankers on financial thrones or judges of the highest court in the land.

I had the great pleasure of close personal association with him up to the time of his death, and I may be therefore permitted to say that, to me, Thomas M. Patterson stands forth as the noblest fighter for the rights of man I ever knew.

As a man, as a lawyer, as an editor, and as a statesman, he has etched his name deep on the tablets of Colorado.

Senator Patterson accumulated a fortune, largely through his splendid appreciation of the value of real estate. He possessed the rare faculty of being able to look ahead and determine the future value of property. This, together with his unbounded confidence in the growth of Denver, which confidence he possessed up to the day of his death, led him to make wise investments of earnings made from his newspapers and his law practice. Numbers of valuable income properties which he owned at the time of his death were acquired after they had been hawked around town and refused by men supposed to be good judges of the value of property. He was modest in his own personal expenses, and his wealth grew with the growth of Denver. He was at all times charitable to the indigent. I never knew him to refuse aid to any needy man or women who applied for help at our office. He drew a service pension from the Government and turned it over every month to a Grand Army of the Republic post for the use of needy old soldiers.

In some respects his life was different from that of many wealthy men. He viewed things differently from many men who acquire large property interests. He was a rich man who operated coal mines, always with union labor, and he always paid the union scale of wages. Incidentally I may say that he never had a strike of the workingmen in his mines. Some other rich people did not understand why he was not like them. They said, "He is one of us, but not one of us." Although a rich man, he was not a vested interest man. In the great labor strikes that occurred in Colorado he occupied the somewhat rare position of being a rich man who sympathized with the strikers. In the numerous contests which occurred in Colorado, where the views of the vested-interest class clashed with those less fortunate over such things as the primary law, the iniative and referendum, and other measures of that kind, the singular situation existed that Senator Patterson, a wealthy man, led the fight against the vested interests. And to-day there is not one of those great reform measures on our statute books that does not owe its existence largely to Senator Patterson. If you can point to many instances of this kind I will withdraw the statement I have often made, that Senator Patterson was one of the most wonderful men this country has ever seen. What was the reason for this leaning of Senator Patterson away from many others of his class? Perhaps he never forgot the days when he was a journeyman at the jeweler's trade. Perhaps he bore with him the memory of his struggles when he worked his way through college. Certain it is that to his dying day he told with glowing eye of the hearty greetings and hospitality of the common people in Indiana when he tramped through the country on his way to the city looking for work. Perhaps he never forgot the struggles of the poor in the island from which he came. Whatever the reason, it can be truthfully said, and must be admitted by everyone, that Senator Patterson's heart was with the whole people rather than with the favored few; and as long as popular government shall last the people of this State will be under strong obligations to him. Many of the battles in which he engaged had a great and lasting effect on our city. He was the bitter opponent of corporations attempting to control our municipal politics. Now most of the corporations admit that he was right, and as time has gone on, more and more his political opponents have given him full credit for the great work he has done.

It is pleasing to remember that in his last public service for Denver he was one of the leaders of and associated with prominent men who had in the past, on many occasions, fought him and his work. Time had softened the asperities of former years, and Senator Patterson died with the respect and regard of all classes of our citizens.

I repeat that as a man, as a lawyer, as an editor, and as a statesman Thomas M. Patterson etched deep his name on the tablets of Colorado.

Mr. George F. Dunklee spoke as follows:

I wish upon this occasion to say a word as to the late Senator Patterson. Naturally my mind runs back to the time I first met him. When I first came to Denver, in the early eighties, I came for the purpose of taking up the study of the law, and, as was the custom in those days, I found a place in a law office where they were willing to take a student who was expected to do what he could in payment for the room he occupied. There were quite a number of law students so situated, and finally we formed a society for the purpose of facilitating our study of the law, and planned a lecture course and a moot court.

Then arose the problem of getting lawyers who would give us lectures. First, with others, we called upon Mr. Patterson at his office. Although he was a very busy man, I remember the kindness with which he received us. He was then only about 40 years of age, actively engaged in law practice, and earning large fees; yet he listened to us, took out his memorandum book, and, as we went through the different lines of work and the lectures that we would like to have given, he gave us dates when he would lecture upon "Evidence," upon "Contracts," and upon "Criminal law"; and we went away feeling that the kindness that he had exhibited would make our course a success. To my mind no professor, no lawyer, no lecturer, could have talked in a more instructive or entertaining way than Senator Patterson in giving his lectures to the law students of those days. And those students always appreciated it; they were always his friends to his dying day.

When I went into the law offices of Patterson & Thomas, located in the Barclay Block, as a law student, the office force consisted of Judge Rising, Lafe Pence, Charles Hartzell, and later Harry Bryant and Harry Lee.

Mr. Patterson was a most kindly and gentlemanly man; there was never any trouble in his office; we never heard any loud words; everything moved smoothly; and, although there was a large amount of business being transacted, no trouble occurred with his help. I never knew of any person who ever worked for him being discharged. I never knew of any trouble. I never knew of anything but the greatest loyalty on the part of all who served him in any capacity. If any trouble did occur, I never heard of it. He had the loyalty of all who knew him intimately.

In court he was an able advocate. He would not be crushed wrongfully by anyone, be it the attorney upon the other side or the judge upon the bench; but was a bold advocate, upholding his rights. I remember how we students, hoping that some time we would be lawyers, would keep track of his cases because we were learning our law in law offices, studying the books and going to the courts; and when Mr. Patterson appeared in court the law students would be there. How well I remember his defense of Robert W. Speer, of Charles H. Scott, of Mrs. Witter, and the great Apex cases of the Aspen mines, and other litigation, when we students gathered to see how cases were conducted and to learn something of practice in the courts. No matter what others might have thought of his ability as a lawyer, I can say that Senator Patterson was the hero of the law students, and he won and kept first place in their hearts and in their minds, and ever will keep it.

Hon. Walter Walker, the editor and manager of the Daily Sentinel, of Grand Junction, Colo., paid the following beautiful tribute to the Senator:

THOMAS M. PATTERSON.

Suddenly, unexpectedly, there died in Denver yesterday one of the greatest men that Colorado ever claimed as a citizen.

The passing of Thomas MacDonald Patterson marks the passing of one of the most remarkable citizens and marks the closing of one of the most remarkable careers that ever filled few or many pages of the history of any Western State.

Statesman, editor, lawyer, soldier of the Civil War, he towered as a giant; he gained fame and honors as a statesman, as an editor, as a lawyer, as a soldier—honors of an extent and fame of a lasting degree such as come to but few men in a great Commonwealth.

His was a wonderful personality, a mighty intellect, an indomitable will, a brilliant mind, and a power of leadership and influence that was nothing short of astounding.

For nearly half a century this man helped make and helped write Colorado history. He came to Colorado before it was a State. He was a pioneer among pioneers, just as he was a man among men. And during that half century no man's name appears more often on the records of a great State than appears the name of Thomas MacDonald Patterson.

Naturally a man of his vigorous personality and often dominating spirit made many enemies in political circles and in other circles, and the bitterness of these enemies was well attested and plainly proven in the gubernatorial campaign of two years ago.

No man that Colorado ever sent as a Senator to the National Capital wielded as much influence as did Senator Patterson during the years of his service.

As the editor and owner of the Rocky Mountain News and Denver Times for many years, he made those papers among the most powerful papers of the entire West, and their influence was far reaching and tremendous.

Tom Petterson is dead, and friend and foe alike can in sincerity agree that he was one of the real big, commanding figures of 50 years of Colorado history.

A mighty oak in the forest of the West's big men fell when Tom Patterson died.

Hon. Rod S. Day, editor and manager of the Durango Democrat, of Durango, Colo., gave a splendid memorial write up of Senator Patterson, a small part of which follows:

WE PLAY NO POLITICS BEYOND THE GRAVE—COLORADO'S GRAND OLD MAN, THOMAS M. PATTERSON, PASSIONATE LOVER OF DEMOCRACY, IS GONE.

Thomas M. Patterson, former United States Senator from Colorado, one of the first congressional representatives in early days, who built up the Rocky Mountain News and made it a power and later bought the Denver Times, the friend and defender of organized labor, who was always found on the side of the worker in the great industrial battles that raged for years in the leading mining camps of the State, died a little before 2 o'clock Sunday afternoon, July 23, 1916.

Patterson was for many years at the head of the grand phalanx of democracy, including Charles Spaulding Thomas, Charles J. Hughes, Thomas Jefferson O'Donnell, and Robert Speer, which dominated the State, not only politically but in its economic policies. A greater galaxy of intellect no Western State has every known.

Patterson was essentially a man of the people. Born in Ireland, a poor boy, he came to America, fought rocks on a niggardly Indiana farm, followed the advice of Horace Greeley and chose Colorado for his life work.

With his strong lips cold in death, his ears dulled to the word of friend or foe, there will be the ironical presentation of death's bitterest irony, for, as Thomas M. Patterson's life was a battle from the cradle to the grave, so will contention be waged above his dust until the last person who knew him has gone the way of no returning.

But Patterson's "old school"—the editors and reporters who worked for him on his newspapers—the last journalistic force that truly represented the common people on a Denver newspaper—these men will pay the tribute of their tears to one of the last rich Americans who still held to true democracy.

Patterson had thousands of bitter enemies. But he was seemingly glorified in them. He was hated by every big mining company, every trust, every railroad, every corporation that stands for special interest and privilege and graft and loot in this State. And he fought them to the last.

Patterson stood with the Colorado miners in every strike. He went further. He fought for them all over the West, because when Patterson owned the News and the Times those newspapers were real powers. Since he gave up the papers, they have sunk to nonentities as far as political influence is concerned.

Patterson had a host of political enemies; but none of the men who fought him in his own party for years will nurse bitterness, now that he is gone, because they understand that the things that caused their opposition arose from Patterson's mental characteristics.

Few men loved Patterson, but he was respected because he was a wonderful fighter. He defied the business interests of Denver and fought an advertising boycott on his newspapers for three months rather than surrender his pursuit of a policy in behalf of labor.

In the smelters, the mills, the fields, wherever men and women and children toil, Patterson's name is blessed. No curse of plutocracy can ever stain his name for the poor.

Long a dominant figure in Colorado politics, publicist and attorney of national reputation, Senator Patterson left a deep impression on Colorado politics. He was a member of a group of pioneer public leaders of the State.

Senator Patterson is survived by his daughter, Mrs. Richard Campbell; his son-in-law, Richard Campbell; and their two children, Richard Campbell, jr., and Thomas Patterson Campbell. His wife died in July, 1902. Fred P. Johnson and Arthur C. Johnson, both of Denver, are nephews.

Hon. John M. O'Connell, editor and manager of the Salida Mail, of Salida, Colo., gave an exhaustive and well-merited character sketch of the Senator, a portion of which is as follows:

PASSING OF T. M. PATTERSON MARKS CLOSE OF REMARKABLE CAREER—RENOWNED STATESMAN, ORATOR, LAWYER, PUBLICIST, AND LEADER OF MEN, HE MEETS DEATH AS HE MET LIFE—SOME ANECDOTES OF HIM.

Thomas M. Patterson is dead.

Colorado has been singularly blessed with great men. The pioneers who carved civilization out of the wilderness of this State were some of the greatest men that have ever lived in America. Colorado was famed in Congress and in conventions, in courts of justice and in literature, long before it became a State. The men chosen by Colorado to represent it in historical assemblages took second place from no man. But above them all rose Tom Patterson, lawyer, statesman, orator, journalist—the supreme shining intellectual light before whom all others bowed.

Tom Patterson possessed a brain that was never fathomed. He handled men like so many playthings, and when some of the cleverest of them believed they had him beaten and outwitted they found they had only walked into a trap set for them.

In many elections Patterson failed to elect his ticket, but he never was defeated. He always was a power to be reckoned with. It will be a surprise to many that some of his greatest enemies secretly admired him. And why not? Every virile man loves a fighter. Tom Patterson had no yellow streak.

DEATH CONQUERED.

He conquered death as he conquered men. When the summons came he was ready, and death left no sting. He had lived beyond the allotted three score and ten, measured in years, but measured in achievement he lived several centuries.

CARE OF HIS BODY.

Tom Patterson was careful of his body, knowing that a healthy mind requires a healthy machine. He worked hard but he did not neglect recreation. While in law practice he usually remained at his office desk till midnight. Even in his later years he frequently was at his editorial desk till a later hour. He could stand an enormous amount of physical punishment but he made allowances for it with proper recreation later. He was careful of his diet and of his dress. His body finally gave way like a machine that carries a heavy load. It had been kept well oiled but it had performed its maximum of work and its career was ended.

MORALLY CLEAN.

Patterson was morally clean, notwithstanding he was a "matinée idol" of the women. As one woman expressed it, "He could receive an angry woman with the greatest deference, talk to her a few moments in a soft, purring voice, and send her away believing it was a privilege to have met him."

When Patterson wrote a legal document all the lawyers in Colorado could not find a flaw in it. One lawyer said, speaking of a contract Patterson had drawn, "The only lawyer in Colorado who can find a way to break that contract is Patterson himself."

When the panic of 1907 came along the bankers of Denver were not friendly to Patterson but they got the old man out of bed to help them prevent a panic.

When the big coal strike was on Patterson said if he were elected governor he would invite young John Rockefeller out here to look things over. It will be recalled that Mr. Rockefeller did come in person.

In the days of his real work, Patterson could stand before an audience and sway it as he pleased. He could write an editorial that would set the whole State to talking. He could defeat any man he set out to defeat. And while it is apparent he was sometimes wrong, he was always a powerful factor in every election since the day he came to Colorado.

Hon. Elmer E. Wheatley, editor and manager of the Grand Valley News, of Grand Valley, Colo., who was a former reporter on the Rocky Mountain News, Senator Patterson's paper, paid the following just and eloquent tribute to his former associate and ever after friend:

SENATOR PATTERSON DEAD.

Senator Thomas MacDonald Patterson is dead. He departed this life on last Sunday afternoon near the age of 77. In the death of Mr. Patterson Colorado has lost a vigorous statesman and the working people a true friend. The memory of his achievements will not perish so long as this Commonwealth shall endure.

Born in Ireland, Mr. Patterson came to this country when a little more than an infant and grew to manhood in the State of Indiana, where he laid the foundation upon which he subsequently constructed the great superstructure, the embodiment of all the splendid achievements of his wonderful life.

At the outbreak of the Civil War he enlisted in the army of Lincoln, and valiantly served his colors with remarkable patriotism.

In the early seventies he came to Colorado, where he arose to fame like a magnificent skyscraper towering above its environments.

As a statesman and lawyer, he was only rivaled by the brilliant Wolcott. The latter a specialist, the former a genius whose virile spirit will be asserted in a boundless future. As an editor, he stands unparalleled in the journalistic history of this State. He was a natural leader who assumed his position by force of his splendid character. A man of strong peculiarities, he was able, trained, and fearless, and there was no man more thoroughly identified with the political history of this State than was Mr. Patterson. He served with distinction in both the National House of Representatives and the United States Senate. But to one great object of his life, the giving of his personal assistance to the common people, he was supremely devoted. From the pursuit of that object nothing could deflect him. A brilliant speaker, he despised idle and aimless chatter. Upon all political questions he was a recognized authority. He spoke with the keenest wit and was unmerciful in its use when occasion required. His life's work will stand as a magnificent monument among the great achievements of the Occident.

A number of years ago, when Mr. Patterson was associated with the late John Arkins in the publishing of the Rocky Mountain News, the editor of the Grand Valley News was a reporter employed on his paper. I believe it was about this time that EDDIE KEATING (now one of Colorado's distinguished Congressmen) was a newsboy carrying a route for Mr. Patterson's paper. I also recall that Mr. Patterson was especially fond of young men. He often courted their society, encouraged, and generously helped them. He was easily moved by the distress of others. He was kind, charitable, and lavish in the relief of poverty. He possessed positive characteristics which at times seemed contradictory but which combined to make one of the most memorable characters in the history of the Centennial State. And lastly, Mr. Patterson was a man who had the courage to meet any opponent and was never overmatched in intellectual conflict.

Senator John T. Joyce, editor and publisher of the Silverton Standard, of Silverton, Colo., expressed in a few words the sentiment of the San Juan country, as follows:

SENATOR PATTERSON DEAD.

No message or tongue or pen that mail carries or wires flashed ever carried more genuine sorrow into the hearts of the people of Colorado than that which told of the death of Hon. Thomas M. Patterson, former United States Senator from Colorado, which occurred shortly after 1 o'clock last Sunday afternoon at his home, 1075 Pennsylvania Street, Denver.

As one of the early pioneers, as editor, lawyer, and statesman, he did as much as any one individual in paving the way for his beloved State to reach the greatness and prosperity she now enjoys. With a spirit of militancy and a nature aggressive, he was always found battling on that side of every public question which to him seemed righteous. He was never noncommittal, always brought into the open, and never turned his back to friend or foe. Those who opposed him were among his greatest admirers, because he rose superior to fear or corruption in the discharge of duty. He was a devoted father and faithful friend, generous and charitable. Colorado has lost one of its strongest characters, best and truest friends, whose memory she will fondly cherish through the years to come.

Hon. George O. Blake, editor and publisher of the West Slope, of Cedaredge, Colo., gave a very brief but accurate word picture of the Senator in the following:

THOMAS M. PATTERSON.

Sunday afternoon former United States Senator Thomas M. Patterson passed away at his home in Denver. No man had a larger part in the history of this State. For many years he was the most prominent figure in it. He was restless, energetic, persistent. Warm friends, bitter enemies, were the two classes into which citizens of the State were divided. Senator Patterson was erratic and often astonished his admirers and friends by going off at a tangent. His animosities were relentless, his ambition to lead and succeed boundless. To his credit are most of the reforms which have been accomplished in the State. He amassed a fortune, but was ever the champion of the common people and against the encroachments of special privilege. His virtues and foibles were equally prominent and characteristic. His activities in public life earned the hostility of practically every other man in public life. His power was acknowledged by all, and on the whole was directed toward the right. While owner and editor of the Rocky Mountain News no man in the State wielded greater influence on public opinion than he. His name is writ large on the pages of Colorado history and will never be effaced. At the age of 77 years he surrendered to the grim reaper.

Rehabilitation and Reeducation of Wounded Soldiers.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. SIMEON D. FESS,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, September 18, 1917.

Mr. FESS. Mr. Speaker, last week, when we had under discussion the soldiers' insurance bill, I took occasion to give the Members of this body the results of some research in the field of the rehabilitation and reeducation of the war cripple.

At that time I confined my remarks to the orthopedic and prosthetic possibilities as demonstrated by such men as Dr. Amar, of France. The investigations did not extend to the practical side as applied to the administration of such a work of rebuilding, except as incidentally mentioned in the case of Canada.

I also expressed the fear that our Government did not sense the supreme importance of the field and could not therefore keenly appreciate the time element which was of first significance. There has been for years fugitive efforts in cities to care for the cripple from a purely altruistic point of view and through private effort supported by voluntary contributions. The decade just preceding the war witnessed spasmodic efforts of those aroused by the frightful loss of human energy by industrial accidents to arouse a public sentiment to support some system of rehabilitation of the industrial cripple. But no effort on this line ever got beyond the stage of resolutions by conventions and agitation by humanitarian leaders. But the war compelled not only an organization of public opinion but immediate steps, voluntary and private at first but official later on.

The work of rehabilitation must not be left to private or voluntary endeavor; it will defeat its own purpose. If the wounded soldier upon his discharge from the hospital must depend upon himself to reenter life in a community he will most likely fall by the way and become a subject of public charity. To be sure, the insurance bill is meant to prevent this fatality.

On the other hand, if he must depend upon the assistance of voluntary associations of altruistic purposes it will be temporary and must finally be disappointing.

The investigations of Col. George Pope, president of the National Association of Manufacturers, show the entire willingness of heads of businesses to take back employees who come back crippled wherever they can be safely employed. Many express the willingness to favor the employment of such men where it can be done without consequent injury to production. But it must be apparent that the patriotic enthusiasm will not assure a continuance of this employment, especially after the stress which is bound to follow the cessation of the war, when doubtless our country will see in every form the evidences of war's ravages. There must be a way opened that will not have to depend upon the momentary impulse of the producer.

Then it must be apparent to all that the tendency of legislation which looks to a protection of the worker in compensation laws will make all employers cautious in employing men who might become subject to accidents which might involve total disability.

For, as it has been pointed out, a dismembered employee can not protect himself against industrial accidents so well as the more agile, and would inevitably be discriminated against in employment by the business management who wishes to guard against the compensation for total disability. This feature alone ought to convince us all that it must not be left to the goodness of business organizations to take care of the war cripple.

My concern has not been so much the attitude of the community or business toward the war cripple. It is whether the Government will take steps to assure a sane utilization of human capacity by a course of governmental training to place in possession of the war cripple command of his powers, which otherwise would be as if nonexistent.

Our observations have convinced us that such possibilities are within reach.

What has been done in war-stricken Europe is simply marvelous. War victims who in past years would have reconciled themselves to a life of the derelict, pitiful and hopeless, subjects of public charity as it could be secured on the streets, now know the self-respect and consequent pleasure of a life of independent production, which enables them to rebuke the mercenary alms giver by looking the world in the face and declaring that while he has left upon the battle fields what money can not buy, and has returned to his people with an emasculated frame, he disdains to depend upon the favor of any man, but insists what bread he eats shall be the bread of independence.

What such men can do is exemplified in a most convincing manner by the display of articles exhibited in a French museum. These articles were made by mutilated men who have been reeducated.

Mr. Eugene Delard, the curator at the Musée Galliéra, where the exhibition was given, said:

When the idea of this exhibition came to us six months ago some people, while warmly approving the idea, found it overbold and a trifle premature. The directors of the reeducation centers themselves were prudently reserved and exhibited a tendency to defer the date of the exhibit, which to be convincing must necessarily show results rather than attempts. This was an excess of modesty on their part, a misunderstanding of their own merits, and also of the infinite resources of our race, which rarely foresees, never prepares, but adapts itself to everything with marvelous decision and facility.

After paying a just homage to the zeal, devotion, and highly intelligent direction of the teachers who receive the wrecks of the war and reinstate them in the laborious life of their native land, we must bend the knee before these brave men who, after having so nobly paid their debt to their country with their own persons, now devote their splendid courage and their patient energy to regain their place in the world of labor with precarious means.

We have here a prodigy of will power which few among us had suspected. To appreciate it we have only to think for a moment of the change of habits, the transposition of existence, which awaits even those who return uninjured from the war. For a long time they have lived an intense physical life, alert and adventurous, with rushing blood and muscles taut for sudden efforts involving various risks. And if they will undoubtedly have a good deal of trouble in regaining order and methods, adapting themselves to slow and peaceful tasks, what shall we say of those who face such tasks still suffering from the wounds received, and in doubt and anguish as to the future?

But they may be completely reassured. The proof has been given—and how magnificently and how movingly—that the cripple will not linger on the margin of life; that he is not a weakling, a social outcast, the object of a casual charitable pity, but an element of useful energy, a creature of conscious valor and strength who has reconquered by lofty struggle his place in the society of workers, and will assist in the rebirth of the country he has helped to save.

If the Musée Galliéra had held to its initial and clearly defined program of professional education, properly so called, it would have been very interesting, to be sure, but more severe of aspect, with drier documentation, holding to a field which in itself has but remote relations with art. In receiving, besides cripples returned to civic life, wounded men whose cases are still uncertain, and who will perhaps eventually become almost free from pain, we have stimulated individual initiative, encouraged imagination, and have here and there discovered genuine artists among occasional workers.

It is to these that the exposition owes its gaiety of aspect, its charm, its color, and, we do not hesitate to declare, its very modern note, for there is no appreciable difference in general appearance from other exhibitions of current decorative art heretofore given in the museum.

From this exhibit, whose popularity grows daily, certain information infinitely precious and comforting is to be derived; in the first place, life henceforth is assured by labor to the thousands of beings who remain, despite their physical losses, live forces, useful wheels, far more numerous than one would have believed, in the great social machine, for it is now averred that 80 per cent of the crippies are perfectly teachable; in the second place, the hearty enthusiasm of the crowd which fights to obtain the work of these brave men, the commerce which solicits them, the industry which reclaims them.

To cite but one example, the directors of the great bazaars of Paris and the Provinces have come to us asking to be put in touch with the bureaus of reeducation. And it is the renaissance of the French toy which will spring from this, and its flight into the world whence the German rubbish had driven it.

And the same thing is true in other industries, every one among manufacturers and customers having it at heart to employ the crippies for the restoration of national production, which is now assured.

One of the best-informed men of to-day in this field is Mr. Norman Dean, of Toronto, Canada, the official statistician of the workman's compensation board.

As is well known, Canada has accomplished more in the field of reeducation of the mutilated soldier than any other country.

Last month Mr. Dean made an address in Boston, Mass., in which he dealt extensively with Canada's system. Among other things he said:

Go where you will to-day and dig beneath the ramifications of variant factors and you will find that the physical mutilation is the basis upon which all permanent-injury payments are made, irrespective of disability accruing therefrom. The individual is received direct from surgical treatment, often crippled more from inadequate and ignorant attention than by injury, generally without proper prothesis, and always without special knowledge being applied, without any time for readjustment to the changed conditions, without either functional or professional reeducation, given a pension and, without aid or assistance except from benevolence or shame of employers, or charity from outsiders, is thrown upon his own resources and allowed ignorantly and passively to rehabilitate himself as best he can.

Sir H. Rider Haggard said of the Canadian system of restoring military cripples to industry, "I make no comparisons. We are taught that comparisons are odious. But I have traveled through the Empire and I know of no system which approaches that which you are fortunate enough to have in Canada." In the restoration of its disabled men to industry the Canadian idea is that soldiers are citizens and must be treated in the light of their citizenship.

The organization of the Canadian system is threefold: (1) Dominion—The department of militia and defense under which the soldier is from enlistment to discharge; the military hospitals commission, for providing convalescent homes, medical treatment, and vocational reeducation for disabled returned soldiers; the board of pensions, commissioners which have exclusive jurisdiction in respect to pensions, gratuities, allowances, and assistances to members of the Canadian forces and their dependents. (2) Provincial—Commissions in each Province to provide employment for disabled soldiers. (3) Voluntary—Welcoming committees, philanthropic organizations, employment bureaus, visiting committees, etc. Besides these, various departments of Federal and provincial Governments aid in land-settlement schemes, employment bureaus, etc.

A Canadian casualty is handled at the front, in England, and across the Atlantic to the Canadian receiving depot by the department of militia and defense. The military hospitals commission takes charge of him through the hospital and convalescent home, up to discharge, then through reeducation. The board of pensions commissioners and the provincial commission deal with the man after discharge.

Up to discharge pay and allowances, field and separation, continue. On discharge, accrued arrears and three months' pay is given. If the soldier goes into reeducation he is put into the military hospitals commission command, a unit of the service, and pay and allowances are restored. As long as a man is in service his dependents, if needy, are looked after by the Canadian patriotic fund, which, although supported by voluntary contributions, is under Dominion charter. It is to be noted that enlistments in the military hospitals commission command are for treatment not for service.

The service pay and allowances for rank and file is: Pay, $1 a day; field allowance, 10 cents a day; separation allowance, $20 a month. Up to $20 a month pay may be assigned to dependents. At discharge three months' pay and allowances are given. During reeducation, if not in hospital, subsistence allowance of $1 a day is given, besides separation allowance up to $35 a month less pension for wife, and varying sums of from $3 to $7.50 a month for children, the maximum allowance for wife and children being $55 a month.

The hospital and convalescent home organization comprises special hospital cars, sanitaria for tuberculosis, for incipient and for incurable cases, hospital for psychiatric treatment, hospitals, convalescent homes for rheumatism, special treatment or rest and summer camps. When thought advisable men are allowed to recuperate in their own homes, subsistence allowance being made.

The medical and surgical treatment is the best and most effectual that science can offer; it includes functional reeducation as well as treatment. From the medical side, radiograph apparatus, active and passive mecanotherapy, galvanic, static, Faradic, and high tension currents, vibration, electric massage, baking, hot-air blast, continuous hot-water baths, and the balanced magnet are some of the methods and devices used. From the functional reeducational side, Dr. Botts's apparatus, modifications on the Amar principle, to restore lost functional motion and to cure hysteria, torsion machines, exercises, and gymnasia are illustrations of the care taken. In amputation cases every effort is made to get the patient to evolve as much functional movement as is possible in the stump. It is alike the French, the German, and the Canadian idea that work properly selected and graduated has a high psychic value and constitutes the best possible means of reaccustoming muscles to action.

The purpose behind professional reeducation is that the disabled man be restored to industry, given back his power to work which constitutes his manhood to the end that he be not thrown into the garbage can of civilization—poverty relieved by charity.

The man chooses his own occupation, being adroitly "steered" by the visitors of the local committee and the vocational officers, who act upon the reports received during functional reeducation. The work is commenced during convalescence, and continued, if necessary, beyond. The general training comes first. Instruction in English for non-English-speaking persons, language, penmanship, and arithmetic. The vocational retraining covers many fields, including bookkeeping, shorthand, typewriting, telegraphy, wood working, light-metal work, leather working, automobile and internal-combustion engineering, shoe repairing, gardening, poultry keeping, bee keeping, vegetable and flower raising, road building, and general farming. Every effort has been made to secure experts in the various lines as instructors. In some cases—the practice, it is understood, is to become more general—apprenticeship contracts are secured in industrial establishments. The training given is not given merely as training, but as a power to secure livelihood and as such the demand is carefully watched and regulates the supply. It would be possible, given time enough, to make disabled men into professors of Hindu philosophy, but to what avail? Again experience shows that inconsequential training as tatting, knitting, or basket weaving, etc., is of little value except as treatment.

Special methods are employed for the reeducation of the totally blind and totally deaf, converting these from the category of totally disabled to self-supporting.

The work of reemployement is carried on under Provincial organization, commissions appointed by the local government. Its work is supplemented by the efforts of municipal, local voluntary, and philanthropic organizations. The end in view is to get the soldier into industry, finding him a position which he is capable of filling, so that he can meet the competition of men who have not been disabled. By keeping careful record of the man, by visiting him, and by encouraging him much is being done. The idea is that a soldier naturally suffers from war shock and comes back mentally and physically changed, accustomed to waiting for and acting on specific orders, and hence lacks in initiative and because of this must be encouraged and aided. Job after job must be found suitable to his disabled physical structure and changed psychic conditions, till at last time obliviates his restlessness and rehabilitation restores his industrial powers to compete in the open market.

To date in Canada there are more jobs than jobless, the positions filled paying from $10 a week to $150 a month. The Canadian Manufacturers' Association is interesting its members, publicity agencies are cooperating, investigative talent is preparing a list of occupations in which disabled men may compete to the end that a complete industrial survey may be made.

Mr. Speaker, the possibilities are at once vast and imperative. When the bill was under consideration I was fearful its significance was not fully sensed. I have made some investigation since and am gratified to learn that extended studies are being pursued touching not only the scientific side but also the psychologic, the sociologic, and industrial as it affects labor, as well as the humanitarian. We can expect in the near future such legislation as befits a great Nation in the care of its citizens who make the supreme sacrifice.

Roosevelt and Volunteers.

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, April 27, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration amendment authorizing the President to raise by voluntary enlistment four divisions of men not subject to draft, being an amendment to a bill to increase the Military Establishment of the United States (H. R. 3545).

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, the disappearance of the rubber stamp and the reappearance of the distinguished Congressman from Massachusetts [Mr. GARDNER] assures me that we may now have a parliament here as they have in France, in England, and in Russia, that is not afraid to meet its constitutional responsibilities instead of a linotype machine. Encouraged by this, I want to say a word or two only to you about this amendment concerning my old comrade of the Spanish War, Col. Roosevelt. The able and useful gentleman from Illinois [Mr. MANN], who has just addressed you, asserts that they are going to conscript people in such a manner that they will not be conscripts, though the recruiting officers are urging them to volunteer in order to avoid a distinction their advertisements indicate. The men who go to this war will be judged by what they do after they are in the Army, not by the manner in which they enter. But it will take months to produce an army by the method required by the amendment to the committee bill which was offered here in the minority report. The call for volunteers arranged for in the bill offered by the committee with its preparation for conscription, if necessary, will cause an army of volunteers to spring from the ground as they did in 1861 and 1898.

We have repeatedly been told on this floor that this is not a pink-tea war. Whether that is official or not, if you keep everybody from fighting who wants to fight, I do not know what else you are going to make of it. The gentleman from Kentucky [Mr. SHERLEY] told us very gravely a few moments ago that he has been fighting here for days for a great principle. The only principle involved here, as far as I can see, is whether this war will be fought by men who want to fight or by men who do not want to fight. We all know that if the General Staff had left town the night war was declared there would be a million men under arms in this country right now [applause], but that little band of willful men [laughter] has made it impossible up to date to array one soldier in war. On November 1, 1861, six months after the Civil War began, Gen. Grant wrote that he had 20,000 well-drilled men as ready to go to battle as any men could be who had not already been under fire. As far as I can remember, his opinion on that subject is as good as that of any man who ever lived in America. But we have been told by the "experts" that it will take us a year, under the theory they advance, to make an army.

The gentleman asks how long it takes to make a soldier. Anybody that can not make a soldier, as far as he can be made without going into battle, in six months can not ever make a soldier, excepting those in special departments, of course. Any soldier who can not in six months learn all there is for the average soldier to learn, except what he learns under fire, will never learn the trade. I would rather have 30 days of drill and 30 days on the firing line—for that is where they make soldiers—than a year in a training camp, and so would anybody who has ever been to war. This amendment provides for 100,000 volunteers and the utilization of him whose blast upon the bugle horn is worth a thousand men.

As a new Member I had not intended to speak to you now at all, and it is with considerable diffidence that I take the floor for this first speech in this Hall, simply because I felt I must array myself behind this old associate and comrade and a million men who could be in a camp in a month and ready to sail for Europe 90 days thereafter. But, gentlemen, if you are going to have a war, why do you not go to war with the first men you can raise, the rear guard of a mighty column that extends from Concord to Santiago and San Fernando. If you are going to fight the enemy, why all this hullabaloo to be told that a year from now we will land somebody on the shores of Europe? McClellan had months and months and months of preparation, but he never licked anybody. It was the experience gained on the little battle fields of Mexico that made the chieftains of the great Civil War, not a course of study in some high school or years in a swivel chair in Washington.

Who won that war? The man from Galena, who had been dismissed from the Regular Army of the United States and whose services were declined by the staff at Washington when he wrote them; the man from Galena, who had 20,000 men ready to fight in six months; the man who went to Fort Henry and Fort Donelson and Shiloh as fast as cars and boats and feet would take his troops there. They talk to us about these "experts." France had an expert staff, England had an expert staff, Russia had an expert staff, Austria had an expert staff, Germany had an expert staff when this war began. Where are your experts now? All gone into the discard, succeeded by men who fought their way up on the firing line since August, 1914. The gentleman from California who told us that the General Staff had fought in many battles and were great warriors, and found himself not sustained by the record, airily dismissed the proposition with the remark that Germany's staff had not been under fire for 40 years. Neither have they been under fire for a year, because better men, practical men, have risen to take the place of those who gravitate to headquarters in the piping times of peace and have to be catapulted out in the dark days of war to make room for men who go out to fight, not to be "experts," to make place for men like Robertson, England's most useful officer, who rose from the ranks without a military education.

Except Marcus Miller and Joe Wheeler, each of whom fought from sixty-one to sixty-five, practically no general officer who saw active and important service in the Spanish, Filipino, and Chinese Wars ever went to a military school. Miles, Shafter, Otis, Chaffee, McArthur, Lawton, Young, Wheaton, Wood, and Funston were all civilian soldiers, who entered the Army without military training, as raw volunteers. And that is why the General Staff wants no volunteers now that shall have opportunity to start on a level with them. And that is why the country should avail itself of the services of that vigorous and splendid soldier upon whose military career in Cuba the people placed the seal of their approval by making him Commander in Chief of the Army of the United States. These alleged political officers have no reason to fear to compare their records with those of swivel-chair warriors who decry their services. One hundred thousand volunteers, such as this amendment provides for, would make the nucleus of a great army the rest of the bill assures and would set the pace for a million gallant men who shall follow in the path they would so easily and so swiftly tread. Ordinary prudence suggests that we first send to the battle fields of Europe seasoned, experienced, actual soldiers who have already demonstrated in Cuba and the Philippines and China their capacity and willingness to serve their country on foreign fields.

Soldiers' and Sailors' Mail.

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 21, 1917.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, on July 30, 1917, I introduced in the House of Representatives a bill providing "that hereafter, under such rules and regulations as the Postmaster General may prescribe, duly certified first-class mail matter of the soldiers, sailors, and marines in the service of the United States shall, during the existence of the present war, be forwarded to their destination without payment of any postage whatever."

I was prompted, in introducing this bill, by two motives: First, I thought that when a nation asks its citizenry to leave its accustomed paths of life and enter camps to be trained for the duties of war it should, in every way possible, mitigate this sudden transition from peace to arms by arranging it so that the men called could at least keep up communication with those they hold most dear with as little difficulty as possible; and, second, when our allies had been so generous to their own troops as to extend to them the free use of the mail, and when even the Government of the Republic of France had granted the privilege of its mail gratis to American troops, it occurred to me that we should not neglect to do for our men what our brothers in arms had already in a generous way begun.

Men who have been through the campaigns of war—and there are many such in this House—tell us that there is no more welcome treat for a warrior on the battle field than to receive tidings from home, and it needs no imagination to picture the joy that comes to every household when the mailman brings a line to anxious relatives from the men called to the colors.

Above the picturesque portals of the new Post Office Building, in this city, are the legends which greet the new arrival and leave a happy sentiment in the minds of departing travelers, that a letter is a "messenger of sympathy and love," a "servant of parted friends," a "consoler of the lonely," the "bond of the scattered family," the "enlarger of the common life." If a letter is all this in peace, how much more in war? We owe it in all justice, in all honor, in all sympathy, and in all patriotism, to extend to our boys in the service for the present emergency the use of the mail facilities of the Government, with no thought of financial return. The delays in writing home that such a plan would obviate, the inconvenience of seeking stamps in the field that it would eliminate, and the good feeling it would inspire all around would do much to keep the morale of the troops consistent with the high ideals of the service.

The function of only a simple letter, at times, may be more glorious than the message of a king, and may bring to an apprehensive heart more joy than the visit of a monarch at the home of his most humble subject.

While the sentimental reasons for passing this bill at once suggest themselves, the measure has in it everything of the practical. It will undoubtedly serve to increase the number of letters the men will be likely to write home. And increasing the number of letters will mean that the American people will be kept continually informed. And the better informed the people, the more surely will they stand firm until the purposes for which we fight are accomplished, until autocracy shall have learned to listen, until democracy shall have been made secure.

The bill must not be allowed to die quietly in a pigeonhole. It is not enough that the soldiers and sailors be allowed to write home as in the time of the Civil War, marking their letters as "Soldiers' Mail," and having them paid for on delivery. It is not enough that this proposed measure, as was the case with a similar measure advocated during the Spanish-American War, when the Fifty-fifth Congress was in session, be discussed and postponed, and discussed and postponed again, until finally it is talked in a desultory fashion into oblivion. It should be enacted into law, and quickly.

Our allies have not been backward in granting similar privileges to their enlisted men. M. Jusserand, the French ambassador, informs me under date of August 3, 1917, that "In accordance with a law of April 27 and a decree of May 7, 1916, the families, members of which are at the front, and who receive the usual grant, owing to their being in want, are allowed to send, once a month, to each of their relatives at the army, a registered parcel of 1 kilogram, the conveying of which is free.

"In accordance with the law of June 23 and of the decree of June 24, 1916, all mobilized men of France have the right, during the months of June and of November, to send, free of cost, a parcel of 1 kilogram containing linen and underclothing, to their family or to a correspondent of theirs.

"Furthermore," M. Jusserand adds, "a decree of August 3, 1914, prescribes that ordinary letters coming from or destined for soldiers or sailors duly mobilized are forwarded free by the post. Money orders meant for the same or sent by them, the value of which is not above 50 francs, are drawn up free of cost."

Furthermore, Secretary of State Lansing, under date of August 12, 1917, announced that "the minister of finance authorizes the entry without payment of duties of parcels sent from foreign countries by private persons to soldiers of the American Expeditionary Corps. No other examination will be required than an identification of the parcel and the transmission to the destination as marked. The same facilities are extended to shipments made to wounded soldiers under medical attendance in hospitals; they include tobacco, cigars, cigarettes, playing cards, and beverages. Those invoices are exempt from customs duties, statistic dues, and, if any, internal-revenue taxes. It need not be said that the decision applies to shipments made by the Y. M. C. A."

As to Great Britain, I am advised under date of August 4, 1917, by Sir Cecil Arthur Spring-Rice, the British ambassador, that in his country "the mails are free to men serving in the British forces in the case of letters addressed to the United Kingdom, but letters from the front to foreign countries must be stamped."

In Russia, I am told by Mr. Eugene Omeltchenko, of the Russian extraordinary mission—

> Letters sent to the active army and received from the active army in the regular manner—that is, not registered—may be sent free of postage. The region of the active army is understood to be a belt about a hundred miles from the battle line. The mail of soldiers in this region may be sent free. The mail from war ships is also allowed to go free of all postage duties.

Italy has not been lacking in generosity. Count V. Macchi di Cellere, the Italian ambassador, advises me that in the beginning all correspondence—letters and postcards—of the officers and men were forwarded free; but later, owing to the burden on the Government, it was necessary to charge for correspondence between the men themselves. This measure, he adds, which relieved the mail somewhat in the war zones, was taken because it was the purpose of the regulations to provide for free postage between soldiers and their families rather than between soldiers and their acquaintances. Later, when the Italian lines were so advanced that mail had to be taken from the terminals of railroads and carried by motor car, cars, pack animals, or even by aeroplanes, free mail had to be further reduced, in order to meet the new circumstances. Then it was arranged that soldiers could send one card a day free of charge to their families. But throughout all the changes made necessary by new military activities the basic plan has remained the same, namely, that soldiers and sailors should be allowed to communicate with their folks, without cost to themselves.

The proposition has found a ready supporter in the press of the country. The Boston Post, one of the most influential Democratic newspapers in New England, has come out strongly in favor of it; and the New York Herald, as Republican as the Post is Democratic, has ardently advocated the bill after I introduced it. The New York World and the New York Sun praise it, as do practically all the aggressive dailies in smaller communities. Through the press the plans suggested in the bill have found their way into the training camps already busy with war preparations, and the response of the soldiers in favor of this recognition of their merit has been at once spontaneous and compelling.

With all these facts in support of the bill, gentlemen of the House, with its passage practically demanded of us by that devotion and respect we owe our troops, with the example of all our allies pointing the way, it seems to me only just and equitable that we take steps immediately to enact the resolution into law.

The World War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN JACOB ROGERS,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 21, 1917.

Mr. ROGERS. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I desire to print an address made by the gentleman from New York [Mr. PLATT] before the Pomona Grange, of Orange County, N. Y., on September 5, upon the causes of our advent into the world war. I think this is one of the best statements yet made upon the subject and that it should be conveniently available to the largest possible circle of readers.

Mr. PLATT said:

"Ladies and gentlemen of the Pomona Grange, I am more than glad of the opportunity to talk to you on a subject in which we are all so vitally interested, as the question, 'Why are we at war?' or, as your program puts it, 'What are we at war for?' Having been in Washington, and to some extent a participant in the stirring events that have followed each other so rapidly in recent months, as well as in some of the anxious efforts that preceded our entry into the great war during the last three years, I perhaps feel a more intense interest and responsibility than many other people who have not had quite the same opportunities to know what was happening, and how our country was being inevitably drawn against its will into the terrible maelstrom.

"It is dangerous to make sweeping generalizations, and it may be that some of the earlier wars of history, in proportion to the then population of the known world and to its wealth and resources, were almost as great as this in which we are involved, but it seems not an exaggeration to say that this war is the most stupendous happening of which there is any record. Almost every nation the world around is involved in it, and the few that have not been formally drawn in are profoundly affected by it. No one can say with any approach to certainty what far-reaching results it may have.

"Why are we in it? The Secretary of the Interior, Hon. Franklin K. Lane, said a few days ago that it is because we could not keep out, and I think he is right about it. Let me say now that I have no criticism of the President or of his advisors for being in the war. Rather my criticism, if I were to make any, would be that we should have begun to take our part long ago. I have felt, almost from the moment that the mighty military engine of the Imperial German Government began to roll over helpless Belgium and over northern France, that if it were not soon checked, if the war were to last for years instead of months, the chances were that we should be drawn in just as we were drawn into the last great European war, in the days of Napoleon, and it seemed clear to me that we should prepare ourselves and not make the tremendous and costly mistakes we made then—mistakes which resulted in having the war fought on our own territory, in the burning of our National Capitol, and in the defeat of our land forces in nearly every battle. I was one of 37 Members of the House of Representatives who tried to start the preparedness movement in the fall of 1914, and I can not refrain from saying now that if we could have succeeded then our country would have saved millions and perhaps billions of dollars, and might possibly have kept out of war. As one looks back upon the unfolding drama of the autumn of 1914 it is easy to see that right there was our only chance to keep out of war. We should have begun to make ourselves so strong then that the German war lords, who can understand no other argument than force, would have known without ifs or ands that we meant exactly what we said in February, 1915, when we declared that we would hold them to "a strict accountability" if they destroyed American ships or killed American citizens. I do not say that such a course would certainly have kept us out of war, but I do say that it was our only chance to keep out.

"We are in the war partly because the German war lords did not think we would fight and did not think we could fight if we wanted to. They thought they had us so sewed up with pacificism, so involved with Mexico, and so filled with pro-German and anti-English propagandists that the President could not get a majority in Congress for a declaration of war, and that we could not raise an army if we should declare war. Mr. Gerard, who was our ambassador in Germany until we broke off diplomatic relations with the Kaiser last February, tells us that the German rulers actually also thought that the German reservists in this country would be powerful enough to rise up and cause civil war. Mr. Gerard says in his story of his experiences in Germany that Herr Zimmermann, of the German foreign office, banged the table with his fist when they were discussing the dastardly murder of Americans on the Lusitania, and declared that the United States did not dare do anything to Germany, because there were 500,000 German reservists in this country. Mr. Gerard says that he retorted that there were also 501,000 lamp-posts in this country and that we sometimes made use of lamp-posts when people in our country created disturbances, as convenient places on which to hang them. Probably such a Yankee boast did not impress Zimmerman very much, and he continued to think it safe to heap any indignity upon Americans and to take as many American lives as might happen to get in the way of the German policy of frightfulness. Our late ambassador says that he fully expected to be called home at the time of the sinking of the Lusitania, but he was not. We continued to write notes, and waited two years before we were willing to admit that "a state of war existed," and without doing any very considerable amount of preparing in the meantime.

"Why are we at war? Why did not we go to war a year or two years ago? Why did we wait until 226 American citizens had lost their lives? Why should we have considered Germany's pledges any better then, after the demonstration in Belgium that the war lords considered treaties 'scraps of paper' and after all the agreements for civilized warfare promulgated at The Hague had been torn up, than we do now? What are we at war for? What do you attack a rattlesnake or a mad dog for? How can any nation, no matter how peacefully inclined, continue at peace with a nation that makes war its principal business, that piles up enormous guns in secret, and trains its whole male population and all its industries with the sole purpose of springing at the throats of its neighbors at some moment when they are most defenseless and unsuspecting?—a nation that teaches war in its philosophies, that unblushingly defends the doctrine that might makes right and that the strong should push the weak off the earth.

"It now seems that England and France and Belgium, yes, and the United States, were blind in 1914, when they could not see that the Kaiser and his war lords were about to begin their long-planned conquest of Europe. The Kaiser's saber had been rattled so often that Europe seems finally to have come to the belief that Wilhelm was simply amusing himself. The Belgians and the French knew that so-called 'strategic railroads,' railroads that had no other purpose than the transportation of soldiers, guns, and war materials, had been built up to and along the borders of Luxemburg and Belgium, but the French did not seem to think the Germans meant anything by it and made no effort to strengthen the fortifications on their own Belgian frontier. Nor did they know that the Germans had secretly forged monster guns that would so quickly pound the Belgian and other forts to pieces.

"There is abundant and constantly accumulating evidence that the Kaiser and the Imperial German general staff had decided to start their war of conquest in the summer of 1914, long before there was any pretext for starting it, and some day we may expect to see them admit it, just as Bismarck in his memoirs admitted that he deliberately started the Franco-Prussian War in 1870 by falsifying a telegram. An interesting bit of evidence comes from Dr. Henry Van Dyke, formerly pastor of the Brick Presbyterian Church, in New York City, who was our ambassador to Holland before the outbreak of the war and for some time afterwards. He is just now telling some of his experiences in a series of articles in Scribner's Magazine. Dr. Van Dyke, as some of you doubtless know, is a great fisherman, and is the author of several delightful books on fishing, such as 'Fisherman's Luck,' and 'Little Rivers,' and he evidently made the best of any opportunities that came his way to go trout fishing in Europe. He tells us in the September Scribner's that early in June, 1914, he went on a fishing trip just over the German boundary, on the edge of the little Grand Duchy of Luxemburg. A strategic railroad crossed and ran along the little mountain stream they were fishing, and he noticed all that day that trainload after trainload of German soldiers were going by. He learned that they were going to Trier, a town close to the boundary of Luxemburg, and when, after the day's fishing was finished, he and his companions passed through Trier, he found the place crowded with troops and piled with immense quantities of munitions and war materials. He tells us that he went back to Holland, musing over what he had seen and wondering what it meant. It certainly looked like war, but how could Germany begin a war without so much as a shadow of a pretext, he said to himself. That was early in June, and the murder of the Austrian Crown Prince at Sarajevo, did not take place until the 28th. The plans were all made, and even the disposition of troops and the accumulation of supplies, before there was any pretext for disturbing the peace of Europe. A pretext could doubtless be found in some way, if nothing convenient offered itself. The time for the staging of the great catastrophe was apparently fixed by the completion of the enlargement of the Kiel Canal, which was early in June. Before that time the Germans could not get their big dreadnaughts through the canal, so as to use them either in the North Sea or in the Baltic. When finished, if France and England looked weak enough or otherwise occupied enough, the torch was to be lighted, and was lighted.

"Now, what are you going to do with a nation like that—with an autocratic military government, a nation that makes war its chief business, that regards the most solemn treaties as 'scraps of paper,' a nation that has been planning for more than a generation to dominate the world, a nation that wages war for profit, like the old robber barons of the Middle Ages, or the Barbary pirates, whose nefarious trade our own country broke up after a war carried on for several years? Bear in mind that Germany, or perhaps I should say Prussia, has actually made money as well as territory out of her late wars, as well as out of many of her earlier wars, and bear in mind also that she won them after careful preparation and by secretly accumulating superior weapons and springing on her neighbors when she thought they were weakest. German soldiers are not superior to the soldiers of other countries. There is some reason to think that they are not the equals of French or of British soldiers of equal training; but give them guns that outrange the French or the British guns and they can win. The Prussians won the Seven Weeks' War in 1866 by being armed with breech-loading rifles, while the Austrians had muzzle loaders, and they won the Franco-Prussian War chiefly by springing at France while the French Army was only half armed with breechloaders and had not yet learned how to use what it had. In like manner the Germans thought they had this war won at the start by springing at France and Belgium with their big howitzers, the 42-centimeter guns, and other monsters of destruction, and they did come so mighty close to winning in the first month that it isn't pleasant to contemplate when you think what the consequences might have been. It's simply the old thug's game of fighting with brass knuckles against a man with bare fists, and the German war lords glory in it, brag about it, and their college professors weave philosophies around it with brazen shamelessness. Is there anything you can do with such a nation except to make it understand by means of the only argument that its rulers can understand, the argument of superior force, that war doesn't pay, that the world will no longer tolerate its methods or its constant threats, and will not let it reap any benefits from this war, but will, on the other hand, make it pay for at least some of the terrible devastation its armies have wrought?

"Occasionally I hear somebody say that this is a rich man's war or a munition maker's war. That sort of talk has been much encouraged by the German propagandists and for a time it really had some following, perhaps still has a little in some sections of the country. A very few minutes of reflection are enough to convince any intelligent person that it is utterly absurd. Rich men as a rule are very much like the rest of us, and it seems strange to me that some people are always trying to impute motives to them that are different from the motives that move the rest of us. They are just as patriotic as any of us, possibly as a class even more so. Their sons are very generally already in military or naval service, and many wealthy men above military age are giving their services to the Government free in various lines of necessary work. War to them means high taxes, much higher than the rest of us pay. What possible reason could they have as a class for wanting war? Certainly not any. They have desired, like most of the rest of us, to see our great country uphold the right, to see American citizens protected wherever they may lawfully be, and to see democracy upheld and autocracy and militarism put down, to the end that we may enjoy permanent peace.

"But what of the munition makers and all the others who profit from manufacturing war supplies? I might reply by saying, What of the farmers? War makes high prices for everything the farmer sells, and a great many farmers, particularly the wheat and corn growers, have made a good deal of money from the present war in spite of the increased prices of many things they buy. Have the farmers been responsible for the war? I think you would answer almost unanimously, 'No.' The farmers will make no more any way out of our entry into the war than they would have made if we had stayed out, and the munition makers will make a good deal less. The munition makers, the iron and coal miners, the shoemakers, and many others have been making big profits out of their sales to the allies, and without much extra taxation. Our entry into the war is going to cut down their profits and increase very greatly their taxes. Surely it wasn't to their interest to get us into war.

"But perhaps somebody may say, Why should we be in the war? Why should not England and France and Russia and Italy finish the business which, after all, most concerns them? Well, in the first place, we, as a great Nation, could not continually permit our citizens to be murdered while going about their business by way of the sea, to use a phrase of the President's, any more than we can allow our people continually to be murdered while attending to their business on land. We had to do something to stop it, just as we have to stop a band of murderers who may come through one of our peaceful communities, even if some lives are lost in the stopping. Again, the United States of America, as one the greatest of nations, was bound to do something toward upholding international law; otherwise there wouldn't be any international law if the lawless nation should triumph. To that extent our duties are those of a policeman. But there are even larger and more vital reasons. The President has said that 'the world must be made safe for democracy,' that we fight 'for the ultimate peace of the world and for the liberation of its peoples.' That is all true and most nobly said, but we are fighting primarily for our own safety and peace. We could not stand idly by and see England and France crushed and Germany triumphant, because we know that just as sure as the sun will rise to-morrow morning our turn would come next. We are fighting now with most of the world, and all of the self-governing part of it, either on our side or approving our course, instead of running the fearful risk of having to fight later and alone. England and France were fighting our battles before we entered the war, and we have rather tardily recognized the fact that it is up to us, as the greatest of self-governing peoples, to take our share of the tremendous burden which they have borne so long and so nobly.

"I might say the same thing of Italy, which has just made such a notable advance, and of poor, disorganized Russia, which has met such enormous losses. It is a war between two diametrically opposite ideas of government and of right and wrong—ideas just as opposite as freedom and slavery or of union and disunion. The two ideas can not exist side by side in peace any more than the United States could permanently endure half slave and half free. That is why we are at war; and our brave boys are fighting just as truly for freedom now as did our great-grandfathers who fought in the Revolution or our fathers who did their bit in the great Civil War. The issues to be decided by the outcome of this war are as great as in any war in which the United States has ever been engaged, and perhaps infinitely greater.

"Let me add in closing that, now that we are at war, we are not going at it half-heartedly or by any halfway measures. We were not prepared as we should have been when war was declared on the 5th of April last, but we had made a fairly good beginning at preparation, and we have started the war with a better military policy than we have ever started any other war in our history. We have prepared to raise an army of millions if they shall be needed, and we are going ahead just as if we might be called upon to take the whole burden upon ourselves. We are taking hold of the tremendous business of war in the midst of wonderful prosperity, and, in spite of the noise made by a few propagandists, with a people united as they never have been before in any one of our great wars. I feel like pausing right here to pay a few words of tribute to the splendid patriotism of the great mass of our German-American fellow citizens. With wonderfully few exceptions they are standing firmly by the country of their adoption, though it is costing them many a heartburn. Do you know that Ambassador Gerard has said that not a single German-American throughout the war had gone to Germany to enlist in the German Army, while thousands of them have voluntarily enlisted in our Army and a good many in the Canadian Army?

"We are going at this war, I repeat, as a united Nation, whole-heartedly, determined to stick to it until we accomplish the great purposes for which we are fighting, and willing to make any sacrifices necessary to that end. That is the way of the American people once they have made up their minds, and that is the spirit for which the American flag, the glorious Stars and Stripes, stands. We are sending our sons and our brothers to the front. Let us give them every encouragement. Let us give them every possible support, to the end that the war may be brought to a close as quickly as possible, and to the end that there shall be no more wars in our time or in their time."

HON. DAN V. STEPHENS,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 21, 1917.

Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska. Mr. Speaker, I desire to insert in the RECORD some correspondence with a few of my constituents bearing on the subject of the great war. These letters touch upon many phases of the subject and will answer many questions in the minds of those who have not had the opportunity to make a first-hand investigation for themselves.

[Telegram.]

———, NEBR., August 10, 1917.

Congressman DAN V. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.:

Do all in your power to bring about peace before our boys are sent to France.

(Signed) S. B. B.

CONGRESSMAN STEPHENS'S REPLY.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 11, 1917.

Mr. S. B. B., ———, Nebr.

MY DEAR MR. B.: In reply to your telegram urging me to do all I can to bring about peace with Germany before our boys are sent to France, will say that, in my judgment, it is more important that the objects of the war be secured before a peace is patched up than it is to keep our boys from going to France—a peace that merely means a truce until the nations get a chance to recuperate their losses is not worth having. It would be stupid, criminal in fact, because it would mean that the human sacrifices that have so far been made would count for naught. It would mean that as soon as another generation of men were ready to fill the ranks of those who have been sacrificed to the ambitious war lords of Germany the mad struggle for world domination would all begin over again. War is brute force, the method used by the beasts to settle their controversies. It is as repugnant to me as to any mortal man, but the civilization of the world has been attacked by the war lords of Germany with brute force. They have refused the methods of arbitration of civilized men. They preferred to conquer the world with tooth and claw. They have ravaged the greater part of Europe in as cruel and barbarous a fashion as did the Huns and Vandals a thousand years ago. They have destroyed the monuments, art galleries, and libraries that the civilization of Europe has been thousands of years producing. They know no law but that of force. They will respond to no sentiment of brotherly love, to no appeal but the club.

You will recall last fall, when I was in the district supporting the doctrines of peace, we were opposed by two classes of men—those who wanted us to make war on Mexico and those who declared we should join the allies at once. At that time Germany had made and broken many promises to us to refrain from her submarine piracy, but we excused her on the ground that she did not understand how serious we were. Her last promise led us to hope we would be able to remain at peace. For the sake of peace we were willing to accept the many humiliating sacrifices and insults which the war lords of Germany had forced upon us. But Germany again broke her word and began her ruthless and piratical warfare with her submarines, sinking of our ships without warning, and drowning our innocent passengers and sailors. There was nothing left for us to do but defend ourselves from these brutal attacks.

We were bound to strike back, and we are striking so effectually that the big bully (German Government) wants to quit and talk peace.

It reminds me of a backwoodsman living in my home county when I was a boy. He had fought with his fists and defeated every man in the county who would fight him. One peaceful sort of a chap, overgrown and kindly disposed, had been regularly licked by the bully every time they met when conditions for a fight were favorable. It got to be a habit. However, the worm turned one day, and the pacifist drove home a blow which, in connection with a slip of the bully's foot, laid him out with the pacifist on top ready to trim him up in a first-class manner. The bully saw his predicament, and while he spluttered and struggled to defend himself he argued with the pacifist thus: "Say, Jim," he said, "We've allus been good friends. Its a shame for us to fight this way. Besides, you ought'n to take advantage of me. My foot slipped. Let's quit and call it square." The pacifist, Jim, thought that was a sensible thing to do, so he got up and let Bill, the bully, get to his feet—even helped him up. Whereupon Bill brushed his clothes a bit, wiped the blood from his nose, looked Jim over, and said, "Now, my man, I am goin' to thrash you within an inch of your life," and he proceeded to do it, and he did it very effectively. Jim saw what a fool he had been not to subdue the bully completely while he had him down instead of listening to his fair words. It took him a long time to put himself in a position of defense that would permit him to live in peace in that backwoods community, where the power of the fist was the main arbiter in the relations of men.

That is a simple story of the actions of two men that parallel the relations between the United States and Germany at present. Germany is the world bully, strutting around with a chip on her shoulder. She knows no rule of conduct save that which is dictated by the mailed fist. She is not down yet, but her foot has slipped and a few more well-directed blows will put her on her back ready to be properly chastised. She knows this, too, because she is a good fighter. Her teeth and claws are sharp. So what does she do? She cries for a breathing spell under the pretense of talking peace. She wants a chance to regain her balance so she can thrust her mailed fist into our face with telling force. She is so cunning she fools even you with her peace proposals, and many others among our citizens. Let her once get to her feet, and in the light of her past experience the war would become a mad fury in its world-wide spread. The few boys you want to keep from going to France would be only a drop in the bucket to the vast numbers of men who would have to take places in the army of liberation to fight these war lords on our own shores, or in Mexico, or Canada.

Peace talk, until militarism, under the control of a few ambitious men, is crushed and the world made safe for free peoples, can lead only to misery and suffering. Disarmament and a world policeman should be the result of this war, and to talk peace until some tangible results are obtained would mean a truce that would precede another world war of tremendous magnitude.

It is a great advantage to us, from a strategical point of view, to join the allies in France with our forces. The man who says he is willing to fight all invaders but unwilling to go to Europe to meet the invader before he has a chance to strike us unawares on our own shores either does not understand the situation or is simply using a flimsy excuse for not wanting to help his country's cause at all. The situation is such that we can not afford to permit the allies to be defeated, leaving us to meet Germany all alone, with the whole of Europe, including England, under her control. That would be extreme stupidity.

I hope this plain statement of the case will not offend you. All I have said is wholly impersonal, and said only because I want to help you and the cause of our country.

With best wishes to you, I am,

Yours, very truly, DAN V. STEPHENS, M. C.

SOME ATROCITIES OF THE WAR LORDS.

WASHINGTON, D. C., July 2, 1917.

Mr. ———,

MY DEAR MR. BROWN (fictitious name): I am in receipt of your kind favor of the 25th ultimo recommending me to support a resolution calling for a definite statement of our aims in the war. I am glad you called my attention to this desire on your part, because it affords me an opportunity to tell you that this whole propaganda demanding that this Government state its war aims originates in Germany or among German sympathizers here or elsewhere. Their aim is to split the allies by drawing them into a controversy over the terms of peace before German militarism is destroyed. The facts are there should be no question in anybody's mind about the general aims of this Government in this war. They have been reiterated over and over again by declarations of Congress and by the President. We are merely defending ourselves, primarily, in a war made upon us by a war-mad government that has committed every crime known to the most barbarous people on earth, but indirectly we are fighting for the cause of liberty, peace, and disarmament the whole world over.

The crimes against Belgium are beyond words to describe. Just to give you an idea of what the German war lords are doing, one of the members of the Belgian commission who is here in Washington told us of a case of a Belgian woman who had nine children. This was a case with which he was personally familiar. The German officer in command of that section where the woman lived deported her husband to Germany to work. The woman went to the German officer and upbraided him for leaving herself and nine children helpless to starve. Whereupon the officer called a soldier and in the mother's presence ordered five of the children shot, and the order was executed. Then, turning to the mother, he told her she could go home and support the other four if nine were too many. That constitutes German efficiency as exemplified by the war lords. If there are too many children to feed, kill them. Some people drown the surplus litters of kittens and puppies for the same reason. That principle is involved in a part of German war lord kultur. The record shows beyond question that literally hundreds of Belgian children have had their hands cut off, and women their breasts cut off, by the German soldiers that invaded their country, the object being to terrorize the people into abject submission. These crimes can no longer be disputed, because the evidence is available and open to all who come in touch with the situation. Not only do the living Belgians show the result of this brutal barbarism, but thousands of innocent men, women, and children not engaged in war were killed right and left as the army proceeded. Sometimes whole villages of two or three hundred people would be literally massacred in the most barbarous manner. I do not believe for a moment that the German people approve of these acts of barbarism. It is the natural outgrowth of militarism uncontrolled.

No; there is no doubt as to what this Nation is fighting for in the minds of anybody here. We are joining with the allies to defend ourselves from a brutal attack and to crush a demon war-mad oligarchy that has started out to subdue the world before it has overcome the allies and pounced upon us, compelling us to defend ourselves on our own shores. Just picture for a moment the German Army passing through this country as it passed through Belgium. When a man can draw that picture in his own mind he quickly realizes that the United States never entered into a more justifiable war than this one. It is a war for civilization and humanity. While defending ourselves from a brutal assault upon our citizens and commerce, we purpose to serve notice on the world that such brutality as was practiced by the German Government against an innocent people can not go unpunished and that the rights of nations to live their own lives in peace and safety shall be made secure. The German Government has already been indicted by the civilized world. She is now being tried before the court of civilization and is certain to be convicted of more crimes than the annals of history record against any other Government.

I am giving you these facts because I know how difficult it is, situated as you are, to get the facts that lie at the root of this question. There is no doubt but that many people are being constantly misled by the friends of Germany who are operating throughout this country.

With kind regards to you, I am,

Your friend, DAN V. STEPHENS, M. C.

ANSWERING GERMAN ARGUMENTS.

———, NEBR., July 28, 1917.

Congressman DAN V. STEPHENS,
Washington, D. C.:

We, the people of the United States, demand a definite statement on the part of our Government as to what its aims are in the present war and on what terms our Government will make peace. Us citizens of the United States have a right to know. (Signed) O. U. W.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 2, 1917.

———, Nebr.

MY DEAR MR. W.: I am in receipt of your telegram in which you demand that the Government state what its war aims are in our present war with Germany. You have no doubt lost sight of the fact that Germany is making war upon us by destroying our ships and killing our citizens at every opportunity. Primarily our war aims are to defend ourselves from a brutal attack. We warned Germany many times what would happen if she continued to ruthlessly sink our ships and drown our citizens. She promised time and again that she would desist from her piratical course, and has as often broken her promises. In fact the military government that is in control of Germany has lied to us to such an extent that its word can no longer be taken for anything. The spirit of this military crowd that now dominates Germany is such that there is no possibility of living in peace with it so long as it controls a mighty military machine which is capable of being driven into the heart of any nation that is within striking distance.

The aims of this Government have been clearly set forth by the President and by declaration of Congress. However, the conviction is growing upon this Government and upon the people that there can be no peace with Germany until the spirit of militarism that threatens the peace and welfare of the world is crushed and all of the nations that she has trampled under foot are restored to their independence. To make peace with Germany now, while her iron heel rests upon the necks of half a dozen nations or more, would be the height of folly, because such a peace would last only long enough for the military crowd to recuperate itself. This would be made easy for them, because they could point with pride to the success of German arms as proof of the advantage of great military preparation for future wars. Such a peace would rivet the chains of militarism on the necks of the German people for another generation and then the mad struggle would begin again. The sort of peace that will be worth while to the world will be one that comes through the destruction of militarism in Germany, thus proving to the people that it is of no avail to burden themselves with the enormous cost of maintaining a professional war machine when the citizen soldiers of other lands are capable of destroying it. Let us teach the world as a result of this war that armies are of no avail against truth and righteousness.

Let us fight until we can agree to disarmament forever and set the people of the world free. That, in my judgment, will ultimately become the aim of this Nation.

I am very glad, indeed, that you called my attention to your views on this subject, and I sincerely hope that after further consideration you will agree with the situation as I have outlined it. With kind regards to you, I am,

Your friend, DAN V. STEPHENS, M. C.

SECOND LETTER TO MR. W. IN ANSWER TO GERMAN PRETENSES.

WASHINGTON, D. C., August 15, 1917.

Mr. ———,
———, Nebr.

MY DEAR MR. W.: I am in receipt of your kind favor of the 13th outlining your views on the Government's attitude in this war. I notice that your arguments follow closely those of the German Government prior to the breaking out of the war with the United States. I will only take time to say in answer to these arguments that in the first place they are absolutely wrong in practically every particular. The whole trouble with the German Government is that it is founded on force and error. It started a war that it had planned for 40 or 50 years, and then when it got into a corner where it couldn't buy munitions from us it wanted us to join it, in effect, by refusing to sell munitions to the allies. I don't know of any argument quite so unneutral as this one was unless it be its running mate, the argument that the war would have been over in short order if we had refused to sell munitions to the allies.

In other words, the German claim was if we had joined the German Government, in effect, after the allies had cornered it up so that it couldn't buy from the outside world by refusing to sell to the allies, Germany could win the war in a walk. We couldn't have done anything more unneutral than that, and by doing so we would have won the contempt of mankind.

I opposed an embargo on arms and ammunition myself because it was fundamentally wrong and not in accord with international law, which Germany had helped to make. Germany's presentation of international law, as outlined in your letter and which has been played up by the German-American press, is not in accord with either law or humanity. But it is too late now to talk about the violation of law by any of the belligerents prior to the breaking out of this war. We are now in war with Germany, and it is a war waged primarily to protect the lives of our citizens and their property. The question, then, is whether you propose to defend your own country or whether you expect to defend the Kaiser and the war lords. That is the only thing involved in this controversy. We have got either to stand for America or for the Kaiser. If the Kaiser had enough friends in America who feel, apparently, as you do, he could win this war and extend his rule over us. I am certain you do not want this, nor any other German-American citizen, yet if we all acted like you do that is exactly what would happen to us.

Now, referring to the peace offering of Germany. The German Government has never offered any such peace as you suggest and has no intention whatever of offering any such proposal until it is compelled to do so by force of arms. It is another trick to deceive us. It has not offered to surrender Belgium, Serbia, or any of the conquered territory. It no doubt would be glad to give back some of this territory even now to get peace, because it would still leave the war lords in the saddle with their heels on the necks of the German people. But it has made no such proposals and we never could accept them if it did make them unless there was coupled with such a proposition the question of disarmament and the control by the people of Germany of their own Government, so that useless wars in the future would be impossible. The Kaiser and the war lords of Germany can not be trusted with the power that they wield. Until this power is placed in the hands of the German people a world peace is impossible and would be useless, because it would last only long enough for the rebuilding of the armaments of all nations now at war.

You allege that the President of the United States has more power than the Kaiser. In the first place, the statement is not true by any means. The power the President uses belongs to the people. The President of the United States uses enormous power, but it is all limited by the Constitution and by the laws of the land, and this power can always be taken away from the President by the people or their representatives at any time when he misuses it. The people of this country can construct a great war machine, greater even than that of Germany, but this war machine is in the hands of the people to be used as they direct. They chose the policy that created the war machine and can alter it at will.

On the other hand, however, the Kaiser's power is not restricted. He claims to receive his power direct from God. The German Congress is absolutely unable to direct the Kaiser and the war lords of Germany. The German Senate—the Bundesrath—for example, is composed of the appointees of the princes of the various States of Germany, and all laws must originate with them. And, of course, they are a part and parcel of the Kaiser's ruling family. The House of Representatives—the Reichstag—has no power whatever over the Kaiser. He rules a lifetime, and no one can take away from him one jot or tittle of the power he wields except by revolution. When he and his war lords decided to run the war machine over Belgium and through the heart of France, the people of Germany were utterly helpless to prevent it had they wanted to do so. The only limit placed upon the Kaiser and his war lords is that of their own ambitions, and their ambitions are literally world-wide. Von Tirpitz, one of the war lords, made a statement, so our Ambassador Gerard said, that the intention of the Germans was to starve out England and take possession of her fleet and then join it to the German fleet and sail for America and collect a war tribute from us sufficient to pay the cost of the war or batter down our coast cities. There is no doubt about the intention of these war lords to turn to us the moment they had conquered France and England. World domination was and is their goal. The Kaiser himself told our ambassador when we were protesting against the sinking of the Sussex and other ships that America had better watch out, for when this war was over Germany wasn't going to stand any more foolishness. It became perfectly clear to our ambassador stationed at Berlin that Germany intended, when she opened this war, to ultimately put the iron heel of the war lords on the whole world. In fact, we had our choice. We could either start in now and cooperate with the allies in crushing the ambition of these war-mad men or we could wait until the allies were crushed and then fight it out with Germany alone. We could go on accepting their insults and murderous outrages upon our citizens and our property, permitting them to lie to us with impunity, and then after it was all over we would still have to fight them at our own door and witness the devastation of our cities and outrages upon our inhabitants.

The regrettable thing about this situation is the fact that we have in this country a virulent German-language press that is operated, in a large degree, in the interest of the German Government and which is and has been teeming with lies and misrepresentations since the European war began. Most of these German-language newspapers printed in America have verged upon the edge of treason constantly since we started the war.

They have misled good, honest German-American citizens in this country to the extent that many of them have gotten into trouble with the Government already.

In other words, the German-American population has been outraged by this press and put in a false light which will have the effect of stigmatizing them politically for many years to come. I was born soon after the close of the Civil War and I can remember very vividly the fate of the "Copperheads," so called for a generation after the war closed, because of their opposition to the war; because they had played the part of traitors in the rear of the Union Army in giving aid and comfort to the enemy. You can readily see in the light of history how contemptible the "Copperheads" were. They did none of the fighting that saved the Union from disruption. They made no sacrifices during the war, but they stayed at home and criticized the Government and threw every obstacle they could in the way of the success of the Government.

They should have been tried for treason, but the Government was too weak to do it.

The German-Americans in this country, the great bulk of them, are loyal to America and they are going to send their sons into this great army of liberation just as they did in 1861–1865 to save the country, but there are a sufficient number of those of German birth who are enjoying the blessings of liberty and prosperity who have been misled by this lying and scurrilous German-language press to have in a measure cast reflection upon the whole German-American population. It is up to you and men like you, holding prominent positions in your community, to get solidly back of the Government and not permit your people to be misled by German agents in this country, who, as a rule, are no doubt in the direct employ of the German Government. You can render your people here at home the greatest service by assisting them to get the right view of this question, because after this war is over the men who have not stood back of the Government are certain to suffer in their reputations as patriotic citizens. Then during the war they are liable to get into all kinds of trouble with the Government. Scores of these men are already languishing in prison for giving aid and comfort to Germany, which they never would have done had we not permitted this poison press and German agents to mislead them.

Now, one further thought: I recognize how thoroughly in sympathy with your own German kindred you and others of German birth must be. Therefore I can hardly see how you, here in free America, can consistently give aid to the war lords of Germany who dominate the German people. This is an opportunity for the free Germans in America to strike for the freedom of their kinsmen at home by aiding this country in breaking the back of German militarism and discrediting their war machine in the eyes of the German people. Whenever this happens, the German people will set themselves free and take possession of their Government. It is in this manner that the German-American citizens can render untold service to their kinsmen who are helpless under the German yoke of military rule. The Kaiser and his war lords should be banished from Germany as one of the conditions of the terms of peace, in order that the people of Germany may be able to establish a free Government like that of France, England, and America. Germany is the only great nation left in the world that is ruled by a despot.

I note that you object to the draft. You are certainly wrong in this particular also, because the draft is the only fair method of raising the Army. Through it we distribute the burden of raising an army equally among all classes and districts of the country. You can readily see that men of your views would not furnish a single soldier for this army of liberation were it not for the selective draft. And if you did not furnish any soldiers, you certainly would not be entitled to any of the rights and blessings that this army of liberation wins for the country and for the world. It is certainly a just way to raise an army, and will also have this remarkable effect: The German-American sons who will enter this great army of liberation are not going to hold the views you express in your letter. They are going to be Americans through and through, and their fathers at home are sure to follow their examples. When the German-American boys will fight with all other nations in our army for the liberation of oppressed peoples, their parents at home are going to become proud of them and as a result are going to be baptized as true American citizens, with only one aim and ambition, and that is the perpetuation of liberty not only on our own shores but for the whole world. There has never been a stain upon our flag, and we are not going to put one on it now by shirking our duty in rendering this wonderful service to mankind in setting the world free from the fear of the war lords of Germany. We will never sheath our swords, if I have anything to say about it, until the Kaiser and his war lords are completely unhorsed and discredited, if not banished from German soil, and the people of Germany permitted to take possession of the German Government.

I hope that you will consider this letter in a friendly spirit. I am simply trying to show you that you are wrong and that you ought not to injure yourself and your fellow countrymen by spreading such views among them as you have expressed in your letter to me. I also hope that the telegram which you sent me was not the views of the Farmers' Union, which you represent, but that it expressed only your own personal views. I would regret to know that there was any considerable number of German-Americans who are not now solidly back of the Government in this war. I appreciate fully how humiliating it must be to a German-American to have his loyalty questioned, but the reason his loyalty is being questioned is traceable to such views as you have expressed to me. These views are exactly those of the Kaiser and his war lords, and they are against the position taken by America. You are either for America or the Kaiser. There is no middle ground. Your letter shows me you do not understand the very dangerous ground you have taken. I know you are for America, but your letter does not so represent you. I hope after reading this argument you will better understand the American position and write me so. If your Farmers' Union took action on your telegram to me urging peace proposals, I would suggest that you read this letter to them, so they will understand what the attitude of their Government is.

In closing, I want to assure you I am your friend and writing in your interest and the interest of all your neighbors and friends who hold your views.

I shall be glad to hear from you soon.

Your friend,

DAN V. STEPHENS, M. C.

THIRD LETTER TO MR. W——, ANSWERING GERMAN ARGUMENTS.

AUGUST 22, 1917.

Mr. ———,
———, Nebr.

MY DEAR MR. W——: I have had your letter on my desk for some time waiting a favorable opportunity to answer you quite fully. I am taking the pains to do this, because I look upon you as a leader there among German-Americans in your community, whose opinion will no doubt influence them.

I note in your effort to refute the charge that I made in regard to the un-American influence of the German language press in this country that you claim that you have read this press only recently, and that you did so only because the German language press seemed to be indorsed by Members of the House and Senate, as shown by the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I regret very much to admit that there are a few Members of Congress who seem to indorse the German view, but you ought to understand that an indorsement of the German view is not American, and no one should be cited as authority on American questions who takes his inspiration from German newspapers or from a few Members of Congress who are so misguided as to indorse the argument presented by such papers.

You seem to be laboring under the misapprehension that you have got to come in direct touch with German agents in this country in order to be influenced by them and state that you have not met any such persons or had any relations with them. That is true, no doubt. German agents acting in this country are not so stupid as to appear in person before those they wish to influence. What they do is to subsidize such papers as they can corrupt, and these newspapers make insidious arguments designed to deceive the people. As proof of this, I wish to cite you to the fact that many Germans in your locality, so I am informed, met for the purpose of choosing delegates to be sent to an alleged peace council, which was to have met in Minneapolis or St. Paul. Perhaps you participated in this meeting yourself. This propaganda was carried on through an anti-American press, because of the extreme liberality of our laws. It is of interest to note, therefore, that this so-called peace council was a movement in the interest of Germany, as proven by recent developments, and no doubt was financed with German money. It was so notoriously anti-American that it could not find a place in the United States where the people would allow it to meet. Certainly all the people can not be wrong in placing an anti-American interpretation upon this movement. This ought to be sufficient proof to you that it does not pay to follow the enemies of America when your country is at war with a deadly enemy, rather than our own President and nine-tenths of the Members of Congress.

As a further test of the few alleged congressional leaders that you seem to follow, as you call Senators STONE, LA FOLLETTE, and others of their kind, I would suggest that you take a hypothetical case. Suppose, for example, Senator LA FOLLETTE should find himself by chance within the German lines. What do you think the Germans would do with him? Would they make a prisoner of war of him and confine him in one of their stockades or have him drawn and quartered as an enemy of Germany? Not at all. Senator LA FOLLETTE would be treated with the utmost respect by the Germans. He probably would be taken to Berlin, presented to the Kaiser, and banqueted in honor of the service that he had rendered the German Government in the United States by blocking war legislation and through his speeches misleading good men of German lineage like yourself. He would be in very much the same position that Congressman Vallandingham was during our Civil War in 1863. He was making speeches in the United States Congress attacking the Government just as these gentlemen whom you quote now are. He was so notoriously disloyal to the country that he was finally tried for treason by a court-martial, and the penalty assessed against him was banishment beyond the Confederate lines. The sentence was executed, and he was accordingly surrendered under a flag of truce to the Confederates in Tennessee. It was thought that would be a tremendous punishment to him, as it would have been to any patriotic citizen, but instead of the Confederates punishing Vallandingham he was taken up by the enemies of our country, escorted across the Southern States to the seaboard, and put on a ship which was able to steal through our blockade and ultimately land him in Canada, from where he easily found means of crossing the border into Ohio, his home State.

This little example serves to illustrate how popular the few Members of the House and Senate who are now attacking the Government policies and whom you are following would be within the lines of the German Army should their fate happen to place them there. You are exceedingly unfortunate in following leaders of this sort. It is a matter of very great surprise to me that you would prefer to follow two or three men in Congress who have apparently lost all sense of perspective and patriotism rather than to follow the President and the great majority of the Members of the House and Senate, who are standing solidly together regardless of race, party, color, or religion, back of the administration in its efforts to carry to a successful conclusion our present war for the liberation of mankind from military rule. It is also a matter of surprise to me that German-Americans who left Germany to escape militarism and the hard conditions of life resulting therefrom should be the first to rush to the defense of these ruthless war lords who are now trampling out the lives of countless millions for the gratification of their craze for world power. The Congress representing all the people declared war against Germany by an overwhelming majority. We have adopted every war measure also by an overwhelming majority. There can be no question whatever about the will of the great majority of the people in regard to these matters. The acts of the majority rule in this country. In Germany a minority made up of the king and his ministers whom he appoints rules. Therefore, to follow the advice of these few Senators whom you quote would mean the abandonment of the rule of the people and the adoption of the Kaiser's methods.

In answer to my statement that in all of these controversies the citizen must either stand by America or the Kaiser, you state that you are making as strong a stand for America as it is possible for anyone to make, and that your protests are merely to keep the Nation from making mistakes. I have no doubt at all about your intentions. You mean to be patriotic beyond any question of doubt. You merely have been misled by a lot of foreign agents and German sympathizers in the country, operating through the press and public speakers, and have not understood the position that you ought to take. I am not surprised that you have been misled. What I am trying to do is to set you right. Your idea of trying to keep your country from making a mistake by attacking our policies, with consequent weakening of the Government, while we are facing a foreign enemy is an error of the greatest magnitude, and I only need cite you to the conduct of the Russian people to show you the danger of it. Witness, for example, the Russian armies facing the tremendous armies of Germany stopping to argue over the theories of government, provoked by German spies in Russia, appointing soldiers' committees, workingmen's committees, etc., and conducting a debating society in the trenches. Can you think of anything quite so stupid as this on the part of the Russian people? While they are conducting their debating societies on the firing line the German war machine is marching over them and destroying their country. When a country is at war the individual rights of the citizen must be waived in the interest of the whole people. A people at war must first conserve their sovereign independence at all costs in order that their citizens may enjoy the widest possible liberties when peace comes. If Russia yields to the armies of Germany, her people will feel the iron heel of the German war lords for generations to come. Such also will be our fate if we are defeated in this war.

You seem to be laboring under the impression that the rights of the individual should take precedence over the rights of all the people when you state that it is regrettable that it has come to such a pass in this country that one can not express his opinion in regard to governmental affairs without being considered a traitor. There is nothing, as you say, in the Constitution that prevents a man from criticizing the policies of this Government. He can criticize them all he pleases; but that same Constitution provides that if in his criticism he gives aid and comfort to the enemy he is guilty of treason. Don't you think it is giving aid and comfort to our enemies to conduct a wholesale criticism of our Government during the war, and instigate riots, and lead men to resist the draft? That is exactly what German agents are trying to do in this country. That is what Germany has spent millions of dollars for in corrupting American citizens and encouraging them to embarrass the administration in the conduct of the war. It certainly is helping Germany, because it hurts America. No sane mind can escape that conclusion.

You criticize the espionage act, a law made absolutely necessary to curb the German agents in this country. You certainly would never make such criticisms if you understood the facts and you will never understand the facts by reading German-American newspapers and following the opinions of two or three Members of Congress whom you quote. You state that you fear that such legislation as this will be continued after the war, thus destroying the liberties of the people. This is a most extraordinary argument to offer in view of the fact that your protest against the law is in the interest of the most despotic military oligarchy in the world. The ex-Member of Congress from Texas whom you quote along these lines was retired from Congress recently by the people, and the sort of speeches that he made in the House and is now making on the stump are against the interests of this country. The statements that he has made time and again are not justified by the facts, and his conclusions are erroneous, as well as exceedingly inappropriate when our country is facing a foreign foe. He is no doubt an honest man, but wholly misguided, and has no following among intelligent and well-read American citizens.

In answer to my statement that the people of the United States as contrasted with the people of Germany create their own war machine and can disband it at their will, you offer as an objection that they will have to wait till a general election time to do it. You certainly would not want any great and momentous step like the creation and disbanding of an army taken without proper and due consideration by the people, and it certainly would require all the time intervening between elections for the people to come to a conclusion on a matter of this character. The people can disband their war machine when they have no further use for it. That is a matter entirely in their hands. In Germany the war machine belongs to the Kaiser and it can not be disbanded till the people take possession of their Government by force. The people of the United States have always disbanded their armies when the need of them was passed. They are able to do this through their representatives in Congress, who always speak as the majority directs.

The Constitution is not all shot to pieces as you state, quoting Senator STONE as your authority, and if it were shot to pieces the people still have their own representatives to make laws along the line they wish them made. Their independence and liberties are still in their own hands and they can make a new Constitution when they please to suit themselves. The country has not gone to the bow wows merely because Senator STONE or Senator LA FOLLETTE says so.

You are entirely right in saying that the German-Americans are not the only ones who disapprove of the present policies of the Government. There are the I. W. W.'s and a branch of the Socialists and the anarchists who also disapprove of this Government; but the great mass of the American people are Americans to the core, and, in my judgment, there are very few German-Americans who are willing to follow the Kaiser in this mad war game that he has thrust upon the world. Their opposition is, compared to the great mass of Americans, what the froth is to the sea.

I note that you labor under the impression that I have received information in regard to your views other than what you have given me in your letters. You are entirely mistaken in this. No one has written me or reported in person anything about you. Mr. ———, our mutual friend, spoke of you and your family very highly when I read to him the letter I wrote you August 15. Another person told me that peace meetings had been held around in that section of the county for the purpose of sending delegates to that alleged peace convention at Minneapolis. I presumed that you participated in these meetings. If you did not, I will be glad to know it. My only object in taking up so much time in writing to you, as I stated in my former letter, is that I think that you are worth while and that you are a man who would take kindly to the truth when presented to you. You are there in official capacity at the head of the Farmers' Union, and you ought to use your influence in behalf of your country and your Government instead of unintentionally giving aid and comfort to the enemies of our country by hamstringing the Government that is waging the greatest war in recorded time, for the liberation of mankind from the rule of despots. It is a tragical period in the world's history, and I would rather be on the side of justice and humanity in this struggle than to be on the wrong side and, as a reward for being wrong, receive all the honors that power and wealth could give me.

In conclusion, I wish to again state that while I have spoken plainly, I have done so with a desire to help the cause of the country and not to wound you personally. I have the highest regard for you and your people and would be neglectful of my duty as your representative did I not tell you the truth as I see it.

With kinds regards to you, I am,

Yours, very truly,

DAN V. STEPHENS, M. C.

CONCLUSION.

Since writing the above letters the President of the United States has issued his now famous reply to the proposals of peace made, no doubt at Germany's suggestion, through the Pope at Rome. It is the greatest message of hope to mankind ever penned. It is a beacon light of hope and inspiration to oppressed peoples the world over, including the down-trodden people of Germany now serving under the military yoke of the war lords of that unhappy country and being sacrificed by the millions for their aggrandizement. It tells them in plain terms no peace is possible till the German people establish a responsible government themselves that can be trusted to keep its pledged word. He has through this great document encouraged the democratic nations of the world to stand firmly for responsible governments—governments by the people in every civilized country—so that peace and disarmament may be accomplished. This world-wide cataclysm has a deeper meaning than a superficial view will give us. In my own judgment it is a logical result of the vicious conditions that have existed in Europe for centuries. The handwriting on the wall is unmistakable. The Kaiser and his war lords must take their place in history along with the Huns and Vandals of the dark ages they have outlived. We have no ill will for the oppressed people of Germany. This is a crusade for them as well as for other oppressed peoples. We declare before the world that we seek no gain for ourselves in this war. We merely want to make the world safe for us all. We are instruments in a crusade that is breaking the shackles of races and destroying the worn-out shells that hem them about. Nations are going to suffer, and they are going to be greatly purified by their sacrifices. No man nor nation nor combination of nations can stop the forces that have been set in motion till they have worked themselves out. It is the law of life, and there is no reason for fear or pessimism. The man who believes in God can not believe this war was unnecessary. He must believe that through this war lies our way to higher and better things for the races of men. Nothing but brutal punishment and great suffering suffices to impress the dull senses of the cruel and selfish. The struggle will tend to purge the earth of its sins and teach men better ways to go. Shackles are being broken, and men are going to be free.

He has sounded forth the trumpet that shall never call retreat;
He is sifting out the hearts of men before his judgment seat;
Be swift, my soul, to answer him, be jubilant my feet;
Our God is marching on.

These sweeping lines from the "Battle Hymn of the Republic" describe in a wonderful way the deep-seated meaning of this great war. It is the unfolding of an international brotherhood of nations, the dawn of a new day.

The Preaching of Treason and the Breeding of Sedition Must Stop.

SPEECH

HON. ALBERT JOHNSON,

OF WASHINGTON,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, June 25, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration a bill (H. R. 4285) making appropriations for the construction, repair, and preservation of certain public work on rivers and harbors, and for other purposes.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. Mr. Chairman, I move to strike out the last word.

The CHAIRMAN. The gentleman from Washington moves to strike out the last word.

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I do this for the purpose of making a brief statement concerning an organization known as the I. W. W.—Industrial Workers of the World—and how they are disturbing labor and all other conditions in the Pacific Northwest.

Mr. SMALL. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman pardon me? Will he not permit the next paragraph to be read?

Mr. JOHNSON of Washington. I shall need but a few minutes. If I may have the floor, I desire to call attention to certain things which bode no good for the United States—the preaching of treason, the breeding of sedition.

Shortly after the declaration of war with Germany Congress passed a bill to permit the officers of the armies of our allies to come to this country to pick up their citizens, aliens in our country, for war purposes abroad. I undertook to amend that bill. I called attention then to the alien situation, and to what I thought would happen when we began to raise an army. When the selective draft bill was up in this House for consideration again I called attention to the situation and position of certain aliens, and I believe that my friend, the gentleman from Oklahoma [Mr. MCCLINTIC] offered an amendment which, if it had been adopted, would have prevented the situation which is now developing.

From time to time I have spoken on this floor of the activities of an organization known as the I. W. W., and have urged some action to curb their attempts to build up a revolution in this country. I have placed certain evidence with the Department of Justice, and I sincerely hope that that department may speedily act for the general good of the United States. I hope, too, that the department may find it wise to lay some of the evidence before the people of the United States, so that all may see what sort of treason is being preached, and how a great many aliens within our borders are being hoodwinked, deceived, misled, and bamboozled into taking a stand against the very Government which has given them asylum. Some of these aliens, who have turned into agitators and revolutionists, may not know it, but this Government owes them nothing. They came here. Our doors were open. We have a right to send them out and away. They have no right to ally themselves with an aggregation of anti-Government agitators whose every step is in the hope of bringing on general riot and disturbance in this country, whose paid speakers go around this country publicly denouncing our soldiers as "scabs in uniform," and who call upon their members to insult and spit on our soldiers, and who insult our fighting men as they march away under the colors of our country.

Mr. Chairman, the people of this country will not stand very much of that sort of thing, and unless the agitators and treasonable street speakers are soon curbed there will be violent outbreaks of protest on the part of those who stand for law and order, but who also stand against the defamation and discrediting of this Government by those who publicly proclaim that they owe no allegiance to it.

These Industrial Workers of the World leaders do proclaim that very thing, not only in speech but in their printed proclamations. They claim they owe allegiance neither to this nor any other country. They pledge themselves to commit perjury wherever desirable. They declare they will make no bargains with those who employ labor. If they do make bargains they will break them as they please. They practice sabotage in a thousand devious ways. Read their sly, insinuating instructions in their book "Sabotage," and read their ideas on an actual revolution in their book, "The Revolutionary I. W. W.," copies of which I have here. Their stuff is fearful in times of peace, but when this country is at war it is downright treason.

I had expected, Mr. Chairman, to go somewhat into a discussion of the printed statements of this organization, and to discuss also the great injury it is doing to skilled labor, and to labor which is organized properly for its own benefit and not for the destruction of property and the overthrow of the Government, but I feel that the chairman, the gentleman from North Carolina [Mr. SMALL] has been more than generous in giving me this much time for a discussion which is aside from the bill, and shall forbear. In conclusion, permit me to say that I have watched the activities of the Industrial Workers of the World organization for several years. I have a choice collection of their vicious literature on hand, including their blasphemous songbook, and I know that they are taking advantage of the war situation to make trouble and disturbance wherever they can, and that no persons, not even themselves, can possibly be the gainers. Revolution is what they preach; treason is what they urge; destruction is what they do; anarchy is their brother; the more disturbance they create the better they like it. They urge the breaking of the law, but when cornered they claim protection of that very law. They defy the States, and the States call on the Federal Government to step in. And step in the United States should, with its laws against treason, against sedition, and for the deportation of undesirable aliens, who either will not or can not understand what our institutions mean for them, or what is required of all within our borders when we are at war. [Applause.]

Soldiers' Insurance Bill.

OF

HON. J. CHARLES LINTHICUM,

OF MARYLAND,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, September 24, 1917.

Mr. LINTHICUM. Mr. Speaker, I am heartily in favor of this splendid measure, which is intended to make liberal provision for the brave men and women who are to risk their lives in protecting and fighting for our glorious banner, the Stars and Stripes, the emblem of freedom of all the peoples of all the nations of the world. I am glad to be able to give this bill my hearty approval, as I have and always will, any legislation that will ameliorate the suffering of our people and aid us in the successful prosecution of this war.

OBJECTS OF THE BILL.

The objects of this bill may well engage the best thought and the wisest action of Congress. It may be divided into three distinct parts:

First. To provide for the dependents of soldiers and sailors during their absence in war and to make permanent provision for such dependents in the event of the death of the soldier or sailor.

Second. To provide pensions or "compensation," as it is termed in the bill, for soldiers and sailors who may become disabled during their service.

Third. To provide an insurance system for all such soldiers and sailors as may elect to avail themselves of it at a very low cost.

The objects sought to be attained can not be too highly commended. The Nation owes it to its brave defenders who offer their lives in the service of our country that all three of these acts of justice should be done. The authors of the bill have shown the proper conception of the obligations of the Nation to its champions on land and sea by making provision for them. This bill is one of the most constructive and enlightening pieces of legislation which has come before us in the course of the session.

It may be asserted that the cost of this system is too great. Personally I do not think that Congress can enact into law a measure which will fully compensate the brave men who are offering their services and their lives in defense of the principles of our country. I have no patience with any suggestion that the methods proposed by this bill will cost too much. Even if, under this measure, the annual cost of doing justice to our fighting men and their dependents should amount to six or seven hundred million dollars per annum, it is an insignificant sum compared with what these men do for their country—the upholding of our ideals and for the world at large. We are contemplating expenditures for the fiscal year of 1918 of more than $10,000,000,000 for the prosecution of the war—the creation of armies and death-dealing instruments to be used in destroying human life in order to restore peace and justice in the world. Shall we hesitate to expend $700,000,000 more per annum, if need be—about 6 per cent of the amount we propose to expend for war purposes—for the protection of the widows and orphans, the dependent and the injured, who, after all, make the greatest sacrifices of any part of our people for the safety, security, and honor of our country?

APPROVAL OF THE PEOPLE.

I am confident that the people of our country will approve our action. We have been most generous to our allies, and, in my opinion, should now appropriate an amount necessary to make the lives of our crippled soldiers and their dependents as comfortable as the broadest humanity will dictate. There can be no reasonable argument advanced against the obligation on the part of the Government to reward those who have risked their lives in defense of the flag and for the protection of our Nation's honor and salvation. I am in favor of every kind of legislation that will provide, as far as possible, for the safety and comfort of these soldier boys and mitigate the suffering and sorrow of their beloved ones. I am anxious that our boys be relieved of the worry and anxiety entailed by leaving their loved ones unprotected and unprovided for. I want to dispel this cloud by giving them assurances that their dependents will be provided for and they themselves assured of compensation in case of injury.

INSURANCE VERSUS PENSIONS.

We shall preserve American ideals and sustain the self-respect of our fighting youth if we offer them in place of either present or future gratuities a real opportunity to purchase for themselves the protection that they may deem essential for their families. This protection must be real; it must cover death or disability at any time, not merely within five years after the war. The insurance must mature, if the insured so desires, when he reaches a certain age, as well as by death or total disability. Speculation in the insurance must not be permitted; it must be unassignable and free from the claims of creditors, both of the insured and the beneficiary. It must not be payable to any and every one, but only to a limited class of relatives. This bill contains ample provisions to cover the details which I have outlined, and I sincerely trust that it will be speedily enacted into law.

I believe that the attached clipping states the facts most clearly:

SOLDIERS' INSURANCE VERSUS PENSIONS.

[By Samuel McCune Lindsay, professor of social legislation, Columbia University.]

The principles of social insurance, applied to all sorts of risks and hazards in which the community has a stake or shares a responsibility, have been gaining in favor the world over in recent years. On the contrary, the principles of pension legislation in all countries have been found wanting and experience everywhere is leading to its abandonment.

Thirty-five years ago Germany began to apply scientific business management to the relations of government and the problems of social welfare in dealing with the public relief of distress, sickness, industrial accidents, invalidity, old age, and unemployment among wage earners. Under the masterful leadership of Bismarck, in harmony with a new national spirit and a modern sense of social responsibility and solidarity, a strongly centralized and comprehensive system of state insurance was started. Within 25 years this system not only became the characteristic and dominant feature of a powerful national government, but also became incorporated in its essential principles by the Governments of Great Britain, France, Italy, Russia, and practically every country of Europe into a new development of democracy, a new function of government, a new attitude of peoples in their conception of the possibilities of social organization.

THE UNITED STATES A LAGGARD IN SOCIAL ORGANIZATION.

The United States alone has lagged behind and relied upon the older individualism of the poor law, administered by the smallest units of local government, upon the personal initiative of the injured person or his representatives, to secure redress under the common law or the law of torts, upon employers' liability statutes, and upon equity procedure to remedy evils and achieve social justice. Of course, such methods long ago proved themselves inadequate in the face of the wonderful development of highly centralized organization, not only national but international in scope, which has characterized American industry during the past 50 years. The day of reckoning between the people and their Governments, between effective business organization of common interests and political methods which are the last resort of privateering, has been postponed by the exceptional development of private philanthropy and its extension to fields and to tasks for which it is only just now proving itself also inadequate.

THE PATCHWORK OF PENSIONS DISCREDITED.

In one great department, however, where government has had to meet a national responsibility, namely, in the relief of soldiers and sailors and their dependents, the patchwork of pensions in the United States since the Civil War, based on the principle of gratuities and political favor rather than on a sense of social justice and mutual obligation, is universally recognized as a failure. Pensions have developed in hundreds of thousands of citizens precisely the attitude of mind toward government which real democracy seeks to dispel. If the collective wealth and power of the community becomes a prize which the individual seeks to control for his own benefit, no real democracy is possible. Only as we can cultivate the feeling on the part of every individual citizen that he can be stronger, freer, and happier in proportion as every other individual in the community is made stronger, more secure, and given larger opportunities for happiness will the foundations of democracy itself be safe and its fruits increase.

DEMOCRATIC REORGANIZATION OF GOVERNMENTS.

We are just starting upon a world enterprise which has for its ultimate goal the democratic reorganization of the world. In the preparation of the Nation for the war there is no more striking and significant proposal that goes to the roots of our own unpreparedness, and there is no more timely and important war measure which may well test our national spirit than the proposal to provide a scientific system of social insurance instead of pensions to carry as many as possible of the risks and sacrifices of military service.

With the national purpose to participate in this world struggle for democracy defined and determined by the people themselves expressing their will in accordance with democratic principles, the conscription of men for military service on a scientific and impartial plan designed to secure those best able to render such service has been the most heartening evidence of real democracy in this country and its greatest gain in a century.

LIGHTENING THE BURDENS OF DRAFTED MEN.

The response of the people to the draft law has abundantly vindicated American patriotism and the virility of the Nation. It could have been made much easier, aroused greater enthusiasm, and contributed to the building up of an even stronger national spirit had Congress at the time it passed the draft law also enacted the war insurance bill which it has now under consideration.

Every removable fear that may naturally enter into the mind of the man called upon to give his life in defense of his country should certainly be removed. The sacrifice of comfort and economic security can not be compensated for by any wage which the Government may pay its soldiers. The degrees of sacrifice are too varied and its economic value too great for that. The anxiety, however, which the man who goes to the front naturally feels lest those who are dependent upon him for support are left unprovided for, can be removed. Provision can be made not only for as strong economic protection for the comfort and welfare of the soldier's family as his own earning power gave them before he went to war, but his personal economic status, to whatever extent his earning power may be impaired if not destroyed by his military service, may also be assured.

The sooner Congress enacts the war insurance bill and thereby removes unnecessary handicaps which inevitably deter patriotic men through fear of the economic readjustments it is necessary to make, the prompter and more ready will be the response to their country's call. The cost will be great, and the challenge to business ability in the management of a highly complicated and stupendous business undertaking will be even greater. If the conscription of wealth is likewise necessary to make effective the conscription of men it will have no greater justification in any expenditure that Congress is called upon to make than in supplying the huge sums needed for the compensation and insurance of the unavoidable risks which those who fight must take and which the man at home can in this way and will cheerfully share.

WHAT THE WAR INSURANCE BILL PROPOSES.

The bill to authorize the establishment of a bureau of war risk insurance in the Treasury Department proposes to add to the existing bureau which insures ships and seamen in the merchant marine against war risks a new division of military and naval insurance which will provide for three things:

(1) Compulsory allotment of pay for support of dependents and for savings for future economic rehabilitation.

(2) Compensation for death or injury, including disability due to disease.

(3) Ability to get additional insurance at low cost.

THE ENLISTED MAN MUST HELP HIMSELF.

Every enlisted man in the military or naval forces of the United States must allot not to exceed one-half of his pay and not less than $15 per month for the benefit of his dependents or, if he has no dependents, to be deposited to his credit for his own benefit as a capital fund upon which the Government will pay interest and hold for him to enable him to make necessary economic readjustments after the expiration of his military service. To this compulsory allotment the enlisted man may add voluntarily from the half pay not subject to compulsory allotment and for purposes which he may choose. The Government will add a family allowance equal in amount to the monthly compulsory allotment and graded according to the relationship and number of dependents, but in no case does the Government allowance exceed $50 per month. This is payable from the time of enlistment to death in, or one month after discharge from, the service but not for more than one month after the termination of the present war emergency. For the ordinary enlisted man, who receives $33 per month in foreign service, the minimum compulsory allotment might be $16.50, to which $16.50 would be added as a family allowance, thus giving his family a minimum income of $33 per month, which the man, however, might by further allotment easily increase to $50. He would have to give upon $8.50 of the other half of his pay. The Government would add another $8.50 and he would have $8 per month left, or sufficient for his own spending money.

COMPENSATION FOR DEATH OR DISABILITY.

Compensation for death or disability resulting from personal injury suffered or disease contracted in the course of the service by any commissioned officer or enlisted man, or by any member of the Army or Navy Nurse Corps composed of women. This compensation is graded like the compensation now provided for wage earners under workmen's compensation laws in 35 States, and under the Federal Government of the United States according to pay, and is made payable in monthly installments. It is not assignable and is exempt from taxation, attachments, and execution. It takes the place of any rights or expectations under pension laws and is expressly granted in lieu of pension. It is not operative for persons receiving service or retirement pay. The scale is a fairly liberal one, and Congress, of course, may at any time make it more liberal, but presumably would do so only under general legislation for the entire service, thus precluding the inequalities and injustices of special pension legislation. Congress can not constitutionally bind future Congresses and prevent special pension legislation, but it can, and in this law it seeks to, create so fair, liberal, and satisfactory a system of meeting every just claim impersonally and as a matter of right that it will be practically impossible for any future Congress to consider a private pension bill and highly improbable that any soldier or his dependents would seek any other remedy than that provided for under this war compensation act.

INSURANCE OF INSURABILITY.

This is a novel, constructive, and at the same time perhaps the most contentious part of the new proposal. It is a departure from the accepted principles of industrial compensation legislation and from the practice of other countries in dealing with compensation for war risks, family allowances, and pensions. It is, however, vital and essential to a fair test of the proposal to which the Secretary of the Treasury and the President have given their unqualified indorsement and without which that plan can not be fairly tested. It is the feature which specially marks this measure as a forward-looking experiment in social legislation. It is far-reaching and constructive and is a war measure in a real sense.

ADVANTAGES OF INSURANCE.

Americans are not laggards in their appreciation and use of the advantages of mutual insurance. A man fit for military service is physically the best insurable risk and can purchase insurance at the lowest commercial rate. The minute he shoulders a gun he either can not purchase insurance at all or only in a limited way at a very high and practically prohibitive rate. This bill proposes to stimulate and encourage every enlisted man to use his own resources and to make use of the facilities of insurance to protect and safeguard his interests to the limit of his resources. To do this it offers him ordinary term insurance renewable from year to year during the war and convertible at the end of the war without physical examination in such amounts as he chooses to take, not to exceed $10,000, the Government agreeing to pay the difference between the cost of carrying such insurance while he is engaged in military service, estimated at about $58 per thousand, for the man of 21 years of age, and the rate which he would pay if he were not in military service, estimated at about $8 per thousand. He is given 120 days after enlistment in which to take out such amount of additional insurance as he may elect, and if he fails to exercise this privilege and dies, or becomes totally disabled within this period, he will be considered as insured and the benefit paid to his family.

The insurance is payable only in monthly installments to the beneficiary during life. The maximum amount of $10,000 is estimated to yield about $25 per month, which for the enlisted man when added to his compensation for death or disability as based on his rate of pay is none too liberal to maintain a decent standard of living for his family deprived of its breadwinner.

The insurance companies do not favor State insurance nor like the idea of the Government going into the insurance business. They appreciate, however, the advertising value for the insurance business in general of this feature of the war-insurance bill.

WHAT IT COSTS THE GOVERNMENT AND THE INSURED.

Without compulsion and without the importunities of insurance agents would the average man who needs it most take out this added insurance to any considerable extent? Could he afford to do so? Probably not more than $2,500 per man on the average would be written. In perfecting the details of the bill Congress may decide to limit the privilege of such subsidized insurance for officers and men whose rates of pay, or private resources, make the Government aid unnecessary. It may also decide to pay the full cost for certain amounts of such added insurance for those who can afford to take only small policies. The principle of the Government subsidy is, however, right and just. There is no discrimination at the expense of the insured taxpayer who pays the full commercial rate in favor of a class to whom we do not owe a greater debt than any subsidized insurance can possibly pay.

The cost to the Government, however great and however difficult to estimate exactly in advance, is sure to be less than that of any system of pensions and much fairer because proportionate to what the insured person has done for himself. The soldier who does nothing for himself must be content with what his compensation yields or depend on private charity. After rejecting or neglecting so liberal an opportunity as this provision for the insurance of his insurability offers he can not with good grace appeal to the Government for a pension.

A NEW CHANCE FOR THE INJURED.

An extremely interesting and valuable provision is made for injured persons who may through a process of reeducation, rehabilitation, and vocational training which the Government will provide, have their earning power restored. In cases of dismemberment or of injuries to sight or hearing and of other injuries commonly causing permanent disability persons may be required in lieu of compensation for the time being to enlist in a training branch of military and naval service entitling them to full pay as during the last month of their active service and to family allowance and allotments as in the regular service if while taking training for rehabilitation they are prevented from following any substantially gainful occupation. Anyone failing so to enlist for training forfeits his right to compensation until he does so.

A MEASURE DEVISED BY EXPERTS.

Congress has had able assistance in framing its war-insurance act. The plan is in a new and important sense an administration measure. The Secretary of the Treasury very properly considered it a financial measure of the greatest importance and has given it disinterested and able leadership. He called to his assistance not only experts in insurance and the representatives of the leading insurance companies in this country whose patriotic cooperation he has secured, but he has also had the active help and support of influential labor leaders like Mr. Samuel Gompers and Mr. J. W. Sullivan, of socially minded economists, lawyers, and persons expert in dealing with the problems of dependency, like Judge Julian W. Mack, who has given his time freely as chairman of a committee that drafted the bill and worked out the details of the plan; of Dr. Leo S. Rowe, Assistant Secretary of the Treasury; Capt. S. H. Wolfe, a well-known accountant and actuary; Miss Julia C. Lathrop, of the Children's Bureau; Mr. V. Everit Macy, president of the National Civic Federation; Profs. Henry R. Seager and Thomas I. Parkinson, of Columbia Uniservity, and the staff of the Legislative Drafting Research Fund of Columbia University.

WHAT OTHER COUNTRIES ARE DOING.

The experience of other countries in providing for the dependents of enlisted men has been carefully studied by the Children's Bureau. Much of it has been put in evidence by Miss Lathrop at the House hearings on the bill, many features of which are frankly based on this experience. That of Canada, where conditions are more analogous to our own, is described by Capt. Wolfe in a publication of the Children's Bureau.

NEED FOR PROMPT ACTION.

Congress should act promptly on the war-insurance measure, even though its Members are weary from the arduous labors of a long and momentous extra session. Our laws dealing with problems of dependency in soldiers' families in time of war lack many modern provisions and tendencies which a comparison with those of European countries reveal. It is time that they were modernized. The war-insurance bill will do that and give the United States a measure which will put it in the first rank and ought to be part of the contract between our Government and our new National Army.

FAVORS LIBERAL PENSIONS.

Ever since I have been a Member of Congress I have always lent my voice and vote in favor of a liberal allowance or pension for the soldier and sailor who have fought for our country and for their dependents. It gave me pleasure to cast my vote for the Sherwood dollar-a-day pension. I also supported and voted for the bill of September 8, 1916, which allowed the widows of veterans, when 70 years of age, an increase of pension from $12 to $20 per month; also the bill for the relief of the widows of Spanish and Philippine War veterans, and I trust that ere long a bill of this nature will be added to our statutes.

The proposed provisions for the men and their dependents should not be offered as gratuities or pensions, and they should not be deferred until the end of the war. The wives and children, the dependent mothers and fathers of the men should not be left, as in previous times, to the uncertain charity of the communities in which they live. The minds of our soldiers and sailors should be put at rest, so far as their loved ones are concerned, by the knowledge that they will be amply provided for by their Government as a part of the compensation for the service they are rendering their country. In like manner they should know in advance that if they are killed in battle definite and just provision has been made for their dependents, and that if they are disabled, totally or partially, definite provisions are made for them, and that they are not going to be left to the uncertain chances of future legislation or to the scandals of our old pension system. Every person should know the moment that he enlists in the military service of the Government these definite guaranties and assurances are given to him not as charity but as a part of his deserved compensation for the extra-hazardous occupation into which his Government has forced him.

WHAT THE BILL WILL DO.

This bill will do something for every soldier and sailor who fights beneath our flag. It means comfort, it means blessings, it means happiness to the wife and children of every man, whether a volunteer or a conscript. We have passed in the history of the Republic many pieces of legislation affecting the soldiers of the Union—the Revolutionary heroes, those who fought in the War of 1812, in the Mexican War, in the Civil War, and in the Spanish-American War. This measure, however, is more far-reaching and beneficial than any legislation ever passed by Congress on the eve of any of our wars. Let this legislation be entered on the statute books before our heroes leave our shores.

EFFICIENCY.

Efficiency in the twentieth century warfare depends largely upon the morale of the fighting force and the population at large. It is but another word for unity. The newspapers to-day give a remarkable evidence of the effect of this unified mind, and also the lack of it upon nations. I believe that the power of Germany lies largely in the system of national insurance which she long since established under which the entire body of her industrial workers are insured against three great contingencies causing inability to earn a livelihood:

1. Accidents.
2. Sickness.
3. Old age and invalidity.

REEDUCATION AND REHABILITATION.

Another feature of this bill which recommends itself to me is the provision for the reeducation and rehabilitation of the men who are totally or partially disabled to such an extent that they can not resume the occupations in which they were educated before they went into the war. This is one of the most humane provisions of the bill and would result in enabling the Government to make useful, economic units of these men, so that they would be contributing something to society when they came back from the front. It will make them very much more contented and useful citizens, because if a man can be occupied under such circumstances he will lead a very much happier life than otherwise. The Government owes this duty to the injured man and to the people. Its primary obligation is to develop all of his potentialities to fit him for the best in life of which he is capable. Every European country is now making provision for the reeducation and rehabilitation of its soldiers and sailors, and some of them have long since made provisions for those injured in civil occupations. At present Government officials are studying the experiences of these nations with a view to future legislation on this most important subject. The present bill, however, lays down two fundamental propositions:

First, that if the man be found capable of reeducation he shall be compelled to take a proper course when offered him, under penalty of suspension of his compensation; second, if, however, through his reeducation he shall gain a better economic position, he shall not thereby be deprived of his compensation. If a man has lost his legs, they can not be restored to him; payment is made for the loss; but it is in the common interest that these fighting men, crippled though they may be, should not rest content to live on the minimum compensation which the Government gives. They, of all men, should be encouraged to lift themselves above the common level and to develop all of their latent energies and powers.

BEGINNING OF THE PENSION SYSTEM.

The pension system began when the barbarians were assaulting Rome and it was necessary to hew down the bridge in order to prevent the invasion. Horatius and two comrades stood at the bridge until after it was hewn down, slaying many of their enemy. Horatius then swam the river and landed safely on the other side of the Tiber. Although the Romans made no contract with him, pensions started there, for afterwards—

They gave him of the corn lands,
Which were of common right;
As much as two strong oxen
Could plow from morn till night;
And with laughing and with weeping,
Until this day the story is told,
How well Horatius kept the bridge
In the brave days of old.

THE SOLDIER OF 1917.

The soldier of 1917, fighting for freedom of the world, will go down in the history of this country side by side with that of the soldier of the Revolution. Again "freedom" will be the keynote of our victory. The soldier of 1917 will prove equally valorous and will incorporate his name upon the roll of honor that will be erected in the hearts of a free people—a lasting and enduring testament of his worth and patriotism.

He will emulate the valor of his forefathers, enter upon his duties with determination to drive autocracy and despotism from the world, and teach the nations of the earth that the ships of commerce flying our Star-Spangled Banner shall sail at will, unmolested and unafraid.

He will have every comfort in the way of equipment and commissary—the best equipment that money and genius can procure for the richest Nation on the globe. A more splendid body of young men could not be found upon the earth than the soldier boys of America.

The Blue and the Gray.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. STUART F. REED,
OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, September 24, 1917.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an address delivered at the twenty-eighth annual reunion of the Society of the Blue and the Gray, at Ripley, W. Va., September 20, 1917, by Hon. HARRY C. WOODYARD, of West Virginia.

The address is as follows:

ADDRESS DELIVERED AT THE TWENTY-EIGHTH ANNUAL REUNION OF THE SOCIETY OF THE BLUE AND THE GRAY, AT RIPLEY, W. VA., SEPTEMBER 20, 1917, BY HON. HARRY C. WOODYARD, OF WEST VIRGINIA.

Soldiers who wore the blue and who wore the gray, ladies and gentlemen, I know that you feel as I do the strongest desire to hear the great orator and great leader in the United States Senate, who has conferred a high honor and a heavy obligation upon us by laying aside important official duties for this day and journeying here to instruct and delight us out of the abundance of his intellectual and oratorical gifts. I know that you feel, as I would feel, an impatience with anyone ignorant of the proprieties of such an occasion as this and vain-gloriously heedless of the rights of the principal speaker of this notable meeting who would trespass upon that speaker's rights and time. That I promise I shall not do. I am as anxious as you are that we shall not delay partaking of the fine "feast of reason and flow of soul" that has been prepared for us.

But I am not insensible to the honor which your committee has conferred upon me by inviting me to come here to this reunion and to present to you the distinguished Senator who is your honored guest. It is a compliment I feel I am unworthy of, and a duty I know I am incapable of performing as successfully as I would like. But I want you to know I am deeply touched and that I am profoundly grateful for this privilege.

My friends, in this hour of national peril such a reunion as this is colored with a significance which has never characterized any of the preceding meetings of you men who wore the blue and you men who wore the gray. You who were the actors in the greatest war drama of civilized times are now the observers of the greatest war spectacle in the world's history. You have been spared to look on at a world aflame with the fires of war—the war of the nations of the world. Your fighting days are over. The liberty for which you offered your life, for which you bared your breasts on many a battle field where the storms of shot and shell swept as never known on battle fields before, is the same liberty for which the peoples of the world are fighting to-day as they are given the reason and vision to see it. Then liberty and freedom were the prizes for which a country, racked and divided, battled. Now they are the priceless boons which a whole world in arms is struggling to attain. And in this great struggle you have given as freely of your sons and your grandsons as you as freely offered up your lives for the principles of government that you held more dearly than life itself in the years 61–65. To you this great Nation of ours owed a debt it could never hope to discharge prior to this present great conflict; but now you have multiplied that debt countless times by sending forth to the colors at the Nation's call your sons and your grandsons, your daughters and granddaughters as angels of mercy, and by "doing your bit" at home, in so far as your age and strength will permit. Men of the blue and soldiers of the gray, you whose lives have been spared to span from Bull Run to Verdun, and your comrades who lie in dreamless sleep upon the hillsides and in peaceful valleys, for whom "taps" have long since sounded, hearts too full of love and gratitude and souls too thrilled with admiration of your heroism can find expression only by bringing us to silent attention and salute. The words have never yet been written, nor the sentences fittingly woven and spoken, that could make a tribute deserving enough for patriots such as you.

Liberty, my friends, is the greatest gift of God to man—liberty to fashion our lives and live our lives under law and order and just Governments. Men have fought and died for liberty since the creation of the world, as they are now fighting and dying for it on European battle fields and upon the high seas. It is for the preservation of our liberty that we are at war to-day—liberty at home, liberty abroad, the protection of the lives and properties of our people here, there, and everywhere they may be. It was the unwarranted challenging of our rights as a free people, a liberty-loving and liberty-demanding people, by the Imperial German Empire which added us to the long list of fighting foes of that nation. We are in this war—we are fighting Germany—because of liberty, and in the name of liberty we shall win it. We are in it because Germany willed that we should be in it. Upon the Imperial Government of the Kaiser the blame for our participation in this mad-world conflict rests.

But in fighting for liberty, my friends, we should be sure that we do not relinquish one iota of the liberty that we now enjoy, that has been handed down to us from Yorktown and Appomattox. Liberty under our Constitution! There is nothing so dear to an American as that. It is the priceless gift of the ages, consecrated by the blood of patriotic men and the tears and heartaches of the patriotic mothers of our land. And yet there are thoughtless men among us who talk loosely of our constitutional liberties and rights. I regret to say that there are such men in high official places; that there are Senators and Representatives in Congress, the last of all men who should lose their heads in a national crisis, who speak with dalliance and do official acts of recklessness, which tend to abridge the rights of American citizenship and to nullify the guarantees of liberty and freedom contained in our Constitution—in our Magna Charta, in our Bill of Rights.

I know that in times of profound peace we are not so seriously appreciative of the great written document of our democracy. But, my friends, this is not a time of peace, but of war, such as never before reddened the rivers of the world with blood. It is the hour when sober-minded, grave-visaged, heavy-hearted American citizens turn to the inspired words of Stephen A. Douglas.

God forbid—

that anyone should ever make the attempt to subvert the Constitution of the United States. Let that Constitution ever be trodden under foot and destroyed, and there will not be wisdom and patriotism enough left to make another. * * * Our safety, our liberty, depend upon preserving the Constitution of the United States as our fathers made it inviolate.

It is a time when men reconsecrate themselves with the words of President Wilson:

The Constitution of the United States is not a mere lawyer's document; it is a vehicle of life, and its spirit is always the spirit of the age. Its prescriptions are clear, and we know what they are; a written document makes lawyers of us all, and our duties as citizens should make us conscientious lawyers, reading the text of the Constitution without subtlety and sophistry.

My friends, that is good advice to good Americans at any time, but it is particularly good advice at this time. Take down the Constitution from its shelf and read it; reread it. It is the will of the forefathers, by which they bequeathed us "life, liberty, and the pursuit of happiness." You will find it of Bible strength to you in these dark hours of national peril and world-wide disaster. You will find there your rights, which some would abridge, and come to better understand, at a time when a clearer understanding is most necessary and desirable, what every American citizen should know.

My friends, the Constitution has not been suspended. It is still the living soul and bulwark of our liberties. Under it our courts and governmental institutions are functioning. The right of free speech and discussion, honest criticism, and conscientious objection is not done away with. Free American men may meet, as we are met to-day, to discuss this great war and the many and new issues which have been suddenly thrust upon us. I know that there are many things that have been done, and many articles which have been written, that have created and fostered a contrariwise impression. I know that I have received letters from constituents, men whom I know and whose patriotic Americanism and good citizenship I respect, asking me whether they could freely write to me their views and give to me their opinions on issues of present moment—me their Representative in Congress, the man chosen by them to reflect by my vote their views—writing me to know if they could exercise the constitutional right of petition without being held legally or morally to account as traitors. My friends, the time has not come in this Nation of ours, and I pray that it never will come, when anybody can not write to a Member of Congress, or anybody else in official or private life, his views upon issues vital to the welfare and perpetuity of the Republic. When that time comes, and I pray that it never shall, the death knell of this Republic has been sounded. This war, and no law passed to facilitate its successful conduct, nor no law in the land, affords authority for any man, or set of men, to attempt to abridge, curtail, or infringe upon the constitutional right of our citizens to free speech and the privilege of petitioning their Government and those who happen by the grace of their votes to temporarily be intrusted with safeguarding our Constitution and enforcing our laws. This does not mean, however, that our liberty confers upon us license. Neither upon us nor our chosen officials. The balance must be preserved, and will be. "Treason against the United States," says our Constitution, "shall consist only in levying war against them, or in adhering to their enemies, giving them aid and comfort."

My friends, I have come to you from a Congress which has made history; which has proven expeditious and efficient; which has neither retarded nor delayed the Government in its war preparations, nor proven itself unwieldy in its functioning. It has shown itself patriotic, liberal, statesmanlike in its scope, and responsive to the will of the people as reflected by the President chosen by them to pilot their Government safely through the present perils which beset us everywhere. Congress has upheld his hands and promoted his every undertaking in behalf of the common weal of all. This Congress has refuted every criticism flung against the institution of Congress for years. No one can read the record of this Congress and justly withhold praise of its unmatched and unparalleled list of accomplishments. Many men of many minds, and yet they have merged together in the furtherance of a common cause once the step was taken.

Do not suppose for an instant that opinions did not conflict; that views of individuals are not as many and as divergent as ever they were among Members of Congress. But in the face of such a crisis as we are now facing, some men must give way to others; some opinions must be discarded for the views entertained by others; there must be compromise and surrender; and in the end harmony and unity of action and policy that a solid and unbroken front may be presented to the Nation's enemies. All men do not approve of all that has been done or is being done. There is just grounds for criticism of many things. For example, you know the position I took when the conscript or draft law was before us. I was opposed to that law. Furthermore, I am still opposed to that law as a principle, but now that it is the law it must be obeyed, and no citizen who has the welfare of our country at heart is justified in attempting to evade it or in any manner to obstruct its proper enforcement. But my views as to it as a principle of our Government has undergone no change. I am against it, and when the present emergency is passed, if I am in a position to do so, I will exert the last ounce of my official power to wipe it from the statute books, and I hope for all time to come. But an overwhelming majority of Congress, overwhelming largely because of Executive pressure, said that that law must be enacted, and those like myself who fought it were compelled to bow to the will of the majority.

Time, I think, has vindicated our position. There was an Army and a Navy of 1,074,000 men—all volunteers—before a drafted man was ordered to a camp or cantonment. And this great fighting force of volunteers was made up of the best young manhood of our country, who came forward and enlisted of their own free will, imbued with a high patriotism and a deep consciousness of a righteous cause; without any compulsion; as brave and as fearless young fellows as ever faced a recruiting officer; thousands of them from our colleges and our best homes; the pick and flower of these United States; a million volunteers without a campaign for volunteers being made. A million more could have been gotten in the same way and within the same space of time. And that was the answer American manhood gave to those who said nothing short of the draft would do. The world's war history furnishes no parallel of that achievement.

Congress has authorized billions of dollars for the expenses of our first year in this war. When I left Washington bills were pending which will, when passed, bring the total authorization for the first year up to $22,000,000,000—a sum which is absolutely incomprehensible in its magnitude to the finite mind. Do not think that this heretofore unheard-of financial promotion has been carried on without its difficulties, or with the unanimous approval and accord which the votes on passage of these huge budgets would indicate. Excepting the sums loaned to the allies, which we hope and expect to get back, the people will have to pay in taxes and bonds. If this war is to be "a long and costly war," as Lord Northcliffe has said, then there must be more and heavier taxes, and more and more bonds. Let us hope that Lord Northcliffe's prediction does not hold true. But the President said to Congress these gigantic sums are needed, and Congress with a blind faith never before shown by it authorized them. "Uphold the hands of our President"—that slogan need not be wasted upon Congress. It has done so with a vengeance, and it has done it with about as much knowledge of where the money was going, through what channels it was flowing, and who was responsible for its expenditure in detail as you, my friends, have.

Not because Congress has not asked for this information. Not because it did not think a congressional committee on the conduct of the war to cooperate with the President advisable, nor that a committee of its Members on the war expenditures would not be a good thing, but because it was the choice of the administrative end of the Government to ignore such reasonable proposals. It would seem that there was a lack of understanding as to who's war this is. Many of us in Congress hold to the view that this is not the President's war, that it is not Congress's war, nor is it the war of the officeholder; but this is the American people's war. They are paying for it; they are fighting it; and they are entitled to know all about it. But there is a disposition in Washington to look at it otherwise. In five months, with not an ounce of powder burned nor a single shell exploded, Congress has appropriated and made provision for substantially as large an indebtedness as England incurred during the whole three years of the war and more than France and Russia throughout the three years of war.

Permit me to read briefly from a speech made by Congressman MOORE of Pennsylvania, on September 4, in which I find some very interesting and instructive figures and information relative to the expenditures of Great Britain, who proclaims that she is bearing the brunt of this world-wide war. Mr. MOORE says:

Data compiled by the Department of Commerce and submitted to the Ways and Means Committee show that the public debt of Great Britain March 31, 1914, was $3,443,799,000; that one year later, March 31, 1915, after the war had started, it had advanced to $5,673,374,000, a matter of only $2,200,000,000 in one whole year; and that more than three years later, July 21, 1917, the interim being war years, it had increased to $21,897,666,000.

Now as to France. The public debt of France, as reported to the committee by the same department, was $6,347,540,000 January 1, 1914, before the war started, but jumped rapidly until April 30, 1917, when the total was $17,727,013,000. This huge indebtedness of France, where most of the hard fighting has been done, is less for the three years than the five months' cost to the United States, and it included loans of nearly 4,000,000,000 francs to allied countries.

Is it any wonder that Members of Congress have asked for particulars and fought vigorously for the erection of safeguards to protect these vast sums of the people's money? Are the accredited representatives of the people to be denounced as lacking patriotism if they demand some information relative to the expenditure of these vast sums that you and I and all of us are called upon to contribute? If this is to be a "long and costly war," as Lord Northcliffe states, what, may I ask, must our people expect if the first five months has set the pace? My countrymen, this is no time for hysteria, but deep and sober thought. Is it not wisdom on our part, indeed patriotism, to endeavor to the best of our ability in this great crisis to throw every safeguard compatible with the public welfare around these vast and enormous expenditures? But President Wilson said that a congressional committee on the conduct of the war to cooperate and advise with him would be a "humiliation" to him; he would construe it as a want of confidence in his integrity; and a majority of Congress, not individually holding that opinion, I believe, voted with his expressed wishes. I dissent most emphatically from that opinion, and at the next regular session, in December, I shall urge and demand the appointment of such a committee.

Now, my friends, there is one thing upon which we all agree—we people here, the President and his administration, the admirals of our Navy and the generals of our Army, the boys in France or in the training camps behind the lines, and the fathers and mothers of these boys—there is one thing that we all agree on, and that is that we are in this war and we must win it at all costs. There can be no argument on that.

And there is another thing upon which we all agree, and that is that in our prayer to Almighty God we pray that there may be an early and an honorable peace—a peace that will be lasting and a peace that will be world-wide. When that may come to pass we do not know now, but we fervently pray that it may come to us soon. Lord Northcliffe has said that we are in for a "long and costly war." That depends, I think, upon the terms of peace we are willing to accept.

I grant you that if our terms are inclusive of the terms demanded by Lord Northcliffe's Government, by France, by Italy, it will be a "long and costly war." But I am not willing to concede that our terms are the terms stipulated by the other foes of Germany. We went to war because Germany killed our citizens upon the high seas, sunk our ships, violated her pledges with us, insulted our flag, sought to humiliate our honor, violated our neutrality, plotted against us, and tried to destroy our self-respect as a Nation. For those things we are sending our young men to death and pouring out our treasure.

We are not, I take it, fighting to conquer lands or peoples for ourselves or for any other nation that happens to be fighting the same foe that we are. I do not understand that we are fighting for the things which Mr. Lloyd-George has stated must be accomplished as a condition of a treaty of peace with the Teutonic allies, for, if we are, this will, indeed, be a "long and costly war" for us. His stipulations are:

Alsace and Lorraine must be returned to France.
Schleswig-Holstein must be annexed to Denmark and the Kiel Canal taken away from Germany.
Belgium and all Germany's and Austria's conquered territories must be set free and fully rehabilitated.
Germany's and Austria's Polish Provinces must be consolidated with the portions of Poland taken from Russia and erected into an autonomous government.
Austria must be deprived of Galicia and Bukowina (to be divided between Serbia and Roumania); Herzegovina, Bosnia, and the Trentino, including the port of Trieste, to be taken from Austria and portions thereof annexed, respectively, to Italy and Serbia.
Germany must be deprived of all her colonial possessions.

For the accomplishment of none of these purposes did the United States go to war against Germany. No declaration of a state of war could have commanded a single vote in Congress on any one or all of these propositions. No parents of an American boy is sending him into the trenches to an almost certain death for any such program as that. And yet the nations that are fighting with us will not turn a willing ear or open mind to a peace proposal unless all or some of these things are wrung from their foe.

I assume we will have no such demands to be made on our vanquished foe, for, as far as the United States is concerned, it will be a submissive Germany which will propose peace to us. Make sure of that! We are fighting for a peace which will bring a treaty that will insure respect and safety for our citizens and ships upon the high seas, in every port in the world; adherence to international and humane laws wherein we are concerned; guaranties of the inviolability of treaties and conventions to which we are signatory; the restoration of all that which existed between this Government and that of Germany before war did away with it; and a guaranty of a lasting peace.

I am emphatically opposed to shedding the blood of our patriotic sons in the trenches of France and Flanders to determine whether Germany or France shall hold Alsace-Lorraine, or whether Italy or Austria shall have Trieste, or what the boundary lines may or shall be between Serbia and Bulgaria and a half dozen other small and, to us, insignificant monarchies. When our rights have been vindicated and guaranteed to our satisfaction, then, my countrymen, must peace prevail. When these demands are met, when these guaranties are given and we feel that we can trust to them, then the United States has accomplished that for which it took up the sword and loaded the magazine. It has won its battle; it has established the righteousness of its cause. God grant that peace with honor may come to us soon!

And now, my friends, I fear I have not exactly fulfilled my promise not to occupy too much of your time. I will have to confess it and to apologize, both to you and to our distinguished visitor. The subject is a large one, and I have not, it seems, been able to handle it in as short a time as I had planned. But if I have wearied you with my views on some of the questions in which I know you are deeply concerned, there is this compensating thought, you will enjoy all the more, by comparison, the great speech that you are now about to hear.

Veterans of the blue and the gray, ladies, and gentlemen, it is a great honor for me to introduce to you one of the greatest statesmen and orators of our time, United States Senator JAMES E. WATSON, of the State of Indiana.

The Flag of the United States.

ADDRESS

HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, June 14, 1917.

The SPEAKER. Under a special order of the House the gentleman from New York [Mr. HICKS] is permitted to address the House for one hour on the American Flag. [Applause.]

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker and Members of the House, on this, the one hundred and fortieth anniversary of the ordination of the Stars and Stripes by the Continental Congress, I have thought it fitting and proper to portray its wondrous history. The flag held in reverence by 100,000,000 of our people is a modern standard. There are no myths or legends associated with its origin; it tells no story of crushed liberties or violated rights; it sprang neither from the sorrows of the oppressed nor the sufferings of the conquered. Its majestic beauty expresses the independence of a thoughtful, courageous, conscientious people; the faith, the lofty aspirations, and the high ideals of representative democracy; the advance of a new Nation dedicated to liberty, to law, to justice, and to human rights. [Applause.]

The flag of America does more than proclaim mere power or acclaim a great and glorious history. Its folds wave a benediction to the yesterdays of accomplishment and beckon the tomorrows of progress with hope and confidence; it heralds the noble purposes of a mighty people and carries a message of hope and inspiration to all mankind. [Applause.] Its glowing splendor appeals to us to demand international justice and arbitration; it commands us to self-sacrifice, and to universal obligation of service which alone can maintain equality of rights and fullness of opportunity in our Republic. Its stars and its stripes voice the spirit of America calling to a Nation of indomitable courage and infinite possibilities to live the tenets of Christianity, to teach the gospel of work and usefulness, to advance education, to demand purity of thought and action in public life, and to protect the liberties of free government from the aggressions of despotic power. This is the call of the flag of the Union in this hour of crisis and turmoil when civilization and the laws of nations and of humanity are being engulfed in the maelstrom of death and destruction. [Applause.] In the words of Robert G. Ingersoll—

The flag for which the heroes fought, for which they died, is the symbol of equal rights. It means universal education—light for every mind, knowledge for every child. It means that it is the duty of every citizen to bear his share of the public burden. It means that all distinctions based on birth or blood have perished from our laws; that our Government shall stand between capital and labor, between the weak and the strong, between the individual and the corporation, between want and wealth, and give the guaranty of simple justice to each and all. That flag is the emblem of a supreme will of a Nation's power. Beneath its folds the weakest must be protected and the strongest must obey. It shields and canopies alike the loftiest mansion and the rudest hut. That flag was given to the air in the Revolution's darkest days. It represents the sufferings of the past, the glories yet to be, and, like the bow of heaven, it is the child of storm and sun.

While no authentic history prevails relating to the banners and standards used by the peoples of remote antiquity, it is probable that as soon as men began to form themselves into tribes and clans or unite for a common purpose, some symbol was used to express the common sentiment. Among many ancient ruins, representations of the objects used as ensigns have been discovered. History, both sacred and profane, records the use of standards or banners by the armies of all nations in the distant past. From the sculptures and paintings on the monuments of Egypt it is evident that the use of standards and flags was common in the Valley of the Nile thousands of years before the Christian era. It was the custom among the Egyptians for each battalion to carry a distinguishing emblem representing some sacred object, or a tablet bearing a name or device. Excavating among the ruins of the Assyrian civilization prove that these peoples were also accustomed to the use of standards. The ancient Hebrews had banners for the various tribes, and in the Old Testament, Book of Numbers, Chapter I, we find: "And the children of Israel shall pitch their tents, every man by his own camp and every man by his own standard." And, in Chapter II: "And the Lord spake unto Moses and unto Aaron, saying, 'Every man of the children of Israel shall pitch by his own standard, with the ensign of their father's house * * *.'"

The Persians at the time of Cyrus used as their standard a white flag on which was displayed a golden eagle. The Romans had many standards, and they were held in the greatest reverence by the people, who in the temples of the Eternal City guarded these emblems of their sovereignty with religious veneration. In primitive times each company of the army bore a pole with a bundle of hay attached. Later the figure of a horse, a bear, a wolf, or other tribal emblem was substituted. In the time of Marius a silver eagle, with spreading wings and with claws grasping the thunderbolts of Jove, was the emblem of the Roman Republic. This device, so common in various forms in countries of modern Europe, was taken from the Etruscans, who were the first to adopt it as the symbol of royal power. The Roman standards changed with their conquests and each emperor displayed new emblems. Augustus adopted a globe to symbolize his rule over the world, and Constantine the cross to commemorate his vision.

The cities of Greece also used standards in their military campaigns, carrying on their staffs various devices and emblems. Sometimes it was a piece of armor attached to a spear, or an initial letter, or an emblem of the gods. According to Homer, Agamemnon raised a purple veil to rally his soldiers. During the Middle Ages, and notably in the crusades, banners and emblems of every description roused the mail-clad warriors in defense of the cross against the crescent. From ancient times the dragon has been a favorite emblem for standards, especially among eastern nations. It was the device on the banner of Harold at the Battle of Hastings and later was used by other English monarchs. Richard Cœur de Lion in 1190 adopted the legend of St. George and the dragon to typify his exploits. Henry III, in 1264, at the battle of Lewes, fought under the dragon; and Edward III, at the battle of Cressy in 1346, displayed a standard "with a dragon of red silk adorned and beaten with fair lilies of gold." The word "ancient" was formerly frequently used to denote a flag or emblem, and in Shakespeare's Othello, Cassio, in speaking of Iago, says "the lieutenant is to be saved before the ancient."

Medieval flags were of various shapes, some long and pointed, some square, and others ending in two or more points. The banner which the Pope sent Charlemagne was oblong with three points. The standards of Henry VIII of England were long streamers rather than flags as we know them. Time does not permit the description of all these emblems, and they have no relation to the flag that floats over us to-day except as an illustration, showing that through all ages and among all races of humanity some flag has been used as an emblem to inspire men's hearts with confidence and hope and reverence.

The flags used by the American Colonies prior to the Revolution were naturally those of England, though there were some exceptions, for while the colonists considered themselves Englishmen, the ties between them and the mother country did not prevent them from showing their independence.

The ancient standard of England, the cross of St. George, a white flag with a rectangular red cross extending its entire length and breadth, was the emblem usually carried by the English soldiery as early as the fourteenth century, and continued as the national flag until 1606, when James I by proclamation united it with the cross of St. Andrew, a blue flag with a diagonal white cross extending from corner to corner. This flag, intended to represent the union of Scotland and England, was called the "King's colors" or "Union" flag, and was to be displayed from the maintops of all British vessels. In addition, ships were to fly from their foretops flags to designate the part of the kingdom from which they came; those from south Britain—England—carrying the St. George cross, and those hailing from north Britain—Scotland—the cross of St. Andrew. It is presumed that as the Mayflower belonged to south Britain the flags under which our Pilgrim fathers sailed on their memorable voyage were the King's colors and the banner of St. George. The same inference can be drawn in reference to the early voyages to the southern colonies.

As the King's colors had been prescribed for ships only, the flag of St. George's cross continued to be used by English subjects on land. On the death of Charles I, in 1649, the union between Scotland and England was dissolved, and in 1651 the St. George's cross was adopted by the Commonwealth Parliament as the national standard of England. While the Union flag again came into use upon the restoration of the monarchy in 1660, under Charles II, it is probable that the St. George's cross flag, with occasional variations, was the one displayed in the American Colonies until 1707, when Parliament ratified the union of Scotland and England. Under this act the Union flag of James I, the King's colors, was ordained as the banner for all subjects of the British realm "both at sea and on land." The famous "meteor flag of England" was a modification of the King's colors, being a red ensign with the device of the crosses in the canton. As Ireland was not incorporated into the British Kingdom until 1801, at which time the cross of St. Patrick—a red diagonal saltier on a white ground—was conjoined with the other two, the present ensign of Great Britain was never used by the American Colonies.

It may be of interest to note other flags which were flown on American soil in the days of its discovery and early settlement. The first flag planted upon our shores, if we exclude the possibility of the Norsemen having reached our continent, was that of Spain, a banner with four quarters, two of which were red, embellished with golden castles, and two white, emblazoned with red lions. This was the standard of Spain during most of the period of her conquests. Columbus also bore a personal flag which had been presented to him by Queen Isabella, consisting of a white ensign with a green cross, having on either side the letters F–Y surmounted by golden crowns. It is stated that Cabot, by reason of his being a Venetian, upon one of his expeditions, in addition to the flag of England whose commission he bore, carried the banner of his native city. This was a scarlet ensign bordered by a broad band of blue, emblazoned by the winged lion of St. Mark holding a cross in his right paw.

The flag of France, which, owing to the splendid assistance rendered by that nation in our struggle for independence, is undoubtedly held in greater esteem by us than any other foreign flag, was at the time Jacques Cartier landed in the New World in 1534, a blue ensign emblazoned with three golden fleur-de-lis. Later a white flag was adopted by the Huguenot party, but it is probable that the Bourbon flag—the fleur-de-lis emblem—floated over the vast territory occupied by the French. Henry Hudson brought the Dutch flag to America when the Half Moon sailed into New York Harbor in 1609. It was a flag with three equal horizontal stripes, orange, white, and blue, with the letters "V. O. C. A.," standing for the Dutch name of the East India Co. of Amsterdam—then in control of maritime affairs of the Netherlands—in the middle of the white stripe. In 1621, when the Dutch West India Co. came into power, the letters "V. O. C. A." were replaced by the letters "G. W. C." In 1650 the yellow stripe was changed to red, the design of the present flag, and this banner waved over the future metropolis of the world until it was supplanted by the flag of St. George's cross. The flag of Sweden—a yellow cross on a blue field—also has a place in our history, as that nation for a number of years maintained settlements on the banks of the Delaware River.

In the records of Massachusetts, as early as 1634, mention is made of the use of the flag of St. George's cross. In 1643 a confederacy known as the United Colonies of New England was formed, but it was not until 1686 that a flag was adopted, being the cross of St. George with the initials "J. R." surmounted by a crown at the intersection of the two bars of the cross. This flag was modified, and in the design most generally used had a red field, with the cross of St. George in the upper corner next the mast. A tree or a globe was usually represented in the upper canton next the staff. This was the famous New England flag. Occasionally the field was blue, and this later design is the flag supposed to have been used at Bunker Hill.

Long before the smoldering embers of revolt blazed into the fires of the Revolution, nearly every colony had adopted a flag of its own. The Massachusetts flag bore a pine tree; South Carolina displayed a rattlesnake; New York had a white flag with a black beaver, symbolical of her industry and the wealth of the fur trade; and Rhode Island a white flag with a blue anchor and the word "Hope" upon it. The growing discontent of the Colonies was productive of numerous devices for flags and banners, the larger portion inscribed with mottoes more or less defiant of British authority. In 1774, at Taunton, Mass., a "union" flag was raised, bearing the words "Liberty or Death." In New York in 1775 a "union" flag with a red field charged with the inscription "George Rex and the Liberties of America" was displayed. Other devices were employed, the most famous being the pine-tree flag, a white ensign with the motto "An appeal to Heaven" above a green pine tree; and the rattlesnake flag, a yellow banner bearing the significant words "Don't Tread on Me" beneath a coiled snake. The rattlesnake flag was also called the Gadsden flag, and in this connection the following reference is of interest:

FEBRUARY 8, 1776.

Col. Gadsden presented to the Provincial Congress an elegant standard, such as was to be used by the commander in chief of the American Navy, being a yellow field with a lively representation of a rattlesnake in the center in the attitude of going to strike and these words underneath, "Don't tread on me."

It was accordingly ordered to be carefully preserved and displayed in the Congress room.

It should be remembered that this refers to the Provincial Congress of South Carolina and not to the Continental Congress, as frequently stated.

Many privateers adopted a device consisting of a mailed hand grasping a bundle of 13 arrows. The most famous flag used in the South at the beginning of the Revolution was one designed by Col. Moultrie, of South Carolina. It was a blue ensign with a white crescent in the upper corner near the staff. This was the flag which Sergt Jasper rescued so gallantly when the fort of palmetto logs on Sullivan's Island was attacked by the British on June 28, 1776. It was under this flag that the Declaration of Independence was read to the citizens of Charleston on August 5, 1776. The word "Liberty" was frequently inscribed upon it. When South Carolina officially adopted a State flag they took this famous blue banner with its white crescent, and in recognition of the services rendered by the palmetto logs, placed the figure of a palmetto tree in the center of the field.

While doubt exists as to whether a standard was carried at Concord and Lexington, it is asserted by some authorities that Capt. Nathaniel Page, a minute man of Bedford, Mass., was flag bearer of his company at Concord, and that his banner had a maroon ground, upon which were emblazoned in silver an armored, outstretched hand grasping a sword, with the inscription in a scroll of gold "Vince aut morire," signifying "Conquer or die." Three silver disks were also described upon it. It is claimed that this banner was originally designed in England in 1660 for the Three County Troop of Massachusetts and became the standard of the Bedford company of militia which responded to the midnight alarm of Paul Revere. [Applause.] I feel we can safely assume that it was this flag, "the most precious memorial of its kind of which we have any knowledge," that waved over the "embattled farmers" at Concord, April 19, 1775, when they "fired the shot heard round the world." [Applause.]

Many writers assert that it is doubtful whether the patriots at Bunker Hill were marshaled under any flag. Benson J. Lossing, however, in his Field Book of the Revolution, states that the standard raised on that fateful Saturday was the time-honored New England flag, with its field blue instead of red. In the upper quarter was St. George's cross and in the upper canton the design of a pine tree was shown. Mr. Botta, a Revolutionary historian, was evidently of the opinion that the pine-tree flag was carried, for in his account of the battle he states that Gen. Warren in endeavoring to rally his men reminded them of the motto inscribed on their banners, "An appeal to Heaven." Shortly after the Battle of Bunker Hill, Gen. Putnam unfurled at Cambridge a flag with a red ground, having on one side the Connecticut motto, "He who transplanted still sustains," and on the reverse side a pine tree with the motto, "An appeal to Heaven."

While the various forerunners of the American flag are inseparably associated with its history, they afford little or no clue to the origin of the Stars and Stripes. It has been conjectured that the idea of the stripes as a symbol of union may have been suggested by the flag of the Netherlands. As early as 1704 the flag used by the Honorable East India Co. of England, strangely enough, consisted of 13 red and white stripes with the cross of St. George in the canton. Another theory is that as the different grades in the ununiformed Continental Army were distinguished by stripes or ribbons, these distinguishing marks suggested the stripes in the flag. It has been frequently asserted, though without tangible evidence, that the stripes as well as the stars on his own coat of arms may have suggested the design to Washington.

The earliest instance of the use of the 13 stripes upon an American flag is found in the banner of the Philadelphia Light Horse Troop. This standard was presented to the company by Abram Markoe in 1775 and is known as the Markoe flag. It was made of yellow silk and both sides were alike. In the center was an armorial design, above which were the letters "L. H." and below the words, "For these we strive." The striking feature of this flag is the representation of 13 stripes, alternate blue and silver, placed in the upper corner next the staff. As Gen. Washington, when en route to take command of the Continental Army at Cambridge in 1775, was escorted from Philadelphia to New York by this troop, he was undoubtedly familiar with the standard it carried, and the significance of the stripes as indicative of the union between the Colonies, may have suggested the flag raised over his headquarters six months later. It is claimed that the Markoe banner was carried in the battles of Trenton, Princeton, Brandywine, and Germantown.

Reference should also be made to the two banners of the Tallmadge Dragoons, one pink and the other blue. The first has a pink field in the center of which is a blue disk with silver wings. From the disk 10 golden thunderbolts radiate like the sun's rays. Under this device is a silver scroll with the motto in black letters, "PATA CONCITA FULMNT NATL." The canton, bordered by a silver thread, has 6 stripes of white ribbon, making with the background 13 pink and white stripes. The blue standard has the same device and motto, and in addition, above the disk in a scroll of gold, the inscription, "2d Regt. Lt. Dragoons." The canton is edged with a gold line and has 7 gold stripes painted on the blue silk, which, with the background, gives the combination of 13 stripes, alternate blue and gold.

The origin of the first flag, distinctly colonial and representing a union of the Colonies, is shrouded in mystery. In October, 1775, the Continental Congress, then in session in Philadelphia, sent a committee to Cambridge to confer with Washington on military matters. It has been stated that this committee suggested the design for a flag, but there are no records to substantiate the assertion. Neither in Washington's correspondence nor in the report of the committee to Congress is there any reference to a new flag. Who designed the flag which Washington raised at Cambridge on January 2, 1776, is not known, but there and then was displayed the stripes emblematic of the union of the Colonies. The standard consisted of 13 red and white stripes, with the "union" or "king's colors" in the canton—the familiar combination of the crosses of St. George and St. Andrew. It was a peculiar flag, half American and half British, for while the Colonies still acknowledged their allegiance to England they were determined that their rights should be respected even at the point of the sword.

It was not until the Declaration of Independence, July 4, 1776, that a complete separation was decided upon, so the Cambridge flag with its 13 stripes represented the union of the Colonies in their protest against taxation without representation, while the union of crosses acknowledged their allegiance to the mother country. This flag was variously designated as the union flag, the grand union flag, and the grand striped flag, but is now referred to as the Cambridge flag, and it seems most probable that the banner officially adopted in 1777 was copied, at least so far as the stripes are concerned, from the flag Washington unfurled the year previous.

While having no bearing on the design of the Stars and Stripes, it may be of interest to note another flag, the Eutaw flag, to which is attached a sentimental story. Col. William Washington, a kinsman of Gen. Washington, in 1780 was ordered to Charleston, S. C., and while there fell in love with a Miss Elliot. Learning one day when the colonel was paying her a visit that his troop was without a flag, Miss Elliot, so it is related, with her scissors cut off a portion of a large damask curtain, which she afterward fringed and attached to a curtain pole and presented to him for a standard. This flag was carried in the Battle of the Cowpens and at Eutaw Springs and is now the property of the Washington Light Horse Infantry, of Charleston.

Another flag which has a romantic history is Pulaski's banner, now in the possession of the Maryland Historical Society. Count Pulaski, the son of a Polish nobleman, was a soldier of fortune who, at the age of 24, found himself outlawed and his estates confiscated. At the beginning of the Revolution he volunteered in the American Army and in 1778 was commissioned an officer in the cavalry force. Congress authorized him to raise what is known as Pulaski's Legion, and while recruiting his corps, the Moravian Single Sisters, of Bethlehem, Pa., presented him with a banner. It is of yellow silk, with the letters "U. S." in the center and in a circle around them the words, in Latin, "Union makes valor." On the reverse side, surrounding an eye, is the motto, also in Latin, "No other governs." This banner was carried in the Battle of Savannah, when Pulaski commanded both the American and French cavalry.

The flag of Proctor's brigade, of Westmoreland, Pa., should also be mentioned. It is a crimson flag, cantoned with the British union jack. In the center of the field a coiled rattlesnake with 13 rattles is represented, with the familiar words "Don't tread on me." It is claimed that this flag was carried in the Battle of Trenton. At the Battle of Long Island, August 27, 1776, the American patriots fought under a banner made of red damask on which was the word "Liberty."

The Second New Hampshire Regiment had a buff flag in the center of which was a golden disk with 13 rays surrounded by a chain of 13 links. The disk bore the motto, "We are one." In the canton were two crosses somewhat similar to the king's colors. Reference should also be made to a banner known as the "Flag of the Bucks of America," a yellow flag with a pine tree in the center. Beneath the branches of the tree stands a deer. The canton is blue, on which 13 yellow stars are painted. It is claimed that this flag was carried in the Revolution by a regiment of Massachusetts colored troops.

The first authoritative action to establish a flag for a new sovereignty is fraught with peculiar interest, and it is regrettable that we know so little as to the origin of the Stars and Stripes. While the Cambridge flag had the 13 stripes, there is no evidence that any flag bearing the union of stars had been in public use prior to the resolution of 1777, and it will probably never be known who designed or suggested this beautiful, distinctive, and emblematic feature of our banner. The records of Congress are silent upon the subject and no authentic reference to it has ever been discovered in the correspondence, papers, or diaries which have been examined. It is claimed in popular tradition that the honor of making the first flag combining the Stars and Stripes belongs to Betsy Ross, a Quaker upholsteress who resided in Arch Street, Philadelphia. It is asserted by her descendants that Congress appointed a committee composed of Gen. Washington, Robert Morris, and George Ross, the latter an uncle of Mrs. Ross's late husband, who called upon her in May or June, 1776, and commissioned her to make a flag from an imperfectly drawn design embodying the stripes and the union of 13 six-pointed stars.

As the six-pointed stars were peculiar to the British, it is said Mrs. Ross suggested that a star of five points would be more symmetrical and appropriate, and the committee at once adopted the new design. While this story is interesting and I hope may be well founded, there is unfortunately little evidence to support it. It rests on the traditions of the Ross family and upon affidavits made by Mrs. Ross's descendants as to their understanding of the particulars as related by Mrs. Ross herself, or by those to whom she told the story. Unfortunately the annals of Congress make no reference to the appointment of a flag committee, and yet so important a matter must have been under consideration previous to the final adoption of the flag. In Washington's correspondence and writings no mention is made of a visit to Mrs. Ross's house or when or by whom the first flag was made. Neither do any of the historians of the Revolutionary period or any contemporaneous writers, so far as I have been able to discover, throw light upon the subject. The principal argument against the story has been that the flag evidently was not used during any portion of 1776 and was not adopted until a year after Mrs. Ross is supposed to have made it. It is further claimed by those who discredit the story that Washington when he caused the Declaration of Independence to be read to his troops in New York, on July 10, 1776, would have raised this new flag had such a flag been in existence, instead of the Cambridge banner, which was unfurled. Those who have had experience in congressional matters will not be convinced by the argument of delay in not adopting the new flag at once, and had Mrs. Ross made the flag it is not probable that Washington or anyone else would have used it until Congress had approved it.

Whatever uncertainty may exist as to the true origin of the Stars and Stripes, we know that Congress, on June 14, 1777, adopted the following resolution:

Resolved, That the flag of the 13 United States be 13 stripes, alternate red and white; that the Union be 13 stars, white on a blue field, representing a new constellation.

This is the first legislative action of which there is any record establishing a national flag for the sovereign United States of America declared independent July 4, 1776, and proclaiming the official birth of a new constellation as the symbol of their Union. Thus was born the Stars and Stripes, which through all the ages shall be the emblem of liberty and justice for all mankind. [Applause.]

The following description has frequently been referred to as a quotation from Washington's writings but I have been unable to verify it.

We take the star from heaven, the red from the mother country, separating it by white stripes, thus showing that we have separated from her, and the white stripes shall go down to posterity representing liberty.

It has been said that—

Every nation has its symbolic ensign in their banners. Our fathers chose the Stars and Stripes, the red telling of the blood shed by them for their country, the blue of the heavens and their protection, and the stars of the separate States embodied in one nationality, E pluribus unum. The stars of the new flag represent a constellation of States rising in the west. The idea was taken from the constellation Lyra, which in the hands of Orpheus signified harmony. The blue of the field was taken from the edges of the Covenanter's banner in Scotland, significant also of the league and covenant of the United Colonies against oppression, incidentally involving the virtues of vigilance, perseverance, and justice. The stars were disposed in a circle, symbolizing the perpetuity of the Union, the ring like the circling serpent of the Egyptians signifying eternity.

What eloquence do the stars breathe when their full significance is known: A new constellation, union; perpetuity; a covenant against oppression; justice, equality, subordination, courage, and purity.

I doubt if these poetic and fanciful descriptions, however, have any basis other than the imagination of the writer.

While the flag was adopted June 14, 1777, it was not until September 3 following, that Congress officially promulgated the design. The honor of first displaying the Stars and Stripes in battle belongs to the State of New York, when on August 3, 1777, an improvised flag was raised on the northeast bastion of old Fort Stanwix, or Schuyler as it was sometimes called, the site of the present city of Rome. Anticipating an attack by the British, a garrison of some 500 soldiers, under the command of Col. Peter Gansevoort, jr., with Lieut. Col. Marinus Willet second in command, had been placed in the fort. On August 2, the garrison was reinforced by about 200 men of the Ninth Massachusetts Regiment, led by Lieut. Col. Mellon. This detachment brought news of the recently enacted flag statute, and as the garrison was without a standard the fort was ransacked for material of which to make the new flag. According to accounts, shirts were cut up to form the white stripes, a woman's petticoat supplied the red, while the blue ground for the stars was taken from a cloak belonging to Capt. Abraham Swartwort, of Dutchess County, who was then in the fort. This account is confirmed in part by a letter from Col. Swartwort to his commanding officer, asking for an order on the paymaster to reimburse him for the loss of his cloak. The narrative of Col. Willet, however, gives a somewhat different version of the story. He says:

The white stripes were cut out of ammunition shirts furnished by the soldiers, the blue out of the camlet cloak taken from the enemy at Peekskill, while the red stripes were made of different pieces of stuff procured from one and another of the expedition.

Howsoever the flag was made, it was the Stars and Stripes that floated over the brave Americans from August 3 to August 22, when the siege was raised. John Fiske, the eminent historian, further substantiates the claim that to New York belongs the honor of having first unfurled the Stars and Stripes in battle when he says, speaking of the flag:

Hastily extemporized out of a white shirt and an old blue jacket and some strips of red cloth from the petticoat of a soldier's wife, this was the first American flag with Stars and Stripes that was ever hoisted.

Lossing in his Field Book of the Revolution supports the claim of Fort Stanwix.

Delaware also claims the distinction, maintaining that the flag was first raised in battle at Cooch's bridge, near Wilmington, on September 3, 1777. The claim is based on the presumption that the American forces had a flag at that time, and even though they had, this skirmish took place a month after the flag on Fort Stanwix had been unfurled to the breeze. One of the local Delaware historians, Judge Conrad, defeats his own contention when he says:

On August 2, 1777, a short skirmish or sally occurred at Fort Schuyler, N. Y., in which the Americans floated a rudely devised flag, intended to represent the ideas embodied in the resolve of Congress, and that all historians agree that the flag floated on that occasion was merely an improvised one, and in no sense a complete and regular flag of the United States.

The absurdity of Mr. Conrad's theory is dismissed by Mr. Edward H. Hall, secretary of the American Scenic and Historical Preservation Society, who says:

Thus the 20 days' siege at Fort Schuyler, so courageously and successfully resisted, is dismissed by Mr. Conrad as a short skirmish or sally, and the fine distinction drawn between a heroic siege, with all its terrors of possible starvation and barbarous massacre, and a morning's skirmish at Cooch's bridge between two small bodies of troops formally drawn up in line of battle. I do not know of any historian who says that the Fort Schuyler flag was not "complete," although they do agree that it was improvised.

The Stars and Stripes were carried in the Battle of the Brandywine September 11, 1777; they waved in triumph over the victorious field of Saratoga and cheered the ragged patriots of Washington's army amid their sufferings around the camp fires at Valley Forge. Beneath its folds Cornwallis surrendered his sword at Yorktown, October 19, 1781. It floated over New York when the British evacuated the city November 25, 1783, and roused the patriotism of our soldiers during the later days of the Revolution, as the immortal Washington marched onward to victory and to glory. [Applause.]

Soon after its adoption the new flag was hoisted on the naval vessels of the United States. It has been stated that the Naval Committee of Congress presented to John Paul Jones the first official flag of the United States ever made, but there is no official record to confirm this statement. Buell, in his life of Paul Jones, states that the captain displayed the Stars and Stripes on the Ranger, then being fitted up at Portsmouth, on the 4th of July, 1777. The Ranger, however, did not go to sea until November 1. With Jones in command—his commission was issued on the same day the flag was established—the Ranger reached Quiberon Bay, France, about December 1, 1777, and on February 14, 1778, her flag received the first salute ever paid the American flag by a foreign power. No less an authority than John Adams has erroneously stated that the first American vessel to obtain a foreign salute for the flag was the Andreas Doria in the Danish West Indies in November, 1776. This ship, however, carried only a continental ensign, probably the Cambridge flag, which was never legalized or recognized by the Continental Congress, and was not the Stars and Stripes which the French commander saluted. The West Indies incident occurred eight months before the Stars and Stripes existed, for no stars were seen on any flag prior to the adoption of the flag of the United States by act of Congress in June, 1777. A question has been raised as to the exact date on which Jones raised the flag on the Ranger, some old reports of the incident stating that it was July 12.

In De Koven's Life and Letters of John Paul Jones, doubt is expressed about the claim made by Buell for Jones in connection with the raising of the flag on the Ranger in July, 1777. He says:

> But the honor of first unfurling the Stars and Stripes from a ship of war, which has been claimed for Jones, is not supported by historical evidence. If he had been lucky enough to have had the opportunity of first unfurling the new national banner from the Ranger, it is not to be believed that he would have omitted to mention the fact.

As there has been much controversy over the first display of the flag from a warship, it is of interest to note the several claims that have been advanced for this honor. In Griffin's History of Commodore Barry there is this reference to the flag:

> Under this flag Hopkins was the first to get to sea, and Barry's Lexington, bearing it, was the first to cause the British flag to surrender to the flag of Washington.

And again:

> His cruiser (the Lexington) was the first Union flag to make the first capture that was first reported to the Marine Committee of Congress.

John Fiske, in speaking of the Lexington's capture of the British vessel Edward on April 7, 1776, says:

> This was the first capture of a British warship by an American.

As this exploit occurred over a year before the Stars and Stripes were officially adopted, the flag borne by Barry was not the national ensign. The "Union" flag referred to by Griffin was undoubtedly the Cambridge standard, and other accounts bear out the assumption that Barry's flag on the Lexington was the flag which Washington unfurled at Cambridge. This is further confirmed by Preble in his history when he says:

> The Lexington was the first vessel that bore the Continental flag to victory on the ocean.

Capt. Manly's name has also been mentioned for the honor, and while it is true that his ship, the Lee, captured the British vessel Nancy in October or November, 1775, the flag that waved from the peak of the Lee was undoubtedly the famous "Pine Tree" emblem. One writer, however, speaks "of a flag being made in 1775 by a patriotic vessel owner of Massachusetts, having 13 white stars in a blue union, the body of the flag being white, with an anchor upon it having over the top the word 'Hope.' It was hoisted on the armed schooner Lee, Capt. John Manley." This same author states that "either this or the stars on the Washington book plate in the absence of any record may be taken as reasons for the adoption of the stars in the union." I have been unable to substantiate the claim made by this historian that the 13 stars were displayed previous to 1777, and as Rhode Island had already adopted the design of the anchor surmounted by the word "Hope," it is not probable that a shipowner of Massachusetts would have used, even in part, the emblem of a rival colony.

There seems to be substantial evidence that the flag carried by the First Rhode Island Regiment at the Battle of the Brandywine and during the siege of Yorktown was similar to the flag just described, with the exception that the stars were gold. John Paul Jones claimed that "My hand first hoisted the American flag," and this claim is substantiated by evidence which shows that during the winter of 1775–76, while the Alfred was lying at anchor at Philadelphia, Commander Hopkins put off to the newly commissioned ship. When he reached the deck of the Alfred, Jones, then a lieutenant, raised the flag in honor of the commander. But this American flag hoisted by Jones, and which the patriots of Philadelphia cheered on that wintry day, was probably none other than the rattlesnake flag designed by Col. Gadsden, and which was frequently used on ships of war. It was this flag, with the addition of a pine tree, which an English writer of the period referred to in the following words:

> A strange flag latterly appeared in our seas bearing a pine tree with the portraiture of a rattlesnake coiled up at its root, with the daring words, "Don't tread on me." We learned yesterday that the vessels bearing this flag have a sort of a commission from a society of people in Philadelphia calling themselves the Continental Congress.

The difficulty of identifying the first flag raised is largely due to the uncertainty of what the historians of that period meant when using the phrase "American flag." Some writers speak of the Cambridge banner, while others refer to the pine tree and rattlesnake emblems as the American flag. To make the designation clear and positive, the flag of the United States is the national ensign adopted June 14, 1777, and all flags used prior to this date were State, colonial, or continental emblems and not the Stars and Stripes. While there is a controversy regarding the initial display of the national flag from a war vessel, there seems to be no doubt but what Jones received the first salute ever given the Stars and Stripes by a foreign power.

No reference to the early history of the flag upon the seas would be complete without a brief allusion to the battle between the Bon Homme Richard and the Serapis in the evening of September 23, 1779. Thackeray once told a friend that the capture of the Serapis by Paul Jones was one of the most extraordinary stories ever recorded in naval history. Without question, that moonlight battle was the greatest exploit in the annals of the sea, and the courage of John Paul Jones and his brave crew, fighting to victory from the decks of a sinking ship, forms one of the most brilliant pages in our history. [Applause.] Americans will ever pay tribute to the sublime confidence and daring of Paul Jones. Bidding defiance to all human calculations which had predoomed him to defeat, with a foundering ship, half his men dead or dying, when hope and chance seemed irretrievably lost, he fought on and won immortal glory. [Applause.]

All great events seem to invite controversies, and it is so with reference to the flag borne by the Richard. In 1898 the Government received what was purported to be the original ensign of Jones's old ship. According to the story, which for a time had some support in the popular fancy, the Richard, several days before encountering the Serapis, captured a British vessel, the Kitty, which had formerly been an American ship. Among the crew was one Stafford, who volunteered for service on the Richard, and who, it is alleged, during the action with the Serapis plunged into the sea and recovered the Richard's flag which had been shot away. When Jones transferred his crew from his sinking ship, it is stated that this sailor rescued the flag and later accompanied Jones to the Alliance upon his assuming command of that vessel. When the Alliance was sold, the flag was presented to Stafford in recognition of his services. It is alleged that a letter was sent by Joseph Myler, Secretary pro tempore of the Marine Committee, to Joseph B. Stafford, presenting to him "Paul Jones's 'Starry Flag' of the Bon Homme Richard, which was transferred to the Alliance," in recognition of his meritorious services. Beyond this letter there is no positive evidence that this Stafford flag, which has only 12 stars, was the one that waved from the ensign gaff of the Richard in the most desperate of all sea conflicts. Those who doubt the authenticity of the Stafford flag claim that the bunting of which it is made is of a date subsequent to the battle with the Serapis.

Another story which has gained considerable vogue is to the effect that the flag of the Richard had been made by two maiden ladies of Philadelphia, who presented it to Capt. Jones shortly after Congress had adopted the Stars and Stripes. It is claimed that this flag which bore 13 stripes but only 12 stars was flown from the Ranger and was afterwards transferred to the Richard. There is no foundation whatever for this legend.

Buell, in his Life of Paul Jones, gives a rather fanciful account of this much-disputed flag:

> The "unconquered and unstricken" flag that went down with the Richard was the same one which the girls of Portsmouth made from slices of their best silk gowns, and presented to Jones to hoist on the Ranger, July 4, 1777, and he considered it his personal property or, perhaps, the property of the girls who made it, intrusted to his keeping. On relinquishing command of the Ranger in 1778, he kept this flag with him and used it on the Richard. It was made by a quilting party according to specifications which Jones furnished. The 13 white stars were cut from the bridal dress in which Helen Seary had been wedded in May, 1777.

This was the first edition of the Stars and Stripes that Europe ever saw; the first to be saluted by the guns of a European naval power; but, far beyond that, and beyond anything, it was the first and last flag that ever went down or ever will go down flying on the ship that conquered and captured the ship that sunk her.

[Applause.]

When Jones returned to this country in February, 1781, he found Miss Langdon, of the "quilting party," a guest of the Ross family, whose house was always his home in Philadelphia. By way of apology he explained to her that his most ardent desire had been to bring that flag home to America, with all its glories, and give it back untarnished into the fair hands that had given it to him nearly four years before. "But, Miss Mary," he said, "I couldn't bear to strip it from the poor old ship in her last agony, nor could I deny to my dead on her decks, who had given their lives to keep it flying, the glory of taking it with them."

"You did exactly right, Commodore," exclaimed Miss Langdon; "that flag is just where we all wish it to be—flying at the bottom of the sea over the only ship that ever sunk in victory!"

[Applause.]

I fear sentiment has been woven into history in this interesting story, for while the records are very complete in describing the battle, their reference to the colors are most meager. In Jones's memoirs, compiled from papers in the possession of his niece, Mrs. Taylor, there is a reference stating that few of the personal effects of the officers were saved. In the journal, prepared by Jones for the King of France, he speaks of everything going down with the ship except signal flags. As the national flag is never used as a signal in the sense in which Jones referred to the signal flags which were saved, Buell evidently assumed that the Stars and Stripes were left flying at the peak when the Richard sank beneath the waves.

In July, 1905, Scribner's Magazine published the "Narrative of John Kilby," quarter gunner of the Richard. In this narrative, written in 1810, the sinking of the Richard is described as follows:

O Heavens! It was enough to bring tears from the most unthinking man. She went down head foremost with all sails set—studding sails, top-gallant sails, royals, skyscrapers, and every sail that could be put on a ship—jack, pennant, and that beautiful ensign that she so gallantly wore while in action and when she conquered.

It has been asserted that Jones referred to the loss of the flag in his report of the engagement to Congress, but, unfortunately, the records do not disclose this fact. The several letters written by the great commander to numerous friends describing the battle are silent on the flag episode. Yet Mr. Buell states that Jones made a report in which he said:

No one was now left aboard the Richard but her dead. To them I gave the good old ship for their coffin, and in her they found a sublime sepulcher. She rolled heavily in the long swell; her gun deck, awash to the port sills, settled slowly by the head and sank peacefully in about 40 fathoms.

The ensign gaff, shot away in action, had been fished and put in place soon after firing ceased, and our torn and tattered flag was left flying when we abandoned her. As she plunged down by the head at the last, her taffrail momentarily rose in the air; so the very last vestige mortal eyes ever saw of the Bon Homme Richard was the defiant waving of her unconquered and unstricken flag as she went down. And, as I had given them the good old ship for their sepulcher, I now bequeathed to my immortal dead the flag they had so desperately defended for their winding sheet.

For the sake of history and in honor of the memory of the great sailor, let us hope that Buell based his eloquent and pathetic account of the sinking of the Bon Homme Richard upon substantial grounds. [Applause.]

The flag as originally adopted remained unchanged until May 1, 1795. By this time two more States, Vermont and Kentucky, had been admitted into the Union and a change in the flag was made necessary. Not foreseeing the growth of the flag in the addition of both a stripe and a star for each new State, Congress on January 13, 1794, enacted—

That from and after the 1st day of May, 1795, the flag of the United States be 15 stripes, alternate red and white; that the union be 15 stars, white in a blue field.

In the first flag the stars were evidently arranged in a circle, but this custom was soon abandoned. At Annapolis there is preserved the flag of the Third Maryland Regiment, with a union showing 12 stars in a circle, surrounding one in the center. In the flag of 15 stripes the stars were placed in three parallel rows of 5 stars each, and this flag was the national banner from 1795 to 1818, during which period occurred the War of 1812. It was this flag waving over Fort McHenry that inspired Francis Scott Key to write the Star-Spangled Banner. [Applause.]

By 1818 five additional States—Tennessee, Ohio, Louisiana, Indiana, and Mississippi—had been admitted into the Union and therefore to truly represent the Union a further change in the flag was demanded. After considerable discussion in Congress on the subject, the act of April 4, 1818, was passed, which provided:

First. That from and after the 4th of July next the flag of the United States be 13 horizontal stripes, alternate red and white; that the union have 20 stars, white in a blue field.

Second. That on the admission of every new State into the Union 1 star be added to the union of the flag and that such addition shall take effect on the 4th of July next succeeding such admission.

To Hon. Peter H. Wendover, a Member from New York, belongs the credit of pressing it to final passage. The return to the 13 stripes of the 1777 flag was due largely to the fact that it would not be practicable to continue adding a stripe for each new State, for a further increase in the number of stripes would have made the width of the flag disproportionate to its length, unless the stripes were narrowed, and this would have impaired its distinctness. Upon the suggestion of Capt. Reid, of the Navy, who had suggested the return to the 13 stripes, the stars were arranged in the form of one great star in the center of the union. This design, however, did not meet with favor, and the stars were soon thereafter arranged in rows. A newspaper of the times said:

By this regulation the 13 stripes will represent the number of States whose valor and resources originally effected American independence, and the additional stars will mark the increase of the United States since the establishment of the Constitution.

No act has since been passed by Congress altering the general design of the flag, and it is the same as originally adopted except for the increase in the number of stars in the union. In the War with Mexico the flag displayed 29 stars in its union; during the Civil War, 35; during the Spanish-American War, 45 stars, and since July 4, 1912, 48 stars. Congress has never legislated upon the arrangement of the stars in the union, and in consequence there has been a lack of uniformity in the matter, although the early confusion has now disappeared, and in the absence of direct legislation an agreement has been reached between the Navy and War Departments on the subject. The present arrangement of the stars is in six horizontal rows of eight stars each.

The term "Old Glory" was evidently first applied to the flag by William Driver in 1831, a skipper from Salem, Mass., who was at that time in command of the brig Charles Doggett. It is related that as he was about to sail for the South Seas a party of friends presented him with the flag, and when it was broken from the gaff the captain christened it "Old Glory." In 1837 the captain removed to Nashville, Tenn., taking with him Old Glory, which he afterwards displayed on all public occasions. His pronounced Union sentiments frequently led him into trouble with his southern neighbors, and during the war he was obliged to conceal the flag in the coverlet of his bed. In 1862 when a detachment of Buell's army occupied the city, Capt. Driver, with his own hands, hoisted Old Glory over the capitol building.

The history of the flag from this time seems clouded in uncertainty, and I will refer briefly to three statements that have been made in regard to it. The Rev. Henry N. Couden, Chaplain of the House, a veteran of the Sixth Ohio Volunteer Infantry, feels confident that the Old Glory flag no longer exists. The respect and veneration in which Dr. Couden is held by every Member of Congress entitles his contribution to the history of this famous flag, to be accepted as evidence that the flag was accidentally destroyed. He states that in February, 1862, his regiment had been ordered to relieve Grant at Donelson, but while on the transports word came that the fort had surrendered. They were then ordered to Nashville, where, on February 25, they took part in the ceremonies incident to the raising of the Stars and Stripes over the capitol. The next day Capt. Driver obtained Col. Anderson's permission to hoist Old Glory to the mast, and a squad of soldiers were detached to procure the flag, which the captain with his own hands raised over the building. The captain then presented the flag to the Sixth Ohio, and this regiment fought under Old Glory at Shiloh and Stone River. In keeping it aloft in the Battle of Stone River six men were shot down, but Old Glory was kept waving and did not touch the ground. For about a year Old Glory, the name having then been adopted by other regiments, was the regimental flag of the Sixth Ohio. For safe-keeping the flag after sunset each day was deposited in one of the quartermaster's wagons, but one night some of the animals having broken loose destroyed the flag. Dr. Couden's statement is amply verified, if any verification is necessary, by the following paragraph taken from Hannaford's History of the Sixth Ohio Regiment:

The flag with whose history so many interesting associations were connected was presented to the Sixth Ohio, by which it was regarded as a most precious souvenir. It passed safely through all the campaigns of the regiment, until October, 1863, when Fred Schnell's mules discovered it one night where it was stowed away in the headquarters' wagon, and before morning had eaten Old Glory up, leaving only a few shreds to tell the sacrilegious tale.

In order to make the record complete, I insert extracts from a letter sent me by the Essex Institute, of Salem, Mass., which claims it has in its possession the original flag. The secretary states that the original Old Glory was presented to the institute by a niece of Capt. Driver, who sent with the flag the following letter, written by the captain himself:

NASHVILLE, TENN., September 25, 1880.

MY DEAR NIECE: I send you this my oldest flag. It has been everywhere, my companion around the world, waved at Pitcairn, and among the icebergs of Cape Horn. This is my Old Glory, like me neglected and worn out, but there is no stain upon it. I kept it for my winding sheet, a sailor's whim, and now feeling like old Mordecai at the gate, I give it to you as a proof of the kindness and reward a patriot receives at the hand of a soon-to-be-broken-up Government.

The secretary of the institute then closes his letter with this statement:

The traditionary story in relation to the flag eaten by the mule has also come down to us, but is said to refer to another flag. Let me say this also in this connection, that a descendant of Capt. Driver, living in the far West, I think Nevada, also has a flag of Capt. Driver's, which she claims to be the original. But in view of the evidence of this letter, which came to us with our flag, there can be no doubt as to the facts in the case.

Both the above statements are refuted by Mrs. Mary Roland, of Nevada, a daughter of Capt. Driver, who, under date of August 15, 1913, stated that:

The original flag Old Glory has never been out of the possession of our family. This flag, my father named Old Glory, he gave me in July, 1873, and it has remained in my possession ever since.

Mrs. Roland claims that when her father, in 1880, asked her to send him Old Glory she sent him, without his knowledge, another flag, and that it was this substitute flag and not Old Glory which was deposited by his niece in the Essex Institute shortly after the captain's death.

While it would seem that the Stars and Stripes were carried in battle in many of the later campaigns of the Revolution, it is evident that the national ensign was not generally used by troops until the Mexican War. In reference to its use by regiments in the field, I quote from a statement made by the Smithsonian Institution:

It seems that for many years the Army did not carry the Stars and Stripes in battle, though it had been in general use as a garrison flag. The land forces, during this period and before, carried what was known as national colors or standards of blue, with the coat of arms of the United States, comprising an eagle surmounted by a number of stars, emblazoned thereon, with the designation of the body of troops. In 1834 War Department regulations gave the Artillery the right to carry the Stars and Stripes. The Infantry and Cavalry still used the national standards, which remained the colors of the Infantry until 1841 and of the Cavalry until 1887, when that branch of the Army was ordered to carry the Stars and Stripes. From its adoption in 1777, however, naval vessels universally displayed the national flag.

Mr. Gherardi Davis, in his monumental work, The Colors of the United States Army, says:

After the adoption by Congress in June, 1777, of the United States flag, the Stars and Stripes appear to have been very generally used at sea. But this flag does not seem to have been adopted generally by the Army.

Mr. R. C. Ballard Thruston, of Louisville, also states—that the flags or colors made by the War Department for the Army were in the hands of the field commissary stores but not distributed till March, 1783. The war was then over. So we now know that the entire Revolutionary War was fought through without the Army being furnished any flags by the Government. Those they did use were made by the ladies for some company, battallon, or officer.

Sergt. Schopper, in charge of the ordnance museum at West Point, is of the opinion that—

The Stars and Stripes were not commonly carried by troops during the Revolution; and in the few isolated cases where it is claimed that they were they were privately made and not issued by the Board of War.

The official correspondence of Gen. Washington shows that it was not until several years after the adoption of the Stars and Stripes that the War Board obtained material to make national colors for the Army "as variant from the marine flag."

While this evidence shows that the Government did not furnish the national ensign to troops in the field, it does not prove that the Stars and Stripes were not displayed, for it is evident that flags privately made were presented to different companies, which, while not official, were true representations of the national flag. It seems only reasonable to conclude that at many of the most important events in the closing years of the Revolution the Stars and Stripes cheered our troops to victory.

While we have but one flag for use on sea as well as land, by merchant ships and men-of-war alike, Congress very early in our history adopted a special flag for the Revenue-Cutter Service consisting of 16 perpendicular stripes, alternately red and white. The union is white, on which is depicted in blue the national coat of arms—the eagle surmounted by a half circle of 13 stars. The large number of stripes is accounted for by the fact that at the time the Revenue-Cutter Service was established, in 1797, there were 16 States in the Union, and the arrangement has never been altered. Under the act of January 28, 1915, the Life-Saving Service and the Revenue-Cutter Service were combined under the title United States Coast Guard and the revenue flag adopted as a distinguishing flag to be flown from the foretruck or pennant staff.

The union jack, commonly called the "jack," consists of the union of the national flag—a blue field with 48 white stars arranged in 6 parallel rows of 8 stars each. The Navy regulations specify that "when at anchor the union jack shall be flown from the jack staff from morning colors to evening colors." The jack is used also as a signal for a pilot and to denote the session of a court-martial. "When a diplomatic official of the United States of and above the rank of chargé d'affaires pays an official visit afloat, the union jack shall be carried on a staff at the bow."

In addition to these flags, there is a flag for the President and several of the departmental heads, as well as for special divisions of the Government service.

Mr. Speaker, while it does not pertain to the origin of the flag, it is of utmost importance in maintaining the flag in its exalted position that the great war loan now being financed be fully subscribed, and I am therefore going to urge upon every Member of Congress the necessity of subscribing for the liberty bonds. [Applause.]

In closing this fragmentary and, I fear, somewhat imperfect history of the flag, I want to quote from the late Mr. Justice Harlan of the Supreme Court:

To every true American the flag is the symbol of the Nation's power, the emblem of freedom in its truest, best sense. It is not extravagant to say that to all lovers of the country it signifies government resting on the consent of the governed, liberty regulated by law; the protection of the weak against the exercise of arbitrary power; and absolute safety for free institutions against foreign aggression.

In the words of Henry Ward Beecher:

A thoughtful mind, when it sees a nation's flag, sees not the flag only but the nation itself; and whatever may be its symbols, its insignia, he reads chiefly in the flag the government, the principles, the truth, the history, which belong to the nation that sets it forth. As at early dawn the stars stand first and then it grows light, and then as the sun advances that light breaks into banks and streaming lines of color, the glowing red and intense white striving together and ribbing the horizon with bars effulgent, so on the American flag, stars and beams of many-colored light shine out together. And wherever the flag comes and men behold it, they see in its sacred emblazonry no rampant lion and fierce eagle, but only light, and every fold significant of liberty.

Let us then twine each thread of the glorious tissue of our country's flag about our heartstrings; and looking upon our homes and catching the spirit that breathes upon us from the battle fields of our fathers, let us resolve, come weal or woe, we will, in life and in death, now and forever, stand by the Stars and Stripes. They have been unfurled from the snows of Canada to the plains of New Orleans, in the halls of the Montezumas and amid the solitude of every sea; and everywhere, as the luminous symbol of resistless and beneficent power, they have led the brave to victory and to glory. They have floated over our cradles; let it be our prayer and our struggle that they shall float over our graves.

[Applause.]

THE FLAG.

Stars of the early dawning, set in a field of blue;
Stripes of the sunrise splendor, crimson and white of hue;
Flag of our father's fathers born on the field of strife,
Phœnix of fiery battle risen from human life;
Given for God and freedom, sacred, indeed, the trust
Left by the countless thousands returned to the silent dust.

Flag of a mighty nation waving aloft unfurled;
Kissed by the sun of heaven, caressed by the winds o' the world;
Greater than kingly power, greater than all mankind;
Conceived in the need of the hour, inspired by the Master Mind;
Over the living children, over the laureled grave,
Streaming on high in the cloudless sky, banner our fathers gave.

Flag of a new-born era, token of every right
Wrung from a tyrant power, unawed by a tyrant's might;
Facing again the menace outflung from a foreign shore,
Meeting again the challenge as met in the years before;
Under thy spangled folds thy children await to give
All that they have or are that the flag they love shall live.

—Charles G. Crellin.

[Loud applause, the Members rising.]

At the conclusion of the address "in honor of the flag and in honor of the day which has been set apart for that purpose," the House adjourned.

ADDENDUM.

FLAG ETIQUETTE.

The flag circular issued by the War Department contains much valuable information:

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington.

Many inquiries concerning the proper method of displaying, hanging, and saluting the United States flag are being received in the War Department with the evident object of securing some authoritative statement relating to the subject.

In this connection it should be remarked that while it is within the province of the War Department to prescribe rules and regulations governing the matter in question for observance within the Army, yet it is beyond its province to prescribe any such rules or regulations for the guidance of civilians or to undertake to decide questions concerning the subject that are presented by civilians.

There is no Federal law now in force pertaining to the manner of displaying, hanging, or saluting the United States flag or prescribing any ceremonies that should be observed in connection therewith. In fact there are but two Federal laws on the statute books that have any bearing upon this subject, one the act of Congress approved February 20, 1905 (33 Stat. L., 725), providing that a trade-mark can not be registered which consists of or comprises inter alia, "the flag, coat of arms, or other insignia of the United States, or any simulation thereof," and the other the act of Congress approved February 8, 1917 (Public, No. 305, 64th Cong.), providing certain penalties for the desecration, mutilation, or improper use of the flag within the District of Columbia. Several States of the Union have enacted laws which have more or less bearing upon the general subject, and it seems probable that many counties and municipalities have also passed ordinances concerning the matter to govern action within their own jurisdiction.

Warning against desecration of the American flag by aliens has been issued by the Department of Justice, which has sent the following notice to Federal attorneys and marshals:

"Any alien enemy tearing down, mutilating, abusing, or desecrating the United States flag in any way will be regarded as a danger to the public peace or safety within the meaning of regulation 12 of the proclamation of the President issued April 6, 1917, and will be subject to summary arrest and punishment."

It is the practice in the Army, each day in the year, to hoist the flag briskly at sunrise, irrespective of the condition of the weather, and to lower it slowly and ceremoniously at sunset, indicating the commencement and cessation of the activities of the day, and to display it at half staff on Memorial Day (May 30) from sunrise until noon and at full staff from noon until sunset, and also on other days specially designated for that purpose by the proper authority, the flag always being first hoisted to the top of the staff before being lowered to the half-staff position.

There has been some question among civilians concerning the exact location of a flag hung at "half staff." Theoretically, the flag is always hung on a separate staff, much shorter than the staffs usually erected on buildings, and as a consequence a flag hung at half staff would be located much higher on the ordinary flag staff than under the present practice, but still the custom of placing the half-staffed flag in about the center of the flagpole, whatever its length may be, is rather generally observed throughout the country, and this department sees no real objection to this custom.

Considerable discussion has arisen throughout the country concerning the proper manner of hanging and displaying the flag for decorative purposes. As already stated, there is no Federal law governing the subject, and individual opinion differs as to the procedure that should or should not be followed. It has been suggested that as far as possible the hanging of the flag should be restricted to suspending it from a flagpole, in the regular way, and not to displaying it otherwise; that for purposes of decoration only the national colors should be arranged in the form of bunting and not used in the form of the flag; that if it is nevertheless the desire to use the flag for decorative purposes it should always be hung flat whether on the inside or the outside of buildings, with the union to the north or east, so that there will be a general uniformity in the position of the union of each flag displayed; that the flag should rarely be displayed in a horizontal position or laid flat; that under no circumstances should it be hung where it can easily be contaminated or soiled, or be draped over chairs or benches to be used for seating purposes, and that no object or emblem of any kind should be placed above or upon it. This department sees no objection to flying the flag at night on civilian property provided it is not so flown for advertising purposes.

It is becoming the practice throughout the country among civilians to display the national flag on all patriotic occasions, especially on the following days:

Lincoln's Birthday, February 12.
Washington's Birthday, February 22.
Mothers' Day, second Sunday in May.
Memorial Day, May 30.
Flag Day, June 14.
Independence Day, July 4.

In certain localities other special days are observed in the same manner.

It seems to be appropriate that where several flags or emblems are displayed on a pole or otherwise the United States flag should always be hoisted first and hung or displayed at the top; that in any parade the United States flag should always have the place of honor, and that the flag should never be hung or displayed with the union down, except as a signal of distress at sea.

Existing regulations governing the Army provide that when officers and enlisted men pass the national flag, not encased, they will render honors as follows: If in civilian dress and covered, they will uncover, holding the headdress opposite the left shoulder with the right hand; if uncovered, they will salute with the right-hand salute. A flag unfurled and hung in a room in which officers or enlisted men of the Army are present will be saluted by them the first time they may have occasion to pass it, but not thereafter. The hand salute is as follows:

"Raise the right hand smartly till the tip of the forefinger touches the lower part of the headdress above the right eye, thumb and fingers extended and joined, palm to left, forearm inclined to about 45°, hand and wrist straight; at the same time look toward the person saluted.

"Drop the arm smartly to the side."

No anthem, hymn, or musical air has been recognized by any Federal law as the national anthem, hymn, or air, but Army and Navy regulations provide that the musical composition familiarly known as the Star-Spangled Banner shall be designated as the national air of the United States of America. It should be stated, however, that these regulations are binding only upon the personnel of the military and naval service.

Whenever the national air is played at any place where persons belonging to the military or naval service are present, all officers and enlisted men not in formation are required to stand at attention, facing toward the music, excepting when the flag is being lowered at sunset, on which occasion they are required to face toward the flag. If in civilian dress and uncovered, they are required to stand and salute at the first note of the air, retaining the position of salute until the last note of the air is played. If in civilian dress and covered, they are required to stand and uncover at the first note of the air, holding the headdress opposite the left shoulder until the last note is played, excepting in inclement weather, when the headdress may be held slightly raised. The custom of rising and remaining standing and uncovered while the Star-Spangled Banner is being played is growing in favor among civilians.

Old or worn-out flags should not be used either for banners or for any secondary purpose. When a flag is in such a condition that it is no longer a fitting emblem for display, it should not be cast aside nor used in any way that might be viewed as disrespectful to the national colors, but should be destroyed as a whole, privately, preferably by burning or by some other method lacking in any suggestion of irreverence or disrespect due the emblem representing our country.

It should be borne in mind that the views set forth in this circular are merely suggestive, and that it is not the intention of the department to give them out as authoritative.

H. P. McCAIN,
The Adjutant General.

APRIL 14, 1917.

The following is taken from the Navy Regulations:

The national ensign on board a ship of the Navy at anchor shall be hoisted at 8 a. m. and kept flying until sunset. Whenever a ship comes to anchor or gets underway, if there is sufficient light for the ensign to be seen, it shall be hoisted, although earlier or later than the time specified. The national ensign shall be displayed on shore from 8 a. m. to sunset at every shore station under the jurisdiction of the Navy Department.

Whenever the national anthem is played on board a vessel of the Navy, at a naval station, or at any place where persons belonging to the naval service are present, all officers and enlisted men not in formation shall stand at attention facing toward the music (except at colors when they shall face the colors). If in uniform, covered or uncovered, or in civilian clothes, uncovered, they shall salute at the first note of the anthem, retaining the position of salute until the last note of the anthem. If not in uniform and covered, they shall uncover at the first note of the anthem, holding the headdress opposite the left shoulder and so remain until the last note of the anthem, except that in inclement weather the headdress may be slightly raised. The same marks of respect prescribed for observance during the playing of the national anthem of the United States shall be shown toward the national anthem of any other country when played on official occasions. The playing of the national anthem of the United States or of any other country as a part of a medley is prohibited.

The following ceremonies shall be observed at "colors" on board ships in commission; at morning "colors" the band shall play the national anthem, at the beginning of which the ensign shall be started up and hoisted smartly to the peak or truck. All officers and men shall face the ensign and stand at attention, and the guard of the day and sentries under arms shall come to the position of "present" while the national anthem is being played.

The same ceremonies shall be observed at sunset "colors," the ensign being started from the peak or truck at the beginning of the national anthem. (These ceremonies are omitted at sea.) At naval stations the same ceremonies shall be observed as closely as possible.

When at anchor in a foreign port, or when a foreign naval vessel is at anchor in an American port, the same honors shall be rendered at "colors" to the foreign ensign, the band playing the appropriate national foreign air immediately after the rendition of the national anthem.

In order to show proper respect for the flag the following ceremony should be observed:

At "morning and evening colors" civilian spectators should stand at "attention" and uncover during the playing of the "Star-Spangled Banner." * * * The flag should never be allowed to touch the ground, and should never be raised or lowered by any mechanical appliance.

When the national colors are passing on parade, or in review, the spectator should, if walking, halt, and if sitting, arise and stand at attention and uncover.

Whenever the "Star-Spangled Banner" is being played or sung all persons within hearing should rise and stand uncovered during its rendition.

When the National and State or other flags fly together the national flag should be on the right.

When the flag is flown at half staff as a sign of mourning, it should be hoisted to full staff at the conclusion of the funeral.

The national salute is 21 guns. It is also the salute to a national flag. The salute to the Union, commemorative of the Declaration of Independence and consisting of 1 gun for each State, is fired at noon on July 4 at every Army post provided with suitable artillery. (Army Regulations.) No flag or emblem of any kind should ever be displayed above the Stars and Stripes. In the Navy an exception is made when religious services are being held on board ship. At this time the church pennant is flown above the flag.

When flags are used in unveiling a statue or monument they should not be allowed to fall to the ground, but should be carried aloft to wave out, forming a distinctive feature during the remainder of the ceremony.

Advanced pupils: "I pledge allegiance to my flag and to the Republic for which it stands; one Nation, indivisible, with liberty and justice for all."

SIZE OF FLAGS.

By Executive order promulgated May 29, 1916, it was ordered that national flags and union jacks for all departments of the Government, with the exception that the colors carried by troops shall be the sizes prescribed for the military service, shall conform to the following proportions:

Hoist (width) of flag	1
Fly (length) of flag	1.9
Hoist (width) of union	7/13
Fly (length) of union	.76
Width of each stripe	1/13

NEW YORK AND THE FLAG.

New York may justly be proud of the part she has conspicuously played in the history of the flag The great Empire State, with her mighty commerce, her great agricultural interests, her business enterprises, her financial resources, and her maritime industries unequaled by any State in the Union, salutes her sister Commonwealths and pledges her allegiance to the flag which unites all the States—each one an empire and the whole the most magnificent and forward cluster of civil polities the world has ever seen.

In every crisis which has confronted the Nation, the sons of New York have responded nobly to the call of duty and of country. Both before and since the adoption of her State constitution, on April 20, 1777, stirring scenes have been enacted on her soil. In all the Indian wars New York, the home of the famous Iroquois, bore the brunt of those deadly conflicts. During the struggle for independence our State gave freely of her men and her treasure, and her records are replete with stirring incidents in the cause of liberty and freedom.

On August 3, 1777, the Stars and Stripes were raised over Fort Stanwix, and two months later, on October 17, they waved in triumph over Burgoyne when he surrendered his army at the decisive battle of Saratoga. On July 16, 1779, "Mad" Anthony Wayne captured Stony Point in one of the most brilliant victories of the war, and on November 25, 1783, the British evacuated New York and the noble Hudson again flowed unvexed to the sea.

At Poughkeepsie on July 26, 1788, the Federal Constitution was ratified. From 1784 to 1790 New York was the national capital, and here, on the 30th of April, 1789, on the balcony of Federal Hall, George Washington took the oath of office as the first President of the United States. In the War of 1812, owing to her proximity to Canada, New York bore her full share of the burden of the conflict and played a conspicuous part in the triumphs of the flag. When the call came in 1861 to preserve the Union, New York responded with all her splendid courage and determination, sending to the front 448,850 soldiers, a total which, by including the 18,197 who paid commutation, was swelled to 467,047, over one-sixth of the Union Army. To show her patriotism in providing men to uphold the supremacy of the Stars and Stripes, she expended in bounties the huge sum of $86,629,000. In the Spanish War her sons charged at San Juan and fought in the jungles of the far-away Philippines, and in the war against Germany the Empire State will send her full quota to the trenches of Europe; and wherever duty calls, whenever bravery and courage is demanded, whether it be charging across the deadly field of "no man's land" or in the air or under the sea, there you will find the men from the Empire State.

New York recognizes the importance of inculcating into the minds and the hearts of her children a noble veneration for the flag of the Nation and has enacted laws to foster their love and inspire their patriotism.

Our education laws provide that—

It shall be the duty of the school authorities of every public school in the several cities and school districts of the State to purchase a United States flag, flagstaff, and the necessary appliances therefor, and to display such flag upon or near the public-school building during school hours and at such other times as such school authorities may direct.

It shall be the duty of the commissioner of education to prepare, for the use of the public schools of the State, a program providing for a salute to the flag and such other patriotic exercises as may be deemed by him to be expedient under such regulations and instructions as may best meet the varied requirements of the different grades in such schools.

It shall also be his duty to make special provision for the observance in the public schools of Lincoln's birthday, Washington's birthday, Memorial Day, and Flag Day, and such other legal holidays of like character as may be hereafter designated by law when the legislature makes an appropriation therefor.

On March 15, 1917, we enacted a law making it a misdemeanor for any person to place any sort of an advertisement, word, figure, mark, or picture of any nature upon the flag of the United States, or to "publicly mutilate, deface, defile, or defy, trample upon or cast contempt upon" the national flag or any picture or representation of it.

The following history of the New York State flag has been compiled by Hon. James A. Holden, State historian, to whom I am indebted for its publication:

Up to 1896 there had been nothing placed in the statutory civil law, so far as I have been able to discover in the time at my disposal, relating to a State flag, either as to color or design. In fact, in the Laws of 1845, chapter 98, "An act for the erection of a flagstaff on the capitol," passed April 26 of that year, this flagstaff was to be erected "on the capitol for the purpose of displaying thereon the American flag during the daily sessions of the legislature, and on public occasions, and to procure a suitable flag for that purpose" (pp. 81–82). This would show that at that time New York had no State flag recognized as such.

However, in the "General regulations for the military forces of the State of New York" (Albany, 1858), issued by the adjutant general of the State as "General Order No. 30," I find in article 34, section 717, page 129, "the State flag is made of white bunting, 12 feet fly by 10 feet hoist, bearing in the center the arms of the State of New York." The regimental colors at that time were to be of yellow silk for the artillery and of blue silk for the infantry and rifle regiments, all bearing the arms of the State of New York.

At this time the standards of the mounted regiments likewise bore the arms of the State of New York, embroidered in silk on a blue ground (p. 130).

It should be borne in mind that there is a distinction made in military rules and regulations between the words "flags," "colors," and "standards," as follows: "By 'flag' is meant the emblem displayed from a flagstaff. By 'colors' are meant the National and State flags carried by foot troops. By 'standards' are meant the National and State flags carried by mounted troops."

In this connection we may note that one of the original sources from which the present coat of arms of the State of New York was derived was the flag borne by the Third New York Regiment, Col. Peter Gansevoort, jr., commanding, and was used by that regiment during the Revolutionary War. This flag is said to have been of "dark blue silk and about 7 feet square."

It is stated by the late H. A. Homes, the then State librarian, that "in 1871 the arms were painted on blue silk on regimental flags of 12 feet by 10, * * * but in 1873 upon the new flag of white bunting."

It is indicated that some time between the time of the Civil War and 1878 the State flag, at least so far as it was made a State flag by military usage, had been changed from white to blue, and then back again, inasmuch as I find that in the General Regulations for Military Forces of the State of New York for 1865, General Orders, No. 23, article 34, section 717, it is prescribed that "The State flag is made of white bunting, 12 feet fly by 10 feet hoist, bearing in the center the arms of the State of New York." The regimental colors and standards were to be of blue silk for infantry and rifle regiments and for mounted regiments and of yellow silk for the artillery.

The same language is used in the General Regulations for the Military Forces of the State of New York, for 1876, article 35, section 643, viz, "The State flag is made of white bunting, 12 feet fly by 10 feet hoist, bearing in the center the arms of the State of New York." State regimental standards and colors were all of blue, however, at this time.

The first attempt to establish a legal State flag that I have as yet discovered was made in 1896. At that time by chapter 229 of the laws of that year it was prescribed that "The State flag is hereby declared to be buff, charged with the arms of the State in the colors as described in the blazon of this section."

The State flag continued to be buff in color until 1901, when, at the suggestion and through the work and research of the then State historian, Hon. Hugh Hastings, legislation was secured, and by chapter 229 of the laws of 1901 the color of the State flag was changed from buff to blue, and it has remained blue to the present time.

In 1883, by chapter 349, laws of that year, a superintendent of buildings was authorized. Among the other duties imposed upon him was that of seeing that "During the hours when the legislature is in session the State flag having the arms of the State shall be displayed from the capitol, together with the flag of the United States."

The formality of displaying the State flag is also carried out whenever the board of regents of the University of the State of New York is in session, in the Education Building, the board being a coordinate branch of the State government.

On formal occasions, therefore, the State flag is always to be seen displayed from the official buildings here in Albany.

The Rights of the States.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, September 24, 1917.

The House having under consideration House Resolution 12, "amending the rules of the House of Representatives."

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, the growing tendency toward a centralized government in Washington arrests attention. When stated powers were conferred upon the National Government by the Constitution, the States reserved other powers to themselves. The right of the States to manage their domestic affairs was not questioned. It was the general purpose of the framers of the Constitution to confer upon the Federal Government such powers only as are necessary to enable it to maintain itself and to exercise control over transactions, affairs, and relations with foreign countries, of the States with each other, and between citizens of the different States. In general, our foreign affairs and the mutual relation of the States with each other are committed to the Federal Government, and all other affairs are withheld from it and reserved to the States or to the people.

The reason is that as to other nations we may act as a unit; that as to matters affecting our relations with each other, the common government of all should control; and that the regulations of the civil rights of the people and the making of police regulations should be in the hands of that government which is closer home, closer to the people, more directly under their supervision, inspection, and control.

The diversified habits, customs, conditions, resources, industries, and interests of the people of the several States made it apparent that the people of each State could best govern themselves, for the simple reason that, being better acquainted with their own situations, they know best what should be done.

President Jefferson said:

It is not by the consolidation or centralization of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected. Were not this great country already divided into States, that division must be made that each might do for itself what concerns itself directly and what it can so much better do than a distant authority.

When all government, domestic and foreign, in little as in great things, shall be drawn to Washington as the center of all power, it will render powerless the checks provided of one government on another, and will become as venal and oppressive as the government from which we separated.

I was in Europe when the Constitution was planned, and never saw it until after it was established. On receiving it I wrote to Mr. Madison, urging the want of provisions for the freedom of religions, freedom of the press, trial by jury, habeas corpus, a substitution of militia for a standing army, and an express reservation to the State of all rights not specifically granted to the Union.

He accordingly moved, in the first session of Congress, for these amendments, which were agreed to and ratified.

I wish to preserve (in a new constitution for Virginia) the line drawn by the Federal Constitution between the general and particular governments as it stands at present, and to take every prudent means of preventing either from stepping over it.

It was on this very subject that differences caused the first division of our people into political parties. There may be some who believe the division of powers between the State and the Federal Governments and the limitations upon the powers of the latter were destroyed by the War between the States; but they are in error. The war was not fought for the destruction of the rights of the States but for the preservation of the Union; and while war measures were taken which resulted in depriving the States of their right to determine some questions over which dissensions had arisen resulting in the war, and while the right of States to secede was denied by the arbitrament of arms, the other reserved rights of the States and limitations upon the powers of the Federal Government were saved.

If the taking over of State functions by the National Government is permitted to continue, then we will be compelled to proclaim openly that we repudiate the principles adopted by the founders of our Government, and that we favor the encroachment of the Federal Government upon the rights of the State.

In Connecticut each county manages its own affairs; each county is divided into townships, boroughs, and cities, each taking care of what lies within its local bounds. Then there are school districts, fire districts, and wards. We have been taught that it is not by the consolidation of powers, but by their distribution, that good government is effected; that each State might do for itself what concerns itself directly; and what it can so much better do than a distant authority. That it is by this partition of cares, descending in gradation from general to particular, that the mass of human affairs may be managed for the good and prosperity of all.

I am opposed to the pending resolution.

Freedom of Speech and of the Press.

HON. WILLIAM GORDON,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

May 31, 1917.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 291) to punish acts of interference with the foreign relations, the neutrality, and the foreign commerce of the United States, to punish espionage, and better to enforce the criminal laws of the United States, and for other purposes.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, the present crisis in the life of this Nation demands not only the physical support of its citizens of military age by enlistment in the Army and Navy, but a united effort by all citizens to coordinate and utilize the mental, moral, and physical resources of the country to defeat the enemy and vindicate the sovereignty of the Nation. It is not necessary, however, to abrogate the constitutional rights of our own citizens under the pretense of defending the country against Prussianism; that is not national defense but national suicide.

In his great speech before the Supreme Court of the United States in Milligan's case, Jeremiah S. Black, in pressing upon the court the constitutional rights of his client, who had been sentenced to be hung by a military commission, although having no connection with the Army or Navy, said:

"It is precisely in time of war and civil commotion that we should double the guards upon the Constitution. If the sanitary regulations which defend the health of a city are ever to be relaxed, it ought certainly not to be done when pestilence is abroad.

"When the Mississippi shrinks within its natural channel and creeps lazily along the bottom the inhabitants of the adjoining shore have no need of a dike to save them from inundation, but when the booming flood comes down from above and swells into a volume which rises high above the plain on either side, then a crevasse in the levee becomes a most serious thing. So in peaceable and quiet times our legal rights are in little danger of being overborne, but when the wave of arbitrary power lashes itself into violence and rage and goes surging up against the barriers which were made to confine it, then we need the whole strength of an unbroken Constitution to save us from destruction."

The Supreme Court of the United States, in the most momentous and epoch-making decision in the history of this Nation, followed the reasoning and argument of Judge Black and discharged the prisoner, thereby putting an end to the reign of terror which had prevailed in this Capital and in the Northern States during almost the whole period of the Civil War.

In that great case reported in volume 71, page 120, United States Supreme Court Reports, the court said:

"The Constitution of the United States is a law for rulers and people, equally in war and in peace, and covers with the shield of its protection all classes of men at all times and under all circumstances. No doctrine involving more pernicious consequences was ever invented by the wit of man than that any of its provisions can be suspended during any of the great exigencies of government. Such a doctrine leads directly to anarchy or despotism, but the theory of necessity on which it is based is false, for the Government, within the Constitution, has all the powers granted to it which are necessary to preserve its existence, as has been happily proved by the result of the great effort to throw off its just authority."

Where do you get any authority for abridging the freedom of the press or the right of free speech? This conference report provides that certain things may be published whenever the President shall by proclamation choose to permit you to do so. We do not have to go to the President to get permission to publish our views. If any man communicates any information that is of advantage to the enemy for military purposes and is of disadvantage to this Nation in time of war, he can be punished under existing laws of the United States and other provisions of this bill for giving aid and comfort to the enemy.

This covers that proposition fully. The Constitution simply says thou shalt not pass any law abridging the freedom of speech or of the press. It does not say that you may enact legislation that may be satisfactory to this branch of the Government or the other branch of the Government, or even to the Congress itself. This inhibition was placed in the Constitution to protect the people against Congress as well as against every other branch of the Government, and all branches combined.

Mr. WEBB. Mr. Speaker, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. GORDON. Yes.

Mr. WEBB. Did not the gentleman vote for the Gard amendment?

Mr. GORDON. Yes, I did; and I have grave doubts about the correctness of that vote, I will say to the gentleman. I have studied this question somewhat since I cast that vote. I voted for the motion to strike out the original proposition which was reported here by the committee because I believed it was infamous. It provided that—

"During any national emergency resulting from a war to which the United States is a party, or from threat of such a war, the President may by proclamation declare the existence of such emergency and by proclamation prohibit the publishing or communicating of, or the attempting to publish or communicate, any information relating to the national defense which, in his judgment, is of such character that it is or might be useful to the enemy. Whoever violates such prohibition shall be punished by a fine of not more than $10,000 or by imprisonment for not more than 10 years, or both: Provided, That nothing in this section shall be construed to limit or restrict any discussion, comment, or criticism of the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, or the publication of the same."

The Gard amendment was reported out hurriedly to fill up the gap in the bill caused by striking out the original section, and it was not given consideration by the committee. I got a copy of it and studied it for a few minutes and then voted for it, but I have grave doubts about whether Congress had any power even to pass that—and that was much less objectionable than this, I will say to the gentleman. [Applause.]

By the new proviso at the end of this section 4 of Title I we are granted the gracious permission to discuss, comment on, and criticize the acts or policies of the Government or its representatives, and to publish such comments and criticisms "if such discussion, comment, and criticism does not disclose information with respect to the movement, number, description, or disposition of men in the Army or Navy." How can helpful discussion or criticism be indulged in without disclosing informaton relative to the subject discussed?

The way to prevent military information reaching the enemy is to refuse to disclose such information to the newspapers or anyone else outside of the Military Establishment.

If we have to go to the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy and first obtain a license in order to exercise the rights which the framers of our Constitution undertook to guarantee by providing a prohibition against interference with those rights, then I think we are coming upon evil days in this land of the free.

It was less than 200 years ago that men were imprisoned in England for printing and publishing anything, upon any subject, without the permission of the Government censors. The general publication of parliamentary debates has only been permitted in England since the American Revolution, and men in the American Colonies were imprisoned for publishing the laws enacted by colonial legislatures, and publications which presumed to criticize the official acts of those in authority were publicly burned by the official hangman.

Free schools and printing presses were denounced by some of the colonial governors as breeders of disobedience, heresy, and sects, and were officially prohibited and proscribed. Freedom of the press, which Congress is prohibited from abridging, means freedom to print and publish without first obtaining permission from any Government official, but authorizes no immunity for publications which are harmful in character when tested by such standards as the law affords.

Thomas Jefferson in his voluminous writings in support of freedom of religion, of speech, and of the press had prepared the American people for the first amendment to the Federal Constitution before its adoption.

In his letter to James Currie, 1786, he said:

"Our liberty depends on the freedom of the press, and that can not be limited without being lost."

To Elbridge Gerry, 1789, he said:

"I am for freedom of the press, and against all violations of the Constitution to silence by force and not by reason the complaints or criticisms, just or unjust, of our citizens against the conduct of their agents."

To David Humphreys, 1789, he said:

"There are rights which it is useless to surrender to the Government, and which Governments have yet always been found to invade. Among these are the rights of thinking and publishing our thoughts by speaking or writing."

To President Washington, 1792, he said:

"No Government ought to be without censors, and where the press is free none ever will."

To Benjamin Waring, 1801, he said:

"Differences of opinion, when permitted to purify themselves by free discussion, are but as clouds overspreading our land transiently, and leaving our horizon more bright and serene."

Replying to address in 1808, he said:

"The liberty of speaking and writing guards our other liberties."

To Marquis de Lafayette, 1823, he said:

"The only security for all is in a free press. The force of public opinion can not be resisted when permitted freely to be expressed. The agitation it produces must be submitted to. It is necessary to keep the waters pure."

In arguing against a bill of rights as a part of our Federal Constitution Alexander Hamilton insisted that no power was conferred in that instrument to limit such fundamental rights as free speech, a free press, and freedom of religion, and that to attempt to so protect them might even be dangerous. He said:

"For why declare that things shall not be done, which there is no power to do? Why, for instance, shall it be said that the liberty of the press shall not be restrained, when no power is given by which restrictions may be imposed? I will not contend that such a provision would confer a regulating power; but it is evident that it would furnish to men disposed to usurp, a plausible pretense for claiming that power. They might urge, with a semblance of reason, that the Constitution ought not to be charged with the absurdity of providing against the abuse of an authority which was not given, and that the provision against restraining the liberty of the press afforded a clear implication that a right to prescribe proper regulations concerning it was intended to be vested in the National Government. This may serve as a specimen of the numerous handles which would be given to the doctrine of constructive powers by the indulgence of an injudicious zeal for bills of right."

It was argued that bills of rights, however important under a monarchial government, were not necessary under a free and limited constitution, such as ours, under which public affairs were to be managed by means of agencies selected by popular choice, and subject to frequent changes by popular election.

Reasoning like this was plausible, but unsatisfactory to many of the liberty-loving statesmen of that day; it was answered by Thomas Jefferson, who said:

"In a constitutive act, which leaves some precious articles unnoticed and raises implications against others, a declaration of rights becomes necessary by way of supplement. This is the case of our new Federal Constitution. This instrument forms us into one State as to certain objects, and gives us a legislative and executive body for these objects. It should therefore guard us against their abuses of power, within the field submitted to them.

"The inconvenience of the want of a declaration of rights are permanent, afflictive, and irreparable. They are in constant progression from bad to worse. The executive in our governments is not the sole, it is scarcely the principal, object of my jealousy. The tyranny of the legislatures is the most formidable dread at present, and will be for many years. That of the executive will come in its turn; but it will be at a remote period."

Jefferson's views finally prevailed, and the first 10 golden amendments to the Constitution were adopted as a part of that instrument, the first of which prohibits the adoption of the censorship provision reported by the conferees, and reads as follows:

"Congress shall make no law respecting an establishment of religion, or prohibiting the free exercise thereof; or abridging the freedom of speech, or of the press; or the right of the people peaceably to assemble, and to petition the Government for a redress of grievances."

Mr. Justice Story in his Commentaries on the Constitution, published in 1833, says:

"Whether the National Government possesses a power to pass any law not restraining the liberty of the press but punishing the licentiousness of the press is a question of a very different nature, upon which the commentator abstains from expressing any opinion."

Libels upon the Government have never been known to the laws of this country, and the claim that public officials could by law be exempted from criticism has never been officially asserted by the Government of the United States but once, and that was by the sedition law enacted in 1798, by the terms of which it was, among other things, in substance and effect, made a crime punishable by fine and imprisonment to write, print, paint, stamp, cut, carve, mark, or engrave, utter or publish, or cause the same to be done, any false, scandalous, and malicious writing or writings against the Government of the United States, or either House of Congress, or of the President, with intent to defame them, or bring them into contempt or disrepute, or to excite against them the hatred of the good people of the United States, or to incite them to oppose any law or act of the President, in pursuance of the law, or his constitutional powers, or to resist, oppose, or defeat the law.

Jefferson and his followers denounced this law as unconstitutional and void, and opposition to it was an important factor in defeating the Federalist Party, which enacted it, in the first election of Jefferson to the office of President. The act expired before Jefferson was inaugurated, but on assuming office he at once pardoned all persons who were then in prison as a result of conviction under the act, and the history of that legislation is concisely stated by Judge Thomas M. Cooley in his great work, Constitutional Limitations, at page 613, seventh edition:

"It is certain that no prosecutions could now be maintained in the United States courts for libels on the General Government, since those courts have no common-law jurisdiction, and there is now no statute, and never was, except during the brief existence of the sedition law, which assumed to confer any such power.

"The sedition law was passed during the administration of the elder Adams, when the fabric of government was still new and untried, and many men seemed to think that the breath of heated party discussions might tumble it about their heads. Its constitutionality was always disputed by a large party, and its impolicy was beyond question. It had a direct tendency to produce the very state of things it sought to repress; the prosecutions under it were instrumental, among other things, in the final overthrow and destruction of the party by which it was adopted; and it is impossible to conceive at the present time of any such state of things as would be likely to bring about its reenactment or the passage of any similar repressive statute."

It seems to me that you are undertaking to legislate on a proposition that you have no right to legislate upon—no right whatever. [Applause.]

HON. CHARLES H. RANDALL,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, when the food-control bill was before the House for consideration, a section was adopted by a substantial majority, reading as follows:

No person shall use any foods, food materials, or feeds in the production of alcohol or of alcoholic beverages, except for governmental, industrial, scientific, medicinal, or sacramental purposes.

This was notice, Mr. Speaker, that distillers and brewers look alike to the Members of this House. It was a denial of a separate peace for beer.

What has the conference committee given us? Absolute immunity for beer and wine.

The brewers used 3,556,103,596 pounds of foodstuffs in 1916.

The distillers used 1,888,804,874 pounds of foodstuffs in 1916 for alcoholic beverages. Distillers used an equivalent amount for denaturation, Government and scientific purposes, or export as alcohol.

I am willing to delay this bill a few days to save the vast amount of foodstuffs used by the brewers as well as that used by the distillers.

Why did the conferees annul the action of this House? They claim the Senate would not accept the House provision.

This can not be true.

The Senate as late as day before yesterday voted on the specific proposal to except beer and wine from the pending national constitutional amendment. The senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] first proposed to exempt beer and wine. His amendment was defeated without a roll call.

Later the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] proposed to exempt beer and wine, and that was defeated by a record vote, 57 to 22. Still later the senior Senator from California again tried out the proposition which our conferees have given us in this bill, and it was defeated, 55 to 26, in the Senate.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I make the point of order that the gentleman from California is referring to proceedings held in another branch of Congress and mentioning the names of Members of that branch. I understand the rules of the House provide that that is not permissible.

The SPEAKER. The point of order is sustained.

Mr. RANDALL. Mr. Speaker, I think I referred to the senior Senator from Nevada [Mr. NEWLANDS] and the senior Senator from California [Mr. PHELAN] without any reflection upon either, or upon the Senate. I am simply quoting from the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD as to what occurred.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Mr. Speaker, I venture to submit to the Chair that it is an important ruling, and, as I understand the rule of the House, it is only to prevent reference that might in any way occasion controversy or that might in any way reflect upon those to whom reference is made.

The SPEAKER. That undoubtedly is the purpose of the rule.

Mr. GARRETT of Tennessee. Perhaps the Chair was not observing the reference that the gentleman from California made. It in no way reflected on the Senators; it was simply a reference to an official public record which in no way reflected upon the Senators named. I respectfully submit that that is not subject to a point of order and that that does not come within the rule. To hold that it does might present rather a dangerous precedent at some time when there was a desire to refer to them in a respectful way.

Mr. WALSH. Mr. Speaker, I withdraw the point of order.

The SPEAKER. The Chair will say that he did not hear what the gentleman from California said. The gentleman from Tennessee has stated the rule correctly—that it is intended to cut out any reference which would reflect upon Senators, or vice versa, in making such remarks as might lead to controversy. As far as using them to refer to public records is concerned, that is absolutely legitimate.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Will the gentleman from California yield for a question?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. GALLAGHER. Is it not a fact that there is an entirely different kind of grain used in the manufacture of beer than is used in the distillation of liquors?

Mr. RANDALL. That is undoubtedly true.

Mr. BURNETT. But it is all foodstuffs.

Mr. RANDALL. Yes. I want to say that the figures I have quoted here are from the official figures of the Agricultural Department.

Mr. CARY. Will the gentleman yield?

Mr. RANDALL. Yes.

Mr. CARY. Does not the Census or the Agricultural Department state the amount of foodstuffs that are returned by the brewers for food consumption?

Mr. RANDALL. Undoubtedly. I have quoted the figures on foodstuffs.

Mr. CARY. But the gentleman has not given the net amount returned?

Mr. RANDALL. Oh, yes; I am giving the official figures of the Agricultural Department. The gentleman from Milwaukee refers to brewery slops and other refuse which make some small return as hog and cattle feed. This is a mighty poor compensation for the destruction of three and a half billion pounds annually of human foodstuffs or their equivalent.

A SEPARATE PEACE WITH BEER.

Mr. Speaker, the conference committee proposes a separate peace with beer. The bill as it is returned does not in any way molest the manufacture or sale of either wine or beer. It asks the Congress to play the coward and dodge the question. We are sent here, gentlemen, to consider the needs of the Nation and legislate. We are not fulfilling the demands of the people upon us if we act on the theory that we are sent here to pass appropriations, draw our salaries, and pass all responsibility on to the President. It may be admitted that he has shown a willingness, possibly a little more than a willingness, to assume all authority and responsibility. I am sure that such acts as are proposed in this bill may well make him and the people doubt whether as a Congress we have the brains and bravery to face any actual issues.

HARMLESS BEER.

A hundred years ago people believed that beer was harmless, relatively. The good ladies and gentlemen of the temperance societies took a keg along to open the meeting with, as we to-day would have frappe or lemonade. Employers furnished it, at their own cost, to their workmen. But there are few these days who, either through ignorance or for hire, will deny that the worst and most dangerous alcoholic enemy is beer. There are occasional exceptions, but they are so rare as to be singular, and for the most part their habitat seems to be editorial.

On the other hand, the testimony of men of the highest authority, who but a few years ago shared the then popular view that alcohol taken in more diluted forms was relatively innocent, is singularly unanimous in support of the position that the milder drinks are the more dangerous. It is the alcohol that does the chief damage. A 12-ounce glass of 4 per cent beer, such as is commonly served, contains as much alcohol as an ounce of Government proof whisky. Recently a St. Louis saloon keeper advertised a 40-ounce drink of beer, in which, at 4 per cent, there would be over an ounce and a half of absolute alcohol. In addition to this, the hops which is used in making beer is very closely related to Indian hemp, from which is made the poisonous narcotic "hashish." It is said—see Webster's Dictionary—that we get our word "assassin," from this word, because in the Orient a Mohammedan sect practiced gruesome murders when under its influence. Prof. Reinitzer, of the Polytechnic, of Graz, Austria, says:

In the female blossom of the Indian plant, as in the female blossom of the hops, we find glands holding a narcotic, bitter-tasting, sticky substance which forms the active element in hashish, from Indian hemp. This is used by the various Mohammedan people of South and West Africa, as opium elsewhere, for narcotic purposes.

To this narcotic from the hops added to the poison of the alcohol Prof. Reinitzer attributes the peculiar brutalizing influence of beer, which marks the "beer Philistine." "Such an expression as 'wine Philistine' or 'whisky Philistine' is inconceivable," says Prof. Reinitzer. He continues:

Beer drinking has apparently a special action on the nervous system which leads to the clumsy, provincial heaviness of mind one can observe most strikingly in the beer drinker. Also the hops contributes to the pathological, burning thirst of the beer drinker and to the injurious effects on the kidneys.

SCIENTIFIC CHARACTER OF TESTIMONY.

Whether Prof. Reinitzer is correct in attributing the peculiarly injurious effects of beer to the combination of hops and alcoholic poison, there seems to be an undeniable unanimity of scientific investigators in support of the opinion that beer is the worst of all forms of alcohol.

Prof. G. von Bunge, of Basel, Switzerland, said (May, 1907):

Of all alcoholic drinks beer is the most harmful, because no other lends itself so readily to dulling the sense of tedium. Beer is the most harmful because it is the most seductive. * * * There is no drink to which one becomes accustomed so quickly. * * * No other leads to so much intemperance.

Dr. A. Forel, in De Alkoholfrage, 1904, says:

The fermented drinks—beer, wine, cider—are scarcely less dangerous; in fact, they are even worse than whisky, because they are looked upon as more proper, and are therefore more seductive. Larger quantities are used, and the final effect, the social alcoholizing, is the same, because they both contain ethyl alcohol.

Dr. Max Gruber, professor of hygiene, University of Munich, Germany, exclaims:

Where is the man who dares deny that alcoholic drinks cause the most serious damage to health and life; that beer, especially, diminishes the intellectual capacity and the will power of millions of men, destroys prematurely the physical poise, and makes the man a repugnant caricature?

Dr. Hugo Hoppe, the famous nerve specialist, of Koenigsberg, Germany, points out the result of extolling light drinks, and especially beer, as an enemy of whisky. He says:

The result of extolling beer as the mightiest enemy of whisky and brandy has been that the consumption of the distilled liquors has changed very little, while to these liquors has been added beer, the use of which has led to a great and still increasing beer alcoholism. The brutalizing effect of beer alcoholism is shown most clearly by the fact that in Germany crimes of personal violence, particularly dangerous bodily injuries, occur most frequently in Bavaria, where there is the highest consumption of beer.

Prof. Holder, of Landshut, Bavaria, supports this sentiment. Speaking before the Catholic Temperance Society of Germany, in 1910, he said:

The average number of sentences (for crime) passed per 100,000 inhabitants for the empire is 239; but for the heavy-drinking Provinces, Nirderbayern 565, and for Rhenish Palatinate 633, and the imperial office declares that these excessive numbers are due to the cheap beer and wine.

Dr. Charles Gilbert Davis, of Chicago, lays upon beer the chief responsibility for alcoholic diseases, charging that it is worse than all other alcohols combined. In part, he says:

It is my professional opinion, after observation of many years in the practice of medicine, that beer is doing more harm to humanity than all other alcoholics.

Beer produces disease of the stomach, kidneys, heart, and blood vessels. Owing to the diuretic effect of the hops, the alcohol in the beer is diverted toward the kidneys, which probably accounts for its destructive action on these organs. It causes a deposit of morbid fat in the body, especially around the heart, enlarges that organ, and increases the work of the heart and blood vessels, manifested by the fatigue and shortness of breath of all beer drinkers.

A man can not use beer daily for any great length of time and not manifest some physiological deficiency.

Prof. Stengel, in his great work, a translation from Jugensen, of Tubingen & Schrotter, of Vienna, draws attention to what he calls the "beer heart." He says, "Bavaria, especially Munich, is its home par excellence, and the people in that country in every class of society fall victims to this class of heart disease."

Beer deposits fat around the heart, weakens the muscular walls, thickens and enlarges the ventricles, and, if continued, ultimately cuts short the life of the individual.

All of this has been proven time and again by the post mortems of Bollinger, who has examined and weighed the hearts of many beer drinkers. This is a terrible scientific arraignment of beer, but it is the truth, and truth is the voice of God.

Dr. von Streumpell, a physiologist of high standing in Germany, has reached the conclusion that beer is as bad, if not worse, than other liquors. He says:

Formerly whisky and brandy were the universal evildoers, the only despised drinks as against "noble" wine and "harmless" beer. At present we know that in practice the injurious effects of beer are at least as frequent, if not, indeed, more frequent, than those of distilled liquor.

Other eminent European scientists and doctors speak as follows:

Prof. Emil Kraepelin:

In the production of alcoholism in Germany beer undoubtedly plays the chief rôle. It must be conceded that beer is capable of producing typical delirium tremens.

Prof. Gustav von Bunge:

No other drink (referring to beer) is so insidious. It has been in Germany worse than the whisky pest, because more apt to lead to immoderate drinking.

Prof. Mobius, Leipsig:

I know little of whisky and wine drinkers. With us it is beer that ruins the people.

Dr. Johannes Leonhart, a distinguished scientist:

The question concerning alcohol is not whether Smith or Jones believes that he can take two or three glasses a day without harm, but how is it possible to diminish the immense amount of injury from it that the whole German people suffer.

It was a beer and wine quantity of alcohol (equivalent to two to three glasses of 4 per cent beer or a half pint of 10 per cent wine) that Kraepelin found impaired the perception and attention needed by lookouts, signalmen, sentries, engineers, automobile drivers, machinists, and others in military and civil work.

It was beer and wine quantities of alcohol (equivalent to one to four glasses of beer or one-fifth to four-fifths of a pint of wine) that Joss found decreased in adult students the power of attention, concentration, mental keenness 4.9 per cent the first hour, 10.9 per cent the second hour, 12.5 per cent the third hour.

It was a beer or wine quantity of alcohol (equivalent to two glasses of beer or a half pint of wine) that Totterman found markedly reduced the coordination of eye and hand work needed in delicate machine work of all kinds.

It was a beer and wine quantity of alcohol (equivalent to three-fourths of a pint of wine or a little over four glasses of beer) that Frankfurther found increased seventeen times the relative number of errors in typewriting.

It was beer and wine quantities of alcohol that in practically all these experiments misled the person using the alcohol into thinking that he was working better, when actually his work was poorer.

It was beer and wine quantities of alcohol (equivalent to 1½ to 2½ pints of beer or 10 to 15 ounces of wine) that Dodge and Benedict, of the Carnegie Nutrition Laboratory, Boston, found definitely depressed combined nerve and muscle activity. This with other results gave "clear indication of decreased organic efficiency as a result of moderate doses of alcohol."

The amounts of alcohol used in the foregoing experiments are commonly taken in wine or beer by hundreds of thousands of drinkers. They have been proven to decrease physical and mental working ability.

This loss would continue if war prohibition merely prohibited the stronger liquors.

Beer and whisky have been close associates—lived under the same roof, stood behind the same bar—for years. No State has killed one without at the same time executing the other, and this wholesale execution has taken place in 24 States in the Union.

Congress has proposed to kill only John Barleycorn. Why not end the job now and inter Gambrinus also—very much the greater food waster of the two—in the same grave?

THE BEER DRINKER GETS MORE ALCOHOL.

The belief that beer should not come under the condemnation so frequently meted out to whisky is traceable to the common impression that beer drinkers consume much less alcohol than whisky drinkers. But those who believe this overlook the fact that the man who drinks 4 per cent beer usually takes ten times as much as a man who takes 40 per cent whisky. The United States Internal Revenue Commissioner, on page 675 of the Statistical Abstract, gives the per capita consumption of distilled spirits and beer in 1914 and their respective alcoholic contents as follows:

	Gallons used.	Gallons of alcohol.
Distilled spirits	1.46	0.584
Malt liquors	20.51	.820

It will be seen from this that the per capita consumption of alcohol by beer drinkers in 1914 was 40 per cent greater than that by whisky drinkers.

For 1916 the per capita consumption of absolute alcohol in spirits was 0.54 gallon, and for beer 0.68 gallon. But in both of these computations it should be remembered that well toward half of the spirits is used in the arts and sciences, where all of the beer is consumed as a beverage. It is evident, therefore, that beer drinkers consume considerably more than twice as much alcohol as the whisky drinkers.

"PHILISTINISM" A BEER DISORDER.

I have already quoted Prof. Reinitzer who referred to the "beer Philistine." "Philistinism" is now used on both sides of the water as expressing a brutalized mentality the result of beer indulgence. The Scientific American says:

The most dangerous classes of ruffians in our large cities are beer drinkers. Intellectually a stupor amounting almost to paralysis arrests the reason, changing all the higher faculties into a mere animalism, sensual, selfish, sluggish, varied only with paroxysms of anger, senseless and brutal.

In appearance the beer drinker may be the picture of health, but in reality he is most incapable of resisting disease. A slight injury, a severe cold, or a shock to the body or mind will commonly provoke acute disease, ending fatally. Compared with other inebriates who use different kinds of alcohol, he is more incurable and more generally diseased. It is our observation that beer drinking in this country produces the very lowest kind of inebriety, closely allied to criminal insanity.

Prof. Rudolph Eucken, possibly the greatest philosopher Germany has produced, declares that his country must give up beer, which "breeds the wretched type of beer Philistine with which everyone is familiar."

BEER VALUELESS AS A FOOD.

An extensive beer advertising campaign is under way, designed to create the impression that it is an article of food and that it is always "pure." As a matter of fact, it has no appreciable food value. The statement so often attributed to the famous German chemist, Baron von Liebig, "Beer is liquid bread," can not be located in any one of Von Liebig's scientific works, and in Letter VI of his Letters on Chemistry, to be found on page 22 of his Complete Works on Chemistry, he says:

Beer, wine, and spirits furnish no elements capable of entering into the composition of the blood, muscular fiber, or any part that is a vital principle.

And he says:

Nine quarts of the best ale contains as much nourishment as would lie on the end of a table knife.

And still again:

If a man drinks daily 8 or 10 quarts of the best Bavarian beer, in the course of 12 months he will have taken into his stomach the nutritive constituents of a 5-pound loaf of bread.

Prof. G. O. Higley, of the department of chemistry, Ohio Wesleyan University, published a very elaborate study of the food value of flour and of beer. He found the ratio of proteids in beer to proteids in flour as 1 to 80, of carbohydrates as 1 to 61, and of fats 0.0 to 0.28. To furnish a hard-working man with the amount of proteids needed each day it would be necessary to give him 108 glasses of beer, costing $5.40, as compared to 37.9 ounces of flour, costing 6.8 cents. To supply him with the carbohydrates needed for his daily ration it would be necessary to give him 52 glasses of beer, costing $2.60, or flour, costing 4.3 cents.

The same money expended for beer and flour would yield 94.5 calories in the case of beer and 2,785.84 calories in the case of flour. The calorie is the unit of measure of nutritive value.

Prof. Higley made a similar comparison between milk and beer, with similar conclusions.

England, some 80 years ago, tried the experiment of fighting whisky and spirit consumption by the encouragement of the use of beer. The result is that she has become the greatest beer-drinking nation in the world, outstripping Germany in her per capita consumption. She has, moreover, inebriated all classes to an alarming extent, and both sexes. Drunkenness among women is doubtless more prevalent in the British Isles than in any other country on the globe. When the new law had been in force but a short time Sidney Smith wrote:

The new beer bill has begun its operations. Everybody is drunk. Those who are not singing are sprawling. The sovereign people are in a beastly state.

The first year the beer shops increased 30,000. The clergy, as is well known, became interested, which makes the question the more vexing and perplexing now.

Beer is defended as the drink of little alcohol.

The Nation drinks more than twice as much absolute alcohol in beer as in spirits.

Beer is said to be a harmless drink. In addition to its alcoholic content it has the stupefying and brutalizing narcotic of hops, akin to Indian hemp.

Beer is said to consume but little grain.

It consumes more than all other liquors combined, and, unlike spirits, it returns no commercial alcohol for the useful and necessary industries.

The plea is made for beer as a taxpayer.

It pays but little more than half the amount paid by spirits.

Why, then, should this Congress play favorites with beer? There is not a State in the Union that does not treat all the brood alike. Years ago, before the character of beer was known, States and localities frequently prohibited spirits and licensed beer. They all have learned better by bitter experience. There is not a single State in the Union that makes a distinction.

In the last general election two of the Western States submitted to a popular vote a provision to allow the restricted use of beer. Seattle, Denver, and other cities that had voted against prohibition two years before gave a strong majority against beer—the biggest bully of them all.

MEDICAL MEN BAN ALCOHOL.

Mr. Speaker, at the New York meeting of the American Medical Association, June 7, 1917, as you doubtless know, the following resolution was adopted by the house of delegates:

Whereas we believe that the use of alcohol is detrimental to the human economy, and whereas its use in therapeutics as a tonic or stimulant or for food has no scientific value; therefore be it

Resolved, That the American Medical Association is opposed to the use of alcohol as a beverage; and be it further

Resolved, That the use of alcohol as a therapeutic agent should be further discouraged.

WASTE OF MONEY.

The direct waste (the amount paid annually for liquor) is stated by high authority to exceed two billions of dollars—more than the amount of the first liberty loan—and every dollar of it worse than wasted. That is a sum sufficient to buy the Nation's annual crop of barley, rye, buckwheat, hops, potatoes, apples, peaches, oranges, and lemons; and the entire annual output of sugar, salt, gold, silver, copper, and precious stones, and pay all the dividends of all the national banks, steam railroads, and express companies, and pay all pensions and the entire amount of the customs receipts of the Nation. Even all of these items lack over sixteen millions of the aggregate of $2,000,000,000. And according to the same high authorities the loss in efficiency reaches more than two billions more, and the loss in crime, pauperism, insanity, bad bills, and other incidental evils are not yet accounted for.

And, gentlemen, the liquor advocates do not even dare to attempt an answer hereto. All they say, can say, or dare say is that they are such bold and vicious criminals and that humanity is so desperately degenerate that they will defy the will of the people.

I think it must be admitted that if we abandon the prohibition provisions adopted by this House that we do so in utter disregard of the unanimous voice of political and social economists and scientists.

CONTINENTAL CONGRESS VOTED DRY.

Mr. Speaker, it will come as a distinct surprise to some Congressmen that the question of food conservation, which we have prided ourselves upon as a recent invention, demanded attention in 1777. And it will certainly startle some to be reminded that in that connection the Congress went its limit:

Resolved, That it be recommended to the several legislatures of the United States immediately to pass laws the most effectual for putting an immediate stop to the pernicious practice of distilling grain, by which the most extensive evils are likely to be derived if not quickly prevented.

That was passed 140 years ago, on February 27, 1777, by the Continental Congress.

Some critic may urge that the measure was not bone dry, since it did not mention brewing. At that date beer had not discovered America. The Government has no record of the beer industry prior to 1840—63 years after the adoption of this resolution—and then the per capita consumption was but 1.36 gallons, or less than one-twelfth the per capita consumption of last year.

ABRAHAM LINCOLN'S VOICE.

Abraham Lincoln, 65 years after the historic resolution which I have read was adopted in the Continental Congress, gave utterance to the following words before the "Washingtonians" at Springfield, Ill., February 22, 1842:

Turn now to the temperance revolution. In it we shall find a stronger bondage broken, a viler slavery manumitted, a greater tyrant deposed; in it more of want supplied, more of disease healed, more sorrow assuaged. By it no orphans starving, no widows weeping. By it none wounded in feeling, none injured in interest; even the dram maker and dram seller will have glided into other occupations and stand ready to join all others in the universal song of gladness. And what a noble ally this to the cause of political freedom; with such an aid its march can not fail to be on and on, till every son of earth shall drink in rich fruition the sorrow-quenching drafts of perfect liberty.

And when the victory shall be complete—when there shall be neither a slave nor a drunkard on the earth—how proud the title of that land which may truly claim to be the birthplace and the cradle of both those revolutions that shall have ended in victory. How nobly distinguished that people who shall have planted and nurtured to maturity both the political and moral freedom of their species.

BEER AND THE GOVERNMENT.

Mr. Speaker, I shall read, simply to illustrate the influence of the gigantic beer lobby which surrounds the National Capital at this moment, articles from two great unfettered newspapers of the country:

BREWERS AND POLITICS.

[From the Milwaukee Journal.]

In the United States court at Pittsburgh 33 Pennsylvania brewers have been fined $50,000 in all for misuses of money in the congressional election of 1914. On a similar charge the United States Brewers' Association has been fined $10,000, the maximum amount possible under Federal law.

The charge under which these brewers were punished was that they raised and spent a fund exceeding $1,000,000 to influence the election of a United States Senator and 36 Members of the lower House of Congress.

The whole thing is staggering. Here was an attempt to debauch the electorate of a great Commonwealth, to buy seats in the Halls of Congress, and to pervert to selfish and sordid purposes the Government of the Nation. It was not only done in violation of law but it is destructive of representative government.

The United States attorney charged in court that these brewers boasted in their circulars of their ability to poison the ranks of organized labor through labor unions, to kill at one session of Congress 200 bills inimical to the liquor interests, and to capture entire States at elections.

It is not the liquor traffic in itself, but the social and political crimes of those engaged in it, which lead to the rapid enactment of prohibitory laws all over the country. People resent government by brewer and distiller. People resent the election of legislators and other public officers—city, State, and National—to serve ends hostile to social decency, to rule by the people, to the very life of the Nation.

IS IT A CHOICE BETWEEN BEER AND LOYALTY?

[From the Los Angeles Tribune.]

The United States Senate, whose legislative duty it plainly is to decide the fate of beer in the pending Federal food measure, decided to leave the determination of the troublesome question to the President. The President promptly accepts the proffered responsibility and, if we may employ the popular vernacular of the day, deftly "passes the buck" right back to the Senate, where the issue of right belongs at its present stage.

President Wilson, a bit in advance of the senatorial program, takes the Senate and the country frankly into confidence and lets it be known that, if the question is left to his determination, beer as well as wine will be exempted from the prohibitory feature of the food bill. The vexed question now goes back to the Senate.

President Wilson assigns as his reason for the position he assumes that to prohibit the manufacture and sale of beer would threaten "industrial unrest" and "divide the sympathies of the Nation."

The force of this argument, if impressive, is certainly appalling. Is it possible that this Nation is prepared to admit to the whole world that its industrial peace is to be purchased with beer? Worse yet, are its "sympathies" to be divided—while actually at war with a great foreign power that threatens our liberties—as a penalty for an economic step of deepest moment to the country, to the homes, and to the prosperity of its working classes?

President Wilson makes no mention of the vaunted contribution of the liquor business to the revenues of the country for the successful prosecution of the war. Doubtless this argument was ignored by him, first, because it would be giving added publicity to something we are ashamed of, namely, that a Government of the people consents to the weakening of its manhood and the undermining of its homes rather than pay its bills with honest, reputable taxation. And, finally, the President knows that the liquor business imposes burdens on the people, directly and indirectly, immeasurably greater than the revenues it yields, great as these are.

Appeals for economy in the home must lack in convincing power if both moral and economic waste continues to be fostered by the Government in protecting the saloon business. Has the President considered the value of the undivided sympathy of men and women who believe in conserving the man power of the country and the food grains at a time like this? And does not the President do violence to his estimate of the loyalty and patriotism of industrial workers in keeping the beer joints open as a means of insuring their loyalty? We surely can not have come to that! The saloon surely can not have a higher claim on the Nation than do the homes that are being daily wrecked by booze; than the homes in no way enslaved by it, but which help to pay the enormous cost of it. If economy and the conservation of manhood are worth considering, booze should be suppressed during the war. If the loyalty and sympathy of industrial America is to be measured in terms of beer, then God save the Republic!

RESULTS OF PROHIBITION.

A few weeks ago the liquor interests spread a full-page advertisement in the Washington press, claiming that prohibition increased the consumption of spirits, destroyed the property of the brewers, reduced pay rolls, and made productive property idle. I telegraphed to a number of prominent business and professional men in various States, and not one single man gave testimony substantiating the claims made by the liquor people.

Mr. F. N. Briggs, president of the Interstate Trust Co., one of the large financial institutions of Denver, telegraphed:

Savings accounts wonderfully increased since prohibition became effective. No drunkenness on our streets; no wine rooms or dives. Large decrease in crime and wonderful uplift of entire Commonwealth.

Mr. N. J. Blagen, of Hoquiam, Wash., president of Grays Harbor Lumber Co., which does business all over both Washington and Oregon, strongly denied the spurious claims of the wets as follows:

Answering your wire yesterday, prohibition has not driven men to drink whisky, brandy, or rum. On the contrary, it has proved the greatest blessing to the working class and everyone else. There has been a constant increase in wages and prosperity in business ever since Oregon and Washington went dry. Instead of a decrease in pay rolls, they have been very largely increased. Altogether it is the best investment that these two States have ever made.

Fuller E. Calloway, of La Grange, Ga., president of the Manchester Cotton Mills, wired:

Prohibition greatly lessens drinking of all forms of intoxicants, also their attendant crimes. Police and court records indisputably sustain this.

Henry Rising, editor of the Spokane Chronicle, wired:

Seventeen months of "permit" liquor system cut off three-fourths of use of whisky, brandy, and beer in Washington. Total prohibition in force here for last two weeks has brought drunkenness and crime in Spokane to minimum. Wages are going up. Factories and farms calling in vain for workmen. Banks hold 50 per cent more deposits than two years ago and poorhouse has shrunk 50 per cent. No argument could coax people of Washington to return to saloon system.

Ernest Lister, governor of the State of Washington, said:

Saloons in this State closed January 1, 1916. Brewery properties, practically without exception, have been converted to other uses. Since saloons closed commitments to county jails and prisons have decreased 50 per cent. People purchase larger quantities and better qualities of merchandise and pay for same more promptly. There is no question but that people of the State of Washington are better off in every respect—morally, physically, and financially—under prohibition than when saloons were in operation.

F. W. Clarke, managing editor of the Atlanta Constitution, Atlanta, Ga., wired:

Prohibition has worked wonders in Georgia, and every enactment strengthening the law has been a step forward. Especially since abolishing our package law has the amount of drinking in Georgia been reduced to practically nothing. Instead of driving men to drink, prohibition has saved them by thousands.

George F. Cottrill, chief engineer of the State highway commission of the State of Washington and former mayor of Seattle, wired from Olympia, the State capital, as follows:

Quoted advertisement Washington papers simply rehash familiar liquor campaign falsehoods everywhere exploded by actual prohibition experience. After 18 months practically every former brewing interest, including largest, adapted other productions. Increased pay rolls. Better business. Safer investments. Vastly improved material prosperity. Moral welfare.

L. P. Campbell, president of the University of Oregon, at Eugene, Oreg., wired as follows:

Prohibition in Oregon has been attended with best possible results. Drunkenness has almost entirely disappeared, and crime has very largely decreased. Business men generally agree that prohibition has been a great benefit.

John Laing, of Charleston, W. Va., president of the Wyatt Coal Co., operating 12 mines with an annual output of 6,000,000 tons, wired:

Our experience has been that men who were habitual drunkards have discontinued the habit entirely since prohibition took effect in West Virginia. There is a certain class of people who endeavored to traffic in whisky unlawfully in this State, but they have finally all been apprehended and punished under the law and this practice is almost entirely broken up, and instead of making drunkards, prohibition is making sober men out of drunkards.

Again I challenge the liquor press and the Members of this House who oppose prohibition legislation to find men of station and substance who will testify to the contrary. In absence of such reliable testimony, and in the face of these undisputed facts, there is no escaping the conclusion that the press which blazons these falsehoods to the world is either criminally ignorant of the facts or shamelessly mendacious.

T. A. Mitchell, chief of police of Newport News, Va., gives the following official figures for corresponding wet and dry months:

	1915—Wet.		1916—Dry.
	November.	December.	November.	December.
Drunk	82	132	19	17
Disorderly	106	61	23	26

Chief of Police John Anderson, of Aberdeen, S. Dak., writes under date of January 13, 1917:

The month of June, 1917, saloons running, arrests for all offenses were 95. The month of June, 1916, saloons out, there were 42 arrests for all offenses, and there has been a steady decrease every month.

The chief of police of Phoenix, Ariz., Mr. George O. Brisbois, writes under date of January 17, 1917:

In answer to your letter of January 10, regarding statistics of crime, beg to reply that during the year 1914 (wet) there were 4,750 arrests on all charges and a total of 2,674 arrests for drunkenness; and during the year of 1915 (dry) there were 1,780 arrests on all charges and 224 arrests for drunkenness.

The chief of police of Denver, Colo., writes under date of January, 1917:

	Wet, 1915.	Dry, 1916.
Drunks	3,227	1,605
Disturbance	1,064	733
Vagrancy	3,313	1,246
Total	7,604	3,584

J. H. Stark, chief of police of Colorado Springs, Colo., under date of January 15, 1917, writes:

In reply to your inquiry for figures of the increase or decrease of crime since State adopted the prohibition law, will submit the following figures for your consideration:

	License.			Prohibition, 1916.
	1912	1914	1915
Number of arrests	2,620	2,288	2,582	1,655
Number of arrests made for drunkenness	466	363	583	79

If statistics prove anything, the foregoing should prove beyond a doubt that prohibition has worked wonders in regard to the number of arrests and arrests for drunkenness and like misdemeanors.

T. J. Kelly, commissioner of public safety in the city of Everett, Wash., writes, under date of January 17, 1917:

In reply to yours of the 10th instant, asking for statistics showing the increase or decrease of crime since the adoption of the prohibitory law in our city, will say that crime has surely decreased more than two-thirds, as will be shown by the following:

	License.			Prohibition, 1916.
Total arrests on all charges	4,919	4,359	4,049	2,133
Total arrests on charges of drunk, drunk and disorderly, and drunk and vagrancy	1,457	771	655	208

The years 1913, 1914, and 1915 were wet, and our prohibition law became effective January 1, 1916.

Prohibitionists often suffer caustic criticism because of the percentages and ratios of crime and other human evils which they charge to drink. There may occasionally be cause for such criticism. If so, the exaggeration is inexcusable, for if the prohibitionist states but half the facts he still makes an unassailable case. But I call attention to the above statements and figures to show that prohibition, even before it gets well under way, reduces crime to a degree equal to the claims usually made by its advocates. And let me call further attention to the fact that this was before the Webb-Kenyon measure had been upheld by the court and prior to the operation of the bone-dry enactment of the Sixty-fourth Congress.

Chief of Police C. G. Kiser, of Norfolk, Va., reports under date of January 16, 1917:

In November, 1915, under license there were a total of 857 arrests made, of which 155 were for drunks. The next year, under prohibition there were 649 arrests, of which 10 were for drunks. In December, 1915, under license there were a total of 783 arrests, of which 160 were for drunks. In December, 1916, under prohibition there were a total of 456 arrests, of which 29 were for drunks.

He adds:

As the law has only been in effect for two months sufficient time has not elapsed to see results along this line.

Chief of Police J. A. Morton, of Columbus, Miss., under date of January 16, 1917, writes:

I have been working for the city for 12 years as an officer, and feel that I can safely say that the condition is fully 60 per cent better now under prohibition than under the former laws.

The chief of police of Eugene, Oreg., gives the following figures as to the result of prohibition in his city. Eugene went dry in 1914:

Year.	Drunks.	Vagrancy.
1912	330	36
1913	253	59
1914	63	13

It is the belief of all persons who have been or are interested in the moral welfare of Eugene that conditions are much better under prohibition than ever under a wet régime. And the general opinion is that everyone is better off and in a higher moral situation under prohibition.

C. B. CHRISTENSEN.

Chief of Police J. M. Broughton, of Portsmouth, Va., writes under date of January 14, 1917:

In the months of November and December, 1915 (wet), we had 452 arrests, of which 84 were for drunkenness.

In the same months, under prohibition, in 1916 we had 389 arrests, of which 46 were for drunks.

Since the prohibition in this State the change has been wonderful in this city.

J. E. Bell, chief of police of Danville, Va., under date of January 15, 1917, sends signed copies of his official reports for December, 1915, under license, and December, 1916, under prohibition. The following table shows the total arrests for those two months with the number occurring under the most frequent charges:

Charge.	December, 1915 (wet).	December, 1916 (dry).
All charges	288	122
Assault	39	19
Drunkenness	78	6
Disorderly	52	7
Larceny	16	8
Violations liquor law	13	17
Fines	$1,077	$292

In his letter of transmittal Chief Bell says:

The decrease of crime is simply wonderful.

Mayor James R. Hanna, of Des Moines, Iowa, writes:

The saloons were closed on the 15th of February, 1915. All the desirable locations were picked up by other businesses within the next few weeks following. A few out-of-the-way locations are still vacant.

I can not see that there is any appreciable effect because of throwing men out of employment, and certainly no increase in demands for charity. In fact, it is exactly the other way. The men who lost employment have gone into other lines. The men who were spending in the saloons the money which their families needed are now buying groceries and shoes instead. The consequence is a very much better tone in every way. In the first place, their families are not now in want, and, in the second place, they are paying their bills for the ordinary necessities. This is making collections noticeably better in other lines, so our merchants report.

The Spokane Spokesman-Review gives some figures showing a decrease of over 60 per cent in crime:

The number of arrests for drunkenness in Spokane in 1916 was 829, against 2,082 in the wet year; arrests for vagrancy totaled 420, against 1,578 in 1915; and for disorderly conduct, 218, against 692 the previous year. Less than one-half as many burglaries were reported in the dry year as in the last wet one. Petty larcency cases fell from 324 in 1915 to 97 in the dry year.

The retail merchants of Spokane say that accounts were settled more promptly last year than ever before, and trade was bigger in volume, too.

Spokane in 1915 had 44 business failures, with a total loss of $341,000. In 1916 it had only 28 failures, with a loss of about $74,000.

Employment agencies report that workers are harder to find than in wet years and that they demand better wages, apparently having money on hand to tide them over temporarily.

Gov. James Withycombe, of Oregon, in commenting on the situation, said:

Prohibition is proving a phenomenal success from an economic and moral standpoint.

According to the report of the State Board of Charities and Corrections of Virginia, 1 person in each 118 of the population was sent to jail during 1912. Taking all the wet territory of the State, there was 1 jail commitment to each 56 of the population. In the dry territory for the same period there was 1 jail commitment to each 527 of the population. Virginia has since voted "dry."

In this instance the wet counties had nearly ten times as many commitments as the dry, in spite of the fact that the dry counties were kept in a somewhat damp condition from the surrounding wet counties and States. Results will be more satisfactory after the Webb-Kenyon bill and other bone-dry provisions have been used as "dehydrating" agents.

During the year ending June 30, 1913, 22,994 prisoners were confined in the county jails in Ohio. Of these, 3,528 were in the jails of 44 dry counties and 19,466 in the jails of the 42 wet counties, Vinton, dry, and Clark, wet, not included. On the basis of the 1910 census, there was 1 person in jail in dry counties to each 366 of the population, but in the wet counties there was a person in jail for each 178 of population. The number of jail prisoners was more than twice as great, according to population, in wet counties as in dry counties.

Possibly no illustration is better calculated to show what this Congress might do for the United States in promoting national fitness than that contained in the following editorial from the San Francisco Daily Chronicle of May 5, 1906, shortly after the great earthquake and fire. It need not be said to those who are acquainted in California that the Chronicle is not a prohibition paper nor its editor among the recognized advocates of local or national aridity:

San Francisco for the past fortnight has been absolutely free from disorder and virtually free from crimes of violence. There have been no street brawls. No drunken brute has beaten his wife. No gamblers have murdered each other in low resorts. Except for some dealings with sneak thieves, the occupation of the police courts is gone. It is a most impressive object lesson of the value to society of the restriction of the liquor traffic. We are promised a continuation of this peaceful condition for a considerable time to come, save only as drunken men may drift over from Oakland, where the authorities have been so reckless as to allow saloons to open. We may be compelled to renew quarantine against Oakland. This absolute demonstration that the saloons are responsible for all crimes of violence makes it imperative that whenever they shall be allowed to reopen in this city their license fees will be fixed at a rate which will support the police department. There must be increased taxation. The public generally will protest against being taxed for the control or suppression of those forms of crime for which the saloons are now proved to be solely responsible. The public will look to the board of supervisors to place the cost of dealing with crime on the occupation which is responsible for all of it.

EDITORS IN PROHIBITION STATES.

No more thoroughly impartial evidence has been submitted than that gathered by the Literary Digest which appeared under date of May 26, 1917. And it is quite probable that no more competent witnesses have been called than the editors of the papers in 19 States which have had from 1 to 60 years' experience. The Digest omitted to state that none had enjoyed one full year's experience under any form of State-wide prohibition, but it should be remembered that none of them had had the benefits of the recent court decisions or the legislation of the last Congress. These provisions will remove some of the weaknesses that have interfered with the operation of the law, and under them more uniform and satisfactory results are certain to follow.

Forty-one columns were devoted to the replies, and 90 per cent of the replies were favorable to the law, 6 per cent were undecided, and only 4 per cent expressed opposition. Of the 4 per cent who give unfavorable reports, about one-half laid the failure to the permissive features, such as the "2-gallons-a-month law," and the remainder were divided between the admission that the liquor traffic successfully defied or evaded the law and the claim that the express companies kept all who desired liquor supplied with it. The recent action of the courts and Congress will correct the first two of these complaints.

The following are the 19 States covered by the inquiry, with the dates when they adopted the policy:

1851—Maine.
1880—Kansas.
1890—North Dakota.
1908—Georgia and Oklahoma.
1909—Mississippi, North Carolina, and Tennessee.
1914—West Virginia.
1915—Alabama, Arizona, and Virginia.
1916—Arkansas, Colorado, Idaho, Iowa, Oregon, South Carolina, and Washington.

Time will not permit any extensive review of the replies published. The Kennebec Journal, formerly edited by James G. Blaine, warmly commends the law and writes:

We advise other States to adopt our law, with improvements against weak and nullifying officials, because every State added helps us and because our religious, educational, business, and social life is more wholesome and progressive under it; because the opposition of the liquor interests has aroused the people to study the liquor-traffic problem, and to study means understanding of and hatred for the conscienceless methods of a damnable business.

Kansas next after Maine adopted prohibition as a permanent policy, and a single editorial utterance from that State is a fair index to them all. William Allen White, of the Emporia Gazette, calls attention to the fact that—

The last time anyone had the courage to run before the people of Kansas on an antiprohibition declaration he got 1 vote in 12 of those polled at the election. The unanimous supreme court, the governor, and the unanimous vote of both houses of the legislature recently were registered for prohibition. A public declaration that prohibition has made business better was made by the State retailers' association at their State convention; the chairman of the commercial clubs of the State has declared he believes prohibition has made Kansas land more valuable than it would be otherwise. The chairman of the State medical society is recorded as declaring that prohibition is our best hygienic statute, and the president of the State bar association recently declared that prohibition had decreased crime. The president of the State federation of labor a few years ago declared that prohibition had made laboring conditions better for laboring men than saloons, and the State grange has gone on record as declaring that there is more money for the farmer raising grain for food and grapes for grape juice than there is in raising farm products for liquor. In the face of these testimonials, the opinion of one man is highly irrelevant.

Washington has had but one year's experience, and that was under "quart-bottle" prohibition. Yet Maj. C. B. Blethen, owner and editor of the Seattle Times, who was a most vigorous antiprohibitionist until he had watched the operation of the law, gives enthusiastic testimony to its value.

Maj. C. B. Blethen, formerly with the Minneapolis Tribune, now the editor of the Seattle Times, recently gave out the following interview:

My paper fought its damnedest against prohibition. We fought it on economic grounds alone. We believed that in a great seaport city with a population of upward of 330,000 prohibition would be destructive; it would bring on economic disaster. We believed that under our system of licensing saloons we had the liquor traffic about as well controlled as it could be and we wanted to let it alone, and so we fought as hard as we could fight. But in spite of all we could do against it prohibition carried and it went into effect in Washington January 1. We have had a month of it now.

And how has it worked out?

We already know that it is a great benefit morally and from an economic standpoint. Its moral benefit has been tremendous. Seattle had 336 saloons, and we had about 1,600 arrests a month for crimes and misdemeanors growing out of liquor drinking. In January we had only 765 arrests, and 60 of those were made January 1 and were the result of "hang overs" from the old year. The year previous there were 2,600 arrests in the same month. That in itself is enough to convince any man with a conscience that prohibition is necessary. There can be no true economy in anything that is immoral.

And on top of that great moral result we have these economic facts: In the first three weeks of January the savings accounts in the banks of Seattle increased greatly in numbers. There was not a grocery store in Seattle that did not show an increase of business in January greater than ever known in any month before in all the history of the city, except in holiday time. In all the large grocery stores the increase was immense. In addition to this every dry goods store in Seattle except one, and that one I have no figures from, had a wonderful increase in business. Each store reported the largest business ever done in one month, except in holiday time.

I wished to know in what class of goods the sales increased so greatly, and so I sent to all the grocery and dry goods stores to find that out. And to me it is a pitiful thing, and it makes me sorry that we did not have prohibition long ago, that the increase in sales in all the dry goods stores was in wearing apparel of women and children, and in the grocery stores the increase was made up chiefly of fruits and fancy groceries. This proves that it is the women and children who suffer most from the liquor business, and it is the women and children who benefited greatest from prohibition. Money that went formerly over the bar for whisky is now being spent for clothing for the women and children and in better food for the household.

It is just like this: When you close the saloons the money that formerly was spent there remains in the family of the wage earner, and his wife and children buy shoes and clothing and better food with it. Yes, sir, we have found in Seattle that it is better to buy shoes than booze. The families of wage earners in Seattle are going to have more food and clothes and everything else than they had before.

LABOR LIKES IT.

Labor and labor unions have been industriously taught by the paid liquor propagandists to fear and oppose prohibition as prejudicial, if not destructive, of its interests. I quote three paragraphs from the Digest, showing the attitude of the labor press after observing the effect of prohibition upon industrial conditions.

The Square Deal, which is published under the auspices of the Richmond (Va.) Central Trades and Labor Council, reminds us that when State-wide prohibition was put before the people of Virginia many workingmen, along with thousands of others, were not merely outspoken in their opposition to the proposal but were direful in their predictions as to the disastrous results prohibition must entail. That the result has disproved practically all such dismal foreboding and that to-day the same men are among the champions of prohibition, speaks well for the law and for the manner in which the authorities are trying to enforce it. Excepting those employed in the brewery and liquor industries proper, this journal goes on to say workingmen have been even better off than was expected even by the advocates of prohibition; and while a number of men were thrown out of work through the enactment of the law, many also secured employment as a result of it.

The Denver Labor Bulletin says that members of organized labor particularly realized in the past year the fallacy of the old slogan about the saloon being "the poor man's club," for they have discovered that this so-called club had a very large share of their earnings, which now goes to support the family or establish a bank account. The Labor Bulletin has no hesitancy in saying that on the whole the condition of Colorado's workers is at least 50 per cent better as a result of State-wide prohibition, and it tells us that retail merchants say that collections are from 40 to 50 per cent better under prohibition than when the saloon door stood wide open to invite wage earners bearing the pay envelope.

The Boulder (Colo.) News Herald also notes as excellent reasons Colorado has for dissolving its legal partnership with booze the fact that people have suffered in many acts of property destroyed, assault, incendiarism, and murder in a bitter industrial war, and we read:

"Since the saloons have gone there has not been a strike in Colorado. The industrial commission, established in 1915, settled 75 controversies satisfactorily during 1916. Seven labor disputes were formally investigated and awards given without the industrial peace of the State being disturbed. The members of the commission say that if the open saloon had been in existence several of these disputes would surely have ended in strikes, accompanied by violence and crime. Prohibition, supplemented by wise industrial legislation, has kept Colorado in peace."

LABOR LEADERS SPEAK.

During this debate an unsigned two-page advertisement appeared in Washington papers quoting organized labor as opposed to prohibition. Doubtless some of it is. But this was to be noticed: Not a single union from a prohibition State was to be found among those who were said to be against the measure.

By methods of intimidation and threats the liquor interests have been able to silence many labor leaders who favor prohibition. But from prohibition States and cities the sinister frightfulness of the liquor interests is being removed, and there is a volume of sentiment among men of influence in the labor world favorable to the absolute prohibition of the traffic that has sunk its wolfish teeth deeply into the vitals of industrial labor. I read the recent testimony of some of these men:

Chester J. Common, president of the Building Trades Council of Denver, in a letter dated October 23, says: "I am frank to say I voted against the prohibition movement, thinking it would hurt business in a general way.

"Organized labor in Colorado is in better shape than it has been for years. Our members are better fed, better clothed, and have more money in the banks than at any time since I have been in Colorado—14 years."

William C. Thornton, president of the Denver Trades and Labor Assembly, also states that he voted against prohibition. "I venture to assert," says Mr. Thornton, "outside of the old saloon interests, you couldn't muster a corporal's guard in the labor movement of Denver to-day who would assert that they were in favor of the return of the saloon."

The strongest indorsement of the prohibition law in Colorado comes from Otto F. Thum, the first president of the Colorado Federation of Labor, and nationally known in trade-union circles.

Mr. Thum says that prohibition has strengthened organized labor in that State and that it is in better condition to-day than ever before.

"Brewers and malsters," writes Mr. Thum, "have suffered loss in their trade, but the other departments of the brewery workers are still fact—bottlers, drivers, enginemen, and stablemen. These are all thriving.

"But to the surpise of all, the cigar makers have more members at work in Denver now than at any other time. Barbers have more members employed than ever before.

"The movies are the greatest beneficiaries, and we have one of the strongest movie operators' union in the whole country. The musicians feared that they would suffer the loss of the cabaret. But they are more than compensated by the gain in the movies, where they are much more numerously employed under vastly better condition than in the saloons. The milk business has grown beyond comprehension, and we expect to organize these in the near future.

"In Denver we have been for many years trying to get the boys to build a labor temple, but were always thrown down by a sinister influence—the saloons. We have 108 unions in Denver and they meet in 28 different buildings. The saloons saw to it that we were not bunched in a labor temple. But now that we are well rid of the saloons we are able to get together and in a very short time we will have a labor temple to cost about $125,000."

Mr. Thum's high standing in the American labor movement stamps the above testimony as absolutely reliable.

J. W. Sanford, Colorado organizer for the Cigarmakers' Union, reporting for his trade to the Denver Labor Bulletin, says: "Reports from East and West are to the effect that there are very few cigarmakers out of work."

The statement that "there are few cigarmakers out of work in the East and West," on the authority of the cigarmakers' representative ought to be sufficient to convince any open-minded person that the workers in the craft have not "suffered" from the effects of prohibition.

The Denver Labor Bulletin, in a recent issue, says that the musicians in that city have secured a wage increase of $5 per week. In view of the wets' claim that "musicians in Denver are walking the streets seeking employment," this is significant.

The correspondent of the Machinists' Union reports "that Machinist Union, No. 47, moved next door in the Florence Building into larger and more convenient quarters." Evidently the Machinists' Union is not suffering loss of members on account of prohibition in Colorado.

Since prohibition went into effect Denver bricklayers have increased their wages from $6 to $7 per day.

Carpenters in Denver have succeeded in securing the first wage agreement with the contractors in that city for a number of years. It provides for an increase of 5 cents per hour—40 cents a day—the eight-hour day and Saturday half holiday.

The lathers have increased their wages from $4 to $5 per day—eight hours at that—since Denver went dry.

In July of this year Mr. E. R. Hoage, organizer for the American Federation of Labor in Colorado, sent in to headquarters his official report of conditions in his State.

Here is what Mr. Hoage said:

"Organized labor is in better condition than it has been for years."

To repeat: The above facts are taken from the report of local union secretaries who are giving the actual conditions in their organizations. They are not colored to suit wet adherents or dry adherents. They are absolutely reliable, and they prove conclusively that organized labor has not lost, but has actually made tremendous gains in Colorado since prohibition was inaugurated.

Mr. Clint C. Houston, editor of the Denver Labor Bulletin, writes, under date of January 13, 1917, as follows: "I have received many letters making inquiries in relation to the effect of prohibition upon labor.

"Labor in Colorado is at least 50 per cent better off under Statewide prohibition than before.

"Should an attempt be made to repeal the law, I am satisfied that not 20 per cent of the members of organized labor in this State, men and women, would vote to rehabilitate the saloon. During the year 1916 (under prohibition) there were more wage agreements entered into carrying increases than during any similar period in the history of this city or State. Twelve building trades received increases, ranging from 40 cents to a dollar per day, the latter including plumbers and bricklayers. There is no idle skilled labor in Denver.

"Savings accounts in Denver banks and in other industrial centers throughout the State have increased during 1916 about 50 per cent. Crime incident to alcoholism has almost completely disappeared. Merchants, especially neighborhood groceries and markets, report greatly improved trade and that collections now are prompt and with practically no loss.

"Tourist business in Colorado last summer, without saloons or booze in hotels, increased 60 per cent over the preceding wet year.

"The people of Colorado now wonder how they tolerated saloons as long as they did. Many of those who were most ardent advocates of the saloon, for the reason that they thought prohibition would ruin business, now take a different view of the situation."

John Mitchell, former president of the United Mine Workers of America, Mount Vernon, N. Y., under date of January 19, 1917, writes: "I believe that liquor has contributed more to the moral, intellectual, and material deterioration of the people and has brought more misery to defenseless women and children than any other agency in the history of mankind."

Tom J. Greer, president of the Louisiana Federation of Labor, says: "Since the influence of the liquor traffic has been removed from union politics we have been able to organize successfully in Shreveport."

The following facts show what Shreveport labor has done since the town went dry in 1908.

Membership in trade-unions has increased from 1,800 to 3,700.

Home owners among union men have increased 40 per cent since Shreveport went dry.

Carpenters receive 55 cents per hour and are able to work 12 months in the year. In that town of 20,000 white people the carpenter union has increased its membership from 65 to 375 (over 500 per cent) since the town went dry.

Painters, when Shreveport was wet, had 35 members, a 10-hour day, and the scale was $2.75 per day. To-day the painters' union has 145 members, an 8-hour day, and 55 cents an hour, or $4.40 per day.

Barbers have shortened their hours of labor, raised wages continuously, and have a 100 per cent organization since Shreveport went dry.

A brewery under the wet régime employed six nonunion brewery workers. In dry Shreveport this brewery has been turned into an ice factory which employs 40 union ice makers.

The wage scale in Shreveport compares favorably with any city in the country. New Orleans, south of Shreveport, has 2,200 saloons and the lowest wage scale in the country. If saloons help organized labor, why isn't New Orleans an organized town?

Gentlemen, I have submitted but a fragment of the evidence at hand, that if we fail to adopt a prohibition measure similar to that already passed by this body we will disregard the teaching of the uniform experience of the States and cities of this Nation.

Favoring an Alien Conscription Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. FREDERICK C. HICKS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 28, 1917.

Mr. HICKS. Mr. Speaker, the general purpose of the alien conscription bill recently passed by the Senate is, in my opinion, both desirable and essential. That a great injustice is being done the young men of America which the present law calls to the service of their country while exempting aliens from military duty is manifest to all and needs no discussion. Vast numbers of the citizens or subjects of foreign countries allied against Germany have returned to their native shores and are now fighting for the land of their birth. There are, however, large numbers who still reside within our borders, living in peace and security under our flag, receiving the protection of our laws, and enjoying the privileges of our schools, yet bearing none of the burdens of war and taking no part in the defense of the country which shelters them nor in the defense of the country from whence they came. This is an injustice, Mr. Speaker, which must be rectified. It is an injustice which prevails in all parts of our country, but especially throughout the Northern States, where a large percentage of the population is alien.

Under existing law, each State is required to furnish its quota to the armed forces of the United States in the proportion that its population—including citizens and aliens—bears to the total population of the United States. In making up the draft each State is given credit for the volunteer enlistments in the Regular Army, Navy, Marine Corps, and National Guard. But resident aliens, while they are included in the population upon which the quota is based, are not subject to military service. This means that American citizens must take their places and fill the ranks to the full extent of a quota based on a population of which a part evades service. Cases have been presented where in order to fill the quota every citizen in the district was drafted, while those who formed a part of that population upon which the quota was based were allowed to remain at home. This makes the sacrifice of that many additional American boys, the loss of that much more of our sturdy manhood, and the infliction of that much more sorrow upon American homes. Our boys are ready and willing—yea, anxious to fight for the old flag; their patriotism and loyalty will never be questioned, their heroism and noble sacrifice will never be forgotten, and their deeds of valor will never fade from the roll of honor of their country's history. But while these boys are responding to the call of duty and face the shot and shell on foreign battle fields, it is not fair, it is not just, that other men living in our country, enjoying its educational, civil, and industrial advantages and benefiting by its opportunities, should escape the obligation of defending the country which protects them. The places made vacant in our commercial and industrial life by the boys following the flag to victory should not and must not be taken by those "alien slackers," who have neither the patriotism to fight for their own country nor the manhood to assume the responsibility of citizenship of the country in which they reside.

The seriousness of the situation and the importance of immediate remedial legislation is indicated in the figures submitted by the Provost Marshal General, which shows that in a total of 9,780,685 registered under the act of May 18, 1917, 1,275,902 were aliens of friendly countries and 80,538 were aliens of enemy countries. In some of the States alien registration is 30 per cent of the total registration. In New York in a total registration of 1,060,693; 235,538 are friendly aliens and 30,965 enemy aliens. In this connection let me quote from a report submitted by the Senate Committee on Military Affairs:

Under the selective-draft law quotas from the States and Territories and subdivisions were based upon the estimated population thereof, and in many subdivisions the registration returns showed a very large percentage of registrants classified as aliens. In some cases the percentage of those classified as aliens exceeds 65 per cent of the total number registered. This situation works a hardship on the citizen population of a community, and the man who under the laws of his native country may be obligated to render military service is resting here answerable to no one.

It is only fair to state that some of these aliens will probably serve the Nation when an opportunity is afforded them. Give them the opportunity, but should they decline to accept it, then the power of the law should compel them to make the sacrifice which our own boys are called upon to make.

We are to-day facing facts, not theories; conditions, not fancies; and the supreme duty of the present is to win the war to which America is committed. America, independence, democracy have new meanings when the test for democracy is being made; when the independence of half the world is at stake and when America, after years of peace, is being tried in the fire of armed conflict.

This is not a war for conquest or for trade or for profit; it is a war for peace, for a peace that will be so permanent that neither war nor rumors of war will hereafter disturb the onward march of the world's progress. It is a conflict to insure for all time the safety of the great free Government of American democracy. We are not fighting the battles of any country but our own, and we are fighting for the defense and preservation of our sovereignty. We wage war in conjunction with our allies in order that the combined strength of all liberal nations may crush the Prussian military autocracy before that power so weakens the nations that first received the shock of military aggression that we would be forced to fight alone for liberty.

This is a war neither sectional nor political; it is a national war, and we subordinate all internal differences, all political animosities to the noble cause of our Nation's welfare and our Nation's triumph.

This war is calling forth the patriotism, the genius, and the supreme power of a mighty people. We are proving to the world that democracy, which has opened the flood gates to opportunity, can rise to the highest plane of national unity. It is a demonstration of democracy in its fullest, truest expression, calling upon manhood without distinction and upon wealth without exception.

We stand by our administration and by our Federal organizations, but this war will not be won until each individual does his part. The Government can not carry on the conflict successfully without the constant support and cooperation of its citizens. We must all work to the point where each one of us instead of asking "What can I do?" will be able to say by reason of concentrated effort, "I am ready." It is the work from within that will count. It is for us in this hour of crisis not only to have and to express with courage our own convictions, but it is our duty to arouse public sentiment, to convince vacillating minds and timid consciences that we are ready to meet force by force and ruthless power by still greater power, but power backed by justice, law, and humane instincts. It is for us to give loyalty, undivided, unconditional, single-hearted loyalty to the Nation and its institutions, and to live and preach the gospel of universal service which alone can maintain equality of rights in our Republic.

Patriotism is more than a sentiment; loyalty is more than an expression. The one is the acceptance of the duty, absolute and universal, which every citizen owes his country, and the other the determination, sincere and unfaltering, to perform those duties, irrespective of the sacrifice. As the purpose of the Nation is but the concentrated thought of the individuals of that Nation, our work is to preach the doctrine of preparedness, of conservation, of service, and above all of unequivocable loyalty and unswerving allegiance to the Nation itself.

War will bring its sorrows and hardships, its trials and sacrifices, but they will come with the conviction that our cause is just and with the knowledge that victory will be the reward of those sacrifices and privations.

We know not what the future holds for us, or what star will guide us; we can not foretell our destiny, but we pray that the Great Unseen Power, who holds the fate of nations in the hollow of His hand, will guide us to victory and to glory.

WHY THE WAR CAME TO AMERICA.

[Address of FREDERICK C. HICKS, delivered at Babylon, Long Island, July 4, 1917.]

One hundred and forty-one years ago to-day our fathers gave to the world a declaration of purposes, and dedicated to posterity the principle of government by the consent of the governed. The forward march of the Nation since July 4, 1776, is without parallel in history. In the arts, in science, in education, in all that ennobles and uplifts humanity America has been the leader of the world's thought and action. Under that charter of human rights—the Constitution of the United States—we have repelled foes from without and maintained the sanctity of the Union when secession assailed our national life. We have demonstrated that representative democracy can not only maintain itself but that it is the very foundation upon which rest the hopes and ideals of all liberty-loving people.

To-day civilization with all that it has acquired in its struggle upward through the ages is tottering in the carnage of death on the plains of Europe, and the arm of destruction is reaching for our own shores. To check this sweep of military despotism which jeopardizes our independence and endangers our institutions America is mobilizing its mighty resources of men and treasure. We have not been drawn into the conflict by the demands of capital or of commerce, by desire of territory, hope for an indemnity, or even for the maintenance of a national policy. We have taken up arms because war has been forced upon us, as it has been forced upon nearly the entire world by arrogant autocratic power. We entered the conflict because our national existence was being threatened, because our sovereignty was being assailed, because our citizens were being killed, and because our internal peace was being attacked. We do not fight for aggrandizement or to impose our form of government upon other countries. We do not fight to further the ambitions of the British, the French, the Russians, or the Italians. They are our allies against the common enemy, but their national policies do not concern us. We are fighting for the protection of our own people, for our own institutions, for our own country, and for our own flag, which in majestic silence appeals to us in this hour of crisis to remember the principles for which it stands.

On this birthday of the Nation we render homage to the founders of our Republic, and in their name, inspired by their spirit of devotion and self-sacrifice, dedicate our all that the Nation shall continue to shed its blessings of freedom, equality, and justice upon all mankind forevermore.

War Revenue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MILTON A. ROMJUE,

OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 28, 1917.

Mr. ROMJUE. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, there has been a great deal said from time to time in debate on the revenue bill about consumption tax. A consumption tax on the necessities of life does not appeal to or satisfy me at all, for the reason that the poor approximately consume the necessaries of life to the same degree as the wealthy, and a tax thereon compels those who are unable to pay to bear the same burden as those far more able to pay.

The ability to pay ought to go far in the consideration of a schedule to meet war expenses, and I believe in conscripting the wealth of this Nation to do the financial fighting. I do not desire to be unfair to any class of citizens of this country; I only think the right thing ought to be done by all, and I am ready to say that some men of wealth in this country are doing their full share in this war. On the other hand, sirs, there are many of such men who try to evade their responsibility. Why do I say this? Here is the proof: The makers of munitions who had made fabulous fortunes out of their industry held back $10,000,000 of income tax, but since the assembling of Congress on the 2d day of April they have been forced to disgorge, and the $10,000,000 income tax so held back by them is now in Uncle Sam's hands.

There are other evidences I might enumerate if I only had the time to do so. But we must not lose sight of the main issue and that is we must win the war, and we can not afford to fall out among ourselves. It is a very easy matter to criticize, much more difficult to be constructive.

Our European enemy in this war could have nothing please them more than for American citizens to fall out with each other. The enemy is anxious that we should abuse and criticize each other. The enemy wants the American people to fall out with their Government and its officers.

Gentlemen, let us not lose sight of the main point and that is, I repeat, the winning of the war; and let us all counsel reason and judgment, and let the Government have the united support of every citizen in the land and instead of wasting breath in abuse let each of us—every citizen in the United States—take an inventory of himself and assault and fight the enemy and not your neighbor who does not view every detail as you do.

Let us not stick the poisoned fangs in our own body; we can reason without abuse, we can express judgment without criticism. Abuse and criticism never convinces or rectifies.

There is no use theorizing as to what should or should not have been done 10 or 5 or 1 year ago, but the question is what should be done now. We are in a war of a most serious character and it can not at all be brought to a successful termination without means or money to meet the necessary expenses of equipment for winning the fight. At this time our Government and its officials are by reason of the circumstances under which we find ourselves required to support measures which we would not at all do in time of peace; revenue must be raised to meet the cost of the war. It can only be raised by taxation or the issue of bonds, or both. No sane man would think of raising it all by issue of bonds, and no man who has a good understanding of the war situation would insist on the whole fund being raised by taxation.

We should raise as much of the revenue without bond issue as can be done in justice to the people, and I favor the greater portion of the revenue being collected from the enormous fortunes of the country in the way of the income taxes and excess-profits taxes. It is impossible to get a great problem like this settled with exact equality, and it is far less possible to frame a law of this character that will exactly suit everyone; but the main effort is to do the right thing by all concerned and raise the revenue to win this war.

The bill in its present form seems to meet the approval of the administration. Personally, I favor a still higher tax on the larger incomes of the wealthy and an adequate war-profit tax.

In discussing such a revenue bill as that which has engaged the attention of our national lawmakers for some time, permit me to say that only abnormal conditions now existing can justify it. These abnormal conditions are understood by many and misunderstood by some—nations are very similar, indeed, to individuals. The same ambitions inspire, the same sentiments ennoble, the same prejudices enslave thought, the same passions overthrow reason, and the same spirit of greed stifle and stay the hand which, if left unfettered, would bestow upon mankind greater blessings, greater liberty, and a greater and broader opportunity to secure genuine equality.

You recall quite as readily as I do the expression "Whom the gods would destroy they first make mad." With this before our eyes can we not get away from that spell that seems to bind some people hand and foot, so to speak? Can we not reason? Have we lost control of ourselves to the extent that we become angry at the very instant an argument is put forth in which is clothed thought that has never penetrated our own brain? There are some who believe their own judgment infallible, and who think everything is right which harmonizes with their view and wrong when their brain is unable to be penetrated by another thought.

Most of my life has been spent in sympathy and in company with the men who toil and, as is often said, earn their bread by the sweat of their face, and somehow I think as I followed the plow along the furrow with measured tread I became convinced that the world was no place for extravagance, and every public expenditure ought to obtain or procure an equivalent in value.

By nature and by environment I have learned to believe that an extremist on either end of problems of government becomes at particular times either a menace to individual rights or too radical, and apt to desire to set aside organized authority and power.

I thank God every day of my life that Thomas Jefferson, George Washington, and Benjamin Franklin lived, and that the men who framed our National Constitution were men of honor, of power, and judgment, and who did right even in the face of criticism, and yet they were men who were not swept off their feet by the plaudits of an approving multitude. God bless them; everyone in their graves to-day.

The highest devotion any man can have, in the secular sense, is to be true to every public trust, and a strict adherence to truth is, in the last analysis, the best and safest policy. This policy we must adhere to as a Nation. We are at war with the greatest military power on earth. In this war America must win or fail. I ask you to pause here—"win or fail." I again repeat it—"win or fail."

Every man should soberly study this question, and without a particle of enmity toward his fellow citizens of this country resolve to stand firmly by the American Government.

In time of a nation's struggle to protect its honor and its rights and in so doing protect the honor and rights of its constituent citizens, it should not be forgotten that then of all times should every citizen be well poised in his thought and action. While this is true as to every citizen, it is for the stronger reason true of every man who is delegated by the people to crystallize thought into law which is to guide and determine the destiny of a nation.

The world's history is replete with conduct of men who, under influence and environed by mob violence, would hang an innocent on one occasion and yet some time in a jury box liberate the most guilty. This character of mind and thought has no place, or at least should have no place, in marking out the course of our Nation.

The fundamental principles upon which our Government is founded, when carefully looked into and examined, disclose the greatest set of principles enunciated by man.

The theory of American Government and the constitutional power of this Government challenges the respect and admiration of thoughtful men the world over.

As a new Member of this body I have listened with intense interest to many able discussions of the various matters which have been before us, and especially to those discussions which touched upon the duties and powers of the Government in time of war.

Men, this Government is dual in its nature. It has a twofold working function. In time of peace it extends its beneficent arm down to the individual citizen and clothes him with peace, plenty, and prosperity; it sheds a soothing comfort upon him.

The industrious, thoughtful, law-abiding citizen of this country in time of peace gets a heritage from the Government that gold can not buy, and in time of war its sacred privileges, backed by American ingenuity and courage, will not permit the rust of autocratic rule to corrode, and these same principles will be stood by and defended by American valor, and I say to you that the central powers of Europe will not be permitted to break through and steal this heritage which has been won at so great a sacrifice.

I say this Government is dual—twofold in its action. In time of peace its power and its influence and its effectiveness is showered down to the individual citizen, and in time of war the individual citizen by the very principles of our Government must yield up his power, his influence, and his effectiveness to the Government.

This Government is expansive. In time of peace it expands its blessings and its splendid fruits, throwing them out to the people, and in time of war it centralizes its power, its energy, its influence, and its ability to defend, and lodges this dynamic force of the great body of citizens in and behind the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy, the President of the United States, and by him, my countrymen, we shall be led to victory.

War can not be conducted successfully without great expense, and the United States and the great body of her citizens propose to conduct this war to a successful termination. At the very entry of the United States into this war I stated that food and finance would be potent factors in winning the war.

Within the last few days a man of very high authority in England said "the war might not have been won without the great financial support of the United States, but with it the original allies could have won." And within this week the Hon. Herbert Hoover comes forward and says that food will be the greatest factor in the winning of the war. And the food controller of England corroborates what Mr. Hoover has said. In view of the fact that food is now and will continue to be a great factor in winning the war, I contend that those who produce the food of our country, those who are in a position to produce it and who in fact do produce it, should most surely, if there is anything in the practical application of the draft law, be permitted to continue to produce food so far as practicable, and thereby render their services where it can be made to count for most. Early in the war it was suggested by some that idle men in town whom the Army draft had missed should be drafted to fill the places of young farmers on the farm, in instances where young farmers had been drafted. Of course, no one with any conception of farm life would advocate such a theory, in the face of importance of food in the present crisis.

One average farmer boy will produce more crop than three street loafers. If I were compelled to run my farms with the latter class I should think the more of them I had the worse off I would be. I repeat, that so far as possible and practicable the industrious farmer should be permitted to produce the sinew, to wit, food, which will be and is such a great factor in the war.

If Russia should yield her grain fields to the enemy, which God forbid that she ever does, any man can see the importance the food supply of this country relatively becomes. I point out these facts relative to the productions of food and the necessity of maintaining the proper food supply, in justice not only to the farmer who produces the food but in justice to every American citizen everywhere.

I notice that some men in discussing the revenue for this war continually have a fear of injuring business and encroaching so far upon profits as to destroy business.

In answer to this expression of fear, let me say that no sane citizen of this country desires to injure or destroy any legitimate business. But the burden of this war must be borne and the burden imposed by the expenses of war should be borne in large part by those most able to pay for it, and especially those who have profited out of the war, and in keeping with this opinion and judgment I have supported every move in favor of the higher income tax and excess-profits tax being taken to pay for this war, and I do so out of no desire to punish or penalize any business industry, but as an act of simple justice to every American citizen in the existing emergency arising out of this war. I realize it is impossible to get a bill that will meet everyone's approval, and I shall vote for this bill in some form. Time will not permit me to go into it in detail now, but there is a feature

I hope the conference committee will iron out and correct more nearly right. I refer to the tax on medicines.

Medicines are the boon of the sick and afflicted; they are the last word in the language of life or death. They make their visit into the home in the hour of torture, trouble, and tears. They sooth the body of many of life's weary stragglers in the final and last struggle for earthly existence. They help to make the passing of human life the easier and to sustain life where and when death would be sure and certain, and the tax laid upon them must fall upon many as a burden which to me might well be laid elsewhere. I hope the committee will remedy this.

Our Government is sending the flower of this land to the front to help achieve the victory which shall be ours and if the young men of this country are to offer up their lives, as they will in some instances, I say there is nothing too good for them, the best of arms, the best of equipment and care, and the best of medical service they must have, and money is required for this, and to raise money in this emergency means taxes, and those who have made profits out of this war and have heaped riches upon riches in time of peace should and I demand shall bear the heavy end of this war burden.

Those who urged so strongly to select those to do the fighting who were most suitably fitted for it certainly ought not now complain if they have wealth and financial means, which is called upon to help defray the expense of the war. Certainly everyone should do their share in some line of effort to win the war, and the large incomes and profits and estates of the country are more "physically fit" to fight the financial battle without hardship. Therefore I hope those falling in this class will not be permitted to be less patriotic when it comes to sending their money to the front than when it was urged by many of them that some sons should be sent to the front.

When I have more time and on another occasion I expect to present to you gentlemen of the House a comparison of a system of taxation of the various Governments with which we are now at war as it has been produced by the various nations now at war. I have been working at this comparison and note that the United States Government is enabled to avert some errors that have taken place in other countries. In conclusion I want to congratulate you for the effort that has been put forth by this Congress in trying to solve rightly the many problems that have confronted this House. The work that has fallen upon the shoulders of this Congress is more difficult than any legislation that has attracted the attention of our National Congress since the time of the foundation of this Government; and if we will take time and consult the record and not rely upon hearsay we will find a world of work has been accomplished by patient, industrious activity and thought. May we each continue to feel the great responsibility that will rest upon us throughout this war, and may we, without the flagging of energy, pursue diligently our line of work with an eye single to that and that alone in doing that which is best and most honorable and right, and which will the best perpetuate and preserve the principles upon which this Government is founded.

In conclusion, let me say, let us make the war profits and large incomes go far in meeting the war's expenses. They are "more physically fit." The burden will thus be lessened on those who have to toil and struggle for a livelihood.

Let us draft the large incomes and big profits, and give exemption as much as possible from taxes to the poor and those less able to bear the burden of war.

War Revenue Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, on May 19, 1917, when the war-revenue bill was under consideration in the House of Representatives, I offered the following amendment:

Amendment offered by Mr. LONERGAN: Page 23, line 21, section 505, clause (a), after the word "called," insert "except that on policies of group life insurance covering groups of not less than 100 lives in the employ of the same person, firm, or corporation, the tax shall be equivalent to 2 cents on each $100, or fractional part thereof, of the amount for which any life is insured under any such policy or other instrument."

A report of the discussion thereon may be found in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD on pages 2620, 2621, 2622, and 2623.

The amendment was not adopted, but within a few days after the offering thereof it was agreed that it would be incorporated in the bill when it reached the Senate.

The insurance section, known as No. 504, was stricken from the bill by the Senate committee, and up to the receipt of a copy of the conference report on yesterday it was generally believed that there would be no insurance section in the bill. It appears that the House conferees insisted that it be retained, and it is referred to on page 41 of the conference report and is known as amendment No. 167. When it was reincorporated in the bill the understanding regarding the provision of the amendment which I offered on May 19 last was inadvertently overlooked.

A conference report can not be amended and therefore there can be no remedy at this time unless the House votes to instruct the conferees to incorporate the amendment in the bill before final passage. But it is evident that a bill of such magnitude and with so many items will not be delayed in its passage on account of the oversight, which can be corrected at a subsequent date by special legislation, a bill proposing which will be introduced in the House.

OF

HON. JOHN M. C. SMITH,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. SMITH of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted me by the House I wish to extend my remarks on the war-revenue bill by incorporating a table published by the New York World of September 30 ultimo, showing the approximate amount to be raised and the business taxed:

TAXES IMPOSED BY WAR-REVENUE BILL TO RAISE $2,606,320,000.

The war-revenue bill, as finally agreed on by the House and Senate conferees and as it will probably be enacted into law, provides for the raising of approximately $2,606,320,000, as follows:

Income tax	$842,000,000
Excess-profits tax	1,110,000,000
Distilled spirits	135,000,000
Rectified spirits	5,000,000
Fermented liquors	46,000,000
Wines, etc	10,000,000
Soft drinks, sirups, etc	14,000,000
Cigars	10,000,000
Cigarettes	20,000,000
Tobacco	25,000,000
Snuff	1,500,000
Cigarette papers	200,000
Freight transportation	77,500,000
Express and parcel post	16,000,000
Passenger transportation	56,000,000
Pipe lines	4,500,000
Seats and berths	2,250,000
Telegraph and telephone messages	7,000,000
Insurance policies (new)	5,000,000
Automobiles (sale of)	40,000,000
Musical instruments (sale of)	4,300,000
Motion-picture films	3,000,000
Jewelry (sale by manufacturer)	4,500,000
Sporting goods	1,200,000
Pleasure boats	500,000
Perfumes and cosmetics	1,900,000
Proprietary medicines	3,000,000
Cameras	750,000
Admissions	50,000,000
Club dues	1,200,000
Schedule A, including playing cards	30,000,000
War estate tax	5,000,000
Virgin Island products	20,000
First-class mail matter	60,000,000
Second-class mail matter	14,000,000
Total	2,606,320,000

I am not unmindful that this bill carries a very large amount. This is justified by the great war in which we are now engaged. To be effective we must make huge appropriations and raise a large army. We must win the war at whatever cost and sacrifice, and while we have never been a military nation in that we were prepared with a large army at the outbreak of the war, we were and are well prepared financially, and so I not only willingly support this bill but deem it our duty to vote sufficient men and money to win this war at all hazards in the shortest possible time, and teach the war lords of the central powers that they can not conquer the world or the American Republic. Everything for victory.

War Revenue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
HON. CHARLES C. KEARNS,
OF OHIO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. KEARNS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave given me to print I want to submit the following letter I have received for the consideration of the membership of this House:

THE AMERICAN PAD & TEXTILE CO.,
Greenfield, Ohio, September 28, 1917.

Hon. C. C. KEARNS,
House of Representatives, Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: With reference to pending revenue bill, there is just one point to which we wish to make brief reference. This has to do with the excess-profits feature. Our first impression was that an average of profits earned over the prewar years of 1911, 1912, and 1913 were to be taken as the basis in determining excess profits during the past year. That, we believe, would be fair to all. Later, if we correctly understood the matter, it was proposed to use 10 per cent of the capital as a basis and take everything above that as excess profits. Finally, if rightly informed, instead of using 10 per cent of capital invested, it has been changed to 7 per cent.

It is not our purpose to enter into any lengthy discussion. We just merely want to place ourselves on record as being willing to assume our fair share of the burden and as doing it cheerfully. However, we believe fairness should prevail and that no burden should be imposed which threatens the future prosperity of American industries. We feel that it will be fair, equitable, and right to use as the basis the average profits for the three years above mentioned and that the measure should be passed in this form instead of fixing the basis as 7 per cent or 10 per cent of capital.

With best wishes, we are,
Sincerely,
CHAS. MAINS, President.

The Soldiers' Insurance Bill.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. EDWARD KEATING,
OF COLORADO,
IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, September 14, 1917.

Mr. KEATING. Mr. Speaker, the pending bill, as I read it, aims to accomplish five things:

First. Fair allowances for the dependents of the soldiers serving with the colors.

Second. A savings system through which soldiers, particularly those who have no dependents, may be encouraged to set aside a part of their pay and thus accumulate a "stake" in anticipation of their discharge from the Army.

Third. A system of insurance which will enable soldiers to buy insurance from the Government at peace rates.

Fourth. A revised pension system, which the supporters of the bill assure us is more scientific than the existing law.

Fifth. A plan for the reeducation or rehabilitation of those soldiers who are so disabled as to be unable to pursue their usual vocations.

I am in complete sympathy with that program. The bill before us is not a perfect measure and should be amended, but in principle it is a splendid piece of constructive legislation.

The young men who are now gathering in the mobilization camps are prepared to lay down their lives for us. While we are enjoying our ease in comfortable homes they will be enduring the rigors of trench life. While we are going about the streets, unmolested and unafraid, they will be "going over the top" to encounter the indescribable terrors of "No Man's Land."

When peace comes—and may God, in his infinite mercy, hasten its coming—some will return in all the splendor of triumphant youth, and some will return broken in body, mind, and spirit, but some—thousands and possibly tens of thousands—will never return.

How can we "compensate" these men? In a sense it is impossible to "compensate" them. Their work can not be measured in dollars and cents. The love of a grateful Nation is the only adequate reward for their sacrifice, and that they will have in generous measure.

"SOLDIERS BACK OF THE LINES."

This bill is unique in at least one particular. For the first time in our history we have undertaken to provide for the "soldiers back of the lines"—the women and children who remain at home when the men go to the front to fight our battles.

The bravest battle that ever was fought!
Shall I tell you where and when?
On the maps of the world you will find it not—
'Tis fought by the mothers of men.
Nay, not with cannon or battle shot,
With sword or nobler pen!
Nay, not with eloquent words of thought
From mouths of wonderful men;
But deep in the walled-up woman's heart—
Of woman that would not yield,
But bravely, silently, bore her part—
Lo, there is that battle field!
No marshaling troop, no bivouac song,
No banner to gleam and wave;
But, oh! their battles, they last, they last,
From babyhood to the grave.
Yet faithful still, as a bridge of stars,
She fights in her walled-up town—
Fights on and on in endless wars,
Then silent, unseen, goes down.
Oh, ye with banners and battle shot,
And soldiers to shout and praise,
I tell you the kingliest victories fought
Were fought in those silent ways.
Oh, spotless woman in a world of shame,
With splendid and silent scorn,
Go back to God as white as you came—
This kingliest warrior born.

ALLOTMENTS FOR DEPENDENTS.

The soldier who serves in France will receive $33 a month. If he has a wife, or wife and children, he will be required to allot $15 a month to them. To this the Government will add $15 for the wife, $10 for one child, $17.50 for two children, and $5 for each additional child. If the soldier has additional relatives dependent on him he may allot further sums for their support and the Government will contribute in proportion.

Suppose a soldier has a wife, three children, and a mother dependent on him. He must allot $15 for the support of his wife and children, and he may contribute $5 to his mother. The Government will then add $37.50 for the wife and children and $10 for the mother. Thus the soldier's dependents would receive from all sources $67.50 a month.

CONTRAST WITH THE CIVIL WAR.

Veterans of the Civil War will recall that when they were fighting under Grant and Sherman and Sheridan their dependents—if they had any—were compelled to shift for themselves or appeal to the charity of friends. To make matters worse, our Civil War heroes were paid in depreciated currency. At times they did not receive more than $4 or $5 a month in gold.

For 50 years we have been endeavoring to make amends for our shameful treatment of the men who saved the Union, but many of the most deserving never had an opportunity to share the Nation's bounty. Death claimed them before pension laws were enacted.

In this war we intend to start right and deal justly by our soldiers and their dependents while they are still alive.

The old pension laws granted inadequate allowances to widows. The widow of a volunteer killed in the Philippines is enitled to $12 with $2 additional for each child. Under the new law a widow will receive $35 a month with $10 additional for one child, $20 for two children, and $5 each for additional children. Similarly generous provisions are made for dependent parents.

CLASS DISTINCTIONS REMOVED.

In this connection the House, by what was practically a unanimous vote, decided that so far as pensions are concerned officers and privates, or their dependents, should be placed on an exact equality.

Ours is an army of democracy, and at the very threshold of the great struggle we should do what we can to wipe out class distinctions.

The new pensions for disabled and partially disabled soldiers are in some respects not as generous as under the old law, but it is not believed the changes will work a hardship on anyone.

The insurance provision of the new law has provoked much discussion. The insurance companies do not want Uncle Sam to go into the insurance business. They made a hard fight against that part of the bill in the House and they will make a more bitter struggle in the Senate.

COST OF INSURANCE.

As the bill stands the Government offers insurance up to $10,000 to all officers and men at what it would actually cost in peace times.

The average price will be about $8 per $1,000 per year. The insurance companies which will insure soldiers at all charge $58 per $1,000 for the same kind of insurance. The companies are justified in making this high rate, for soldiering in these days is an extrahazardous business. But the ordinary soldier is not able to pay it. If the Government refuses to aid him, he must go into battle without insurance.

Should we who remain at home in comfort and safety ask him to make the sacrifice? I do not think so.

And if we give him insurance, should we not say to him, "We will give you this insurance for exactly what it would cost you if you were not risking your life for us"?

EXAGGERATED ESTIMATES.

The opponents of the insurance scheme are endeavoring to frighten the people with estimates of the probable cost. One eminent gentleman said it would involve an expenditure of $1,800,000,000 the second year of the war. This is the veriest nonsense.

If we send a million men into the trenches and 250,000 of them are killed or totally disabled and every one carries the maximum insurance of $10,000, the total cost to the Government will not exceed $150,000,000 a year. The explanation is that the insurance is to be paid on the installment plan, and the payments under a $10,000 policy would be about $600 a year.

Of course, all the soldiers will not take out insurance, and, with God's help, our casualties will never reach the appalling figures I have indicated. However, should the gloomiest predictions be realized, this Nation is rich enough to take care of the dependents of the men who fall in its defense.

RECONSTRUCTING MAIMED.

Another feature of the bill which, curiously enough, has attracted slight attention provides that the Government shall attempt to reconstruct or rehabilitate the soldiers who are maimed, Training schools and hospitals, supervised by the greatest experts in the world, are expected to do the work.

Marvelous things along these lines have been accomplished in Europe. A great expert estimates that 80 per cent of the war cripples are capable of rehabilitation. More than half of these, he says, may be restored to full capacity. The remainder may be partially restored. Only 20 per cent will remain helpless. This is the most cheering news that has come to us from the blood-soaked Old World, and it indicates a field of endeavor on which the best brains of America should be focussed.

Mr. Speaker, I can not conclude this very brief review of the pending bill in any more appropriate way than by quoting the following paragraph from a letter written by Secretary of the Treasury William G. McAdoo to President Wilson:

> It may be suggested that the cost of this system is too great. Personally I have no patience with such a suggestion; I confess that I have only compassion for it. If, under this measure, the annual cost of doing justice to our fighting men and their dependents should amount to five, six, or seven hundred million dollars per annum at the crest of the load, it is an insignificant sum as compared with what those men do for their country and for the world. At this time we are contemplating expenditures during the fiscal year 1918 of more than $10,000,000,000 for the prosecution of the war—for the creation of armies and death-dealing instruments to be used in destroying enough human life to restore peace and justice in the world. Shall we hesitate to expend $700,000,000 more per annum if need be—only about 6 per cent of the amount we propose to expend for purposes of the war—for the protection of the widows and orphans, the dependent, and the injured, who, after all, make the greatest sacrifices of any part of our people, for the safety, security, and honor of our country?

Conscription of Aliens.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. AUGUSTINE LONERGAN,

OF CONNECTICUT,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, October 2, 1917.

Mr. LONERGAN. Mr. Speaker, when I cite the official statistics in the office of the Provost Marshal General of the Army as showing that of the 159,955 registered on June 5 in Connecticut under the selective-conscription law 58,631 were aliens, I think the reason for my remarks on so important a subject as the conscription of aliens is immediately clear. It must also be borne in mind that these 58,631, while classified as aliens, do not include aliens who have taken out their first citizenship papers, and who, if they insist, are exempted from military duty with our troops under existing treaties between the United States and the respective mother country of the different men. With 36.6 per cent of the total men of registered age exempt legally and a probable addition of several per cent exempt by insisting on treaty rights, we have at once a condition wherein nearly half the total registered men of the State are beyond the law. The corollary is that American citizens are doing twice their share. Where one American citizen should be marching into camp side by side with one foreign-born resident, who perhaps has long enjoyed the hospitality of this land, two Americans are actually going into camp, leaving the alien behind to smile, to enjoy the high wages necessarily following on manufacturing prosperity, to hold the positions from which the citizenry has been called.

The unfairness of this is too manifest to need proof.

Connecticut is an industrial State. Which brings me directly to another feature of the draft not to be passed over in silence. I note that the estimated population of the State, on which the quota of 18,817 men was established, is placed at 1,719,623. If there are 1,719,623 people in Connecticut to-day, 300,000 of them are located where no one but the man who estimated that population can find them. The governor of the State can not ascertain their whereabouts. The mayors of the different cities do not know where they are. The State council of defense never heard of them. They were not around a few months before, when an official State census of men able to bear arms was taken. Hartford, my home town, and the capital of the State, is credited with 180,697 inhabitants, while the whole city knows that if we had more than 150,000 we would declare a legal holiday and celebrate. New Britain, the second largest city in the district which I have the honor to represent, is credited with 76,942, but as much as the proud residents would like to have it so, modestly they must admit they are several thousand below that figure. So it is in all industrial centers.

To be more exact, the population of Connecticut, according to the official Federal census of 1910, was 1,114,756. The Connecticut military census, taken a few months before the Federal registration, showed there were 506,552 cards returned of men over 16 years of age. Of this number, according to the report of the State council of defense, 153,067 were between the ages of 21 and 30 years, less 1 per cent for duplicates, or 151,067 men of the age required under the later Federal law to register. But the Federal registration returned 160,269 men of military age. Taking the State figures, the council estimates 506,552, less 1 per cent for duplicates, or 501,487 men in the State able to bear arms. Adding 6 per cent to correct errors, or 30,089, it shows a total male population of 16 years and upwards of 531,576. Allowing 202,775 as the male population under 14 years of age and 10,653 of 15 years of age, the council records a total male population of 745,004. On the proportion of 105 females to every hundred males, it arrives at a total female population of 709,500, or a total population for the State of 1,454,504. It will be seen at once that these figures are generous, and when compared with the estimated Government population of 1,719,623 show a discrepancy of 265,119. The Government, however, levies a grand quota for the draft of 18,817 men, but, thanks to the patriotism of the men of the State, credits for the Army and for the National Guard bring the net quota to 10,977.

The whole State has no more important question before it to-day than the question of correcting the Federal estimates of population, so as to bring the results nearer to the facts. The attention of the War Department and of the Census Bureau has already been directed to it. The Census Bureau states that it estimated the population on the number of men registered, figuring the men between the ages of 21 and 30 at 9.32 per cent of the total population. That this method is as fair as it is supposed to be remains to be proven. The Secretary of Commerce, in a letter to the President of the United States Senate under date of July 18, 1917, states that as "it was impossible in any event to estimate precisely the population of the cities, counties, and States on the basis of registration, the simplest and speediest method * * * was adopted." And the Bureau of the Census, prefacing its Estimates of Population as of July 1, 1917, says, "One reason of employment of this method was that the Census Bureau had only a very short time in which to prepare the estimates, etc."

I do not wish it to be understood that I fail to appreciate the necessity of speed in the premises in order that our military strength might be used as quickly as possible, but, obviously, where speed is paramount accuracy necessarily plays a second part.

Gen. Crowder, Provost Marshal General, in a letter covering the situation from the standpoint of the War Department, closes with the question as to whether it would not be—> the part of wisdom to allow this question to remain undisturbed by legislation until the first draft is completed, in order that it may be determined whether in the interests of fairness throughout the Nation a new basis for a future draft should be provided by law.

Public opinion in Connecticut, impelled alone by patriotism, rather accedes to this suggestion.

At the same time it is well to record here that the United States Senate has already voted to accept the amendment proposed by Senator BRANDEGEE, of Connecticut, to the "Act to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States," which provides that—in the future operation of the said selective-draft act of May 18, 1917, credit shall be given the several States or localities or districts for the increased number of citizens heretofore drawn, which excess or increase was caused by the fact that aliens were registered in computing the number subject to the draft but were not themselves subject thereto.

While all this is looking toward the future, something must be done now. Drafting the alien, while it will not correct any overestimates of population, will make more equitable the obligation to service. It will relieve the drain on American manhood. It will bring home most quickly to the stranger within our gates that if the blessings of our democracy are invaluable in times of peace the duty one owes that democracy is all important in war. It will, moreover, be a strong assurance to the foreign born already made citizens that their neighbors by neglecting citizenship are not by this neglect to be encouraged to become slackers.

The opinion prevalent in the street on this point is the same that has been given expression over the signature of the governor of the State and of the executives of its leading cities. Members of the bench informally have recognized the justice of it. From the pulpits it has been preached. The press has given it publicity.

Connecticut is always ready to do its share. All it asks is fairness. Yes, it is ready to do more than its share; and here I may briefly enumerate some of its activities.

I have consulted with the heads of the various departments at Washington with a view to having figures compiled, in so far as Connecticut is concerned, and the results tell the whole story.

Brig. Gen. H. P. McCain, The Adjutant General of the Army, states that Connecticut's total quota for the Regular Army is 2,228, and that the official figures of the War Department as of August 24 show Connecticut had secured her quota at that time, and that, in fact, 2,419 of the men who presented themselves in Connecticut were accepted for enlistment in the Regular Army from April 1 to August 24, 1917. The Chief of the Militia Bureau, Brig. Gen. William A. Mann, now commander of the Rainbow Division, of which some of the Connecticut troops are a part, stated that the official records in his office as of July 31 showed there were 150 officers and 5,091 enlisted men in the Connecticut National Guard who were taken into the Federal service. In addition, Connecticut will have soon placed under arms in the new National Army her quota of nearly 11,000 men, secured under the selective draft.

Secretary of the Navy Josephus Daniels informed me that on August 23, according to official figures, there were in the Navy 140,870 enlisted men, of whom Connecticut has supplied a representative quota.

Of the total amount subscribed for the first liberty loan, which reached more than $3,000,000,000 and made 4,000,000 Government bondholders in the country where there were but 300,000 before, Connecticut, as figures secured from the Treasury Department and from the office of Gov. Aiken, of the Federal Reserve Bank of Boston, show, subscribed $28,982,450, or $5,000,000 more than its quota of $23,200,000. Of the State's total, Hartford County subscribed $18,609,050 and the city of Hartford nearly $12,000,000.

The State also played a prominent part in the campaign of the Red Cross to secure $100,000,000, the total contributions from the State as of August 22, last, being $2,667,978.07, of which $690,806.94 was contributed by residents of Hartford County. The total secured by the Red Cross from the campaign throughout the country was $120,929,751.12, according to the report of the Secretary, dated August 28. In the State of Connecticut, also, there are 89,749 members of the Red Cross, and Hartford County has 20,200 of these.

The Navy League of the United States, incorporated to be of every service possible to the men of the fleet, has in Connecticut 850 members, of whom 149 members reside in Hartford. Mr. A. H. Dadmun, secretary of the league, informs me that in addition there are many thousands in the State in the Woman's League, an auxiliary of the organization.

All this shows in a national way the place the State has taken in the great war; and, besides, the State Council of Defense, the home guard, and other organizations are all working to show the State's "bit" is a substantial contribution.

I hope that, in a measure at least, I have made my point clear. We are living in abnormal times. The energies of the greatest nations of the world are turned from constructive efforts of peace to the destruction war entails. "The genius of the American Nation," a prominent writer tells us, "is for peace." It is by our joint efforts that the war will be won. The machinery of the War Department, from handling less than 100,000 men, is suddenly taxed to the extent of controlling 1,000,000 men and more. Our Navy proudly boasts an enrollment of nearly 150,000. Through it all, we are learning day by day, where one law is at fault, why another law is inadequate. New conditions demand new measures. Connecticut is patient; it has been called "The land of steady habits." But it asks, and asks in all fairness, that the sacrifices it is called upon to make be commensurate with its strength.

The First Six Months' Progress of the Great War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HENRY Z. OSBORNE,

OF CALIFORNIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917,

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. OSBORNE. Mr. Speaker, there are many things in this war-revenue bill, as finally reported by the conference committee of the two Houses, which my best judgment leads me to believe would be better left out, or modified.

In the first place, I believe that it is about twice as large in amount as it ought to be, as I expressed myself when it was before the House on May 22.

I believe that the increase of first-class mail rates is inadvisable, and that the establishment of a zone system for second-class mail matter is a step back toward provincialism. The rate for second-class matter ought to be large enough to pay its cost, fairly estimated, making advertising matter pay a larger rate than reading matter. But the rate for distributing intelligence, whether by letter or newspaper, ought to be a flat rate, in the interest of nationalism as distinguished from localism, or provincialism. The system of zone rates applied to parcel post and other freight is right, but is not right as applied to the distribution of intelligence, education, and information.

There are many features of the bill that in my individual judgment would be better otherwise. Despite these views, and despite the fact that I do not expect the bill to be changed in any particular, I intend to vote for it as a whole, as the combined best judgment of the two Houses of Congress, and because we must raise a vast amount of revenue to carry on the war, and probably it would be impossible to devise any revenue bill that would be satisfactory to all, or even to all who really regard the tax question from a disinterested and unbiased standpoint.

Upon the final passage of this war-revenue bill, which will occur in the House this afternoon, it is a fitting time to make a review and a summing up of the progress which has been made by the United States during the first six months of its active participation in the great world war.

SIX MONTHS' PROGRESS IN THE GREAT WAR.

During that historic period, as a Representative in Congress, it has been my fortune to be at the center of our national life. I have witnessed the rude awakening of the Nation from the calm dreams of peace and pleasure to the conscious strength and dignity of a mighty power at war. I have been a witness to the struggles in the National Legislature to organize that strength and to proudly assert that dignity, and have taken my humble but earnest part on the side of the freedom, the honor, and the liberty of our country, as against an autocratic, disdainful, and treacherous enemy.

I shall soon return to California to render an account of my stewardship. Briefly, I can say that my voice and my vote have been devoted to every measure that came before Congress calculated to strengthen our country in this unparalleled emergency. Greatly as I deplore the necessity of war, as does every conscientious man and woman, I voted for a declaration of the state of war on April 5, and I thereafter voted for every measure presented to Congress conferring power of every kind—men, money, and authority—upon our President, under our Constitution the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy, with which to successfully wage that war.

I shall be able to take a message of good cheer and encouragement from the National Capital to the people. They hear through the public press of all manner of errors and mistakes, and wordy squabbles among public men. They naturally hear more of such things than they do of the great agencies that are working smoothly, and thus making less noise. There have been plenty of errors and mistakes committed and there will be plenty more. But upon the whole, the progress that has been made, the organizations that have been effected, and the results that have been achieved during the past six months, are so wonderful as to entirely overshadow the failures, and give hope and courage to every loyal heart.

When the Congress met in extraordinary session at the call of the President, on the 2d of April last, we were utterly unprepared for war. We had an Army of a little more than 100,000 enlisted men, and 163,000 in the National Guard. Our Navy was scantily manned with 77,000 men. We had a few submarines, but none of the latest formidable type. The whole equipment of the United States Army in aeroplanes was less than 200, all of small horsepower, useful as training machines, but not one with sufficient power or of suitable construction to be used as a battle plane on the fields of Europe. Under the stimulus of foreign demand, foodstuffs were advancing rapidly and alarmingly in price. Neutral ships were carrying off our food supplies to neutral countries adjacent to Germany, whence they were being forwarded with scarcely an attempt at concealment, to feed the armies of the Kaiser. There was no law or power in existence that could check these abuses.

The mobilization and concentration of the powers of the Nation for its defense commenced with the meeting of Congress. Boards and committees of patriotic and capable citizens in various lines of industry were formed and began their herculean labors. But for a time so upset and mixed up were the conditions that to one observing their operations at close quarters it seemed that they were running about in circles, crossing each other's tracks and fields of usefulness, and further confounding the already supreme confusion. The Shipping Board controversy was one example of this confusion, and there were many others. There were some big men on these boards, patriotic men, who had quit positions at high salaries at home, with no other object than to serve their country, but frequently there were no laws that would permit them to act except in an advisory capacity.

Congress, however, recognized the necessity for extending extraordinary powers to the President to be exercised through these boards and commissions, although these grants of power were fought with great bitterness by a minority in both the House and Senate. I am glad to say that I earnestly supported every one of these grants of power asked for the national administration, except the one providing an extremely rigid censorship of the press, which I deemed excessive in scope. It was stricken out of what is known as the espionage act.

Gradually, however, and with increasing rapidity the confusion commenced to disappear. A more marked spirit of cooperation developed. Congress generously voted the powers and the money, and the great boards and commissions, in cooperation with the regular departments of the Government, especially those of the War and the Navy, began to show results.

So we are able to take the good news home that the giant American national power is in motion. Remember, it is but a little more than six months ago that it was first aroused from a sleep of peace of a half century's duration. To-day the President, the Congress, the various departments, and the great boards and commissions which were organized for war purposes are all working harmoniously and to the one great end of American success in war.

An official statement made on September 6, 1917, showed that on that date the total armed strength of the Army and Navy was 1,074,146 men, of which 819,881 were of the Army and 254,265 of the Navy. All of these are volunteers, and since the war was declared 1,300,000 have volunteered their services in one form or another. The selective draft has added 687,000 men, who are now assembling at the training camps, giving a total membership of our Army and Navy of 1,750,000 gallant and loyal American soldiers and sailors. This is an achievement of six memorable months that may well be gratifying to every American citizen.

The assembling and the arming and equipping of this army has been another vast task. Sixteen cantonments, practically each a city, capable of housing 40,000 men, in different parts of the United States, with streets, drilling and parade grounds, water and sewer systems, and all necessary conveniences, have been laid out and constructed, after searching up and leasing or purchasing the grounds, which in some cases cover 15 square miles.

For the purpose of meeting the destruction of German submarines, the long-neglected art of shipbuilding in the United States has been revived, and hundreds of steel and wooden ships have been contracted for and are in course of construction at old and new shipyards along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts. Soon the American flag will be floating over the decks of American merchant ships sailing the seas of the world, from which it has long been absent.

Leaving the sea for the realms of the air, we are now constructing hundreds of airplanes for battle use, of types equal to the best in the world. As our construction is all new, we hope to have them of a better average than those of any other nation. The factor of greatest importance in an airplane is that of the motor, as upon its power and speed must depend the possibility of its success in battle against the enemy. The combined mechanical skill of the United States has been employed in the construction of a motor for airplanes, with a result which is said to be eminently satisfactory, even in comparison with the truly wonderful motors used by our allies, as well as by our enemies.

EMBARGO ON FOOD SUPPLIES TO GERMANY.

The stream of food supplies from our country to Germany, which was constantly passing out on neutral vessels to neutral countries adjacent to Germany, and thence passed across the border into Germany itself or was retained in the neutral countries while an equal quantity of such supplies produced in such neutral countries was exported into Germany, has been stopped through the embargo law passed by Congress. I was in New York City in the latter part of July, shortly after the President had put into effect this embargo law. The spectacle of neutral ships at anchor in the Hudson River and in the lower bay, which vessels had been stopped by the embargo, was a striking illustration of the stupendous character of this output of food supplies. Not less than 50, and perhaps 100, of these vessels, loaded to the guards were detained at anchor in the stream. Their names in large letters were painted on the sides, with the names of their home ports and the painted flags of the neutral nation sometimes stretched from one end of the vessel to the other. The ports of Rotterdam, Amsterdam, Stockholm, and Copenhagen were those which were most in evidence. The stoppage of this flood of food supplies going to feed the enemy of our soldiers in the field has doubtless had a very salutary effect in enemy countries.

FOOD CONTROL AT HOME.

The adoption of the food-control bill by Congress was another marked step in the progress of the war. The United States and Argentina were the only two countries which could produce food supplies for the allies to any great extent. There were agents of all the allied countries in the United States buying our surplus grain and food supplies, and as they were absolutely necessary they were paying almost any prices and bidding against each other and against our own people. These facts, combined with a natural alarm upon the part of our own people, created a condition most favorable to reckless speculation. There was no way of preventing the forcing of food supply prices to absolutely impossible figures, excepting the power of the General Government. In normal times the rule of supply and demand may be relied upon to fairly control prices, but here was a condition that the ordinary rules of supply and demand did not cover. The passage and approval of the food-control bill will probably not accomplish everything that was predicted for it, but that it has prevented the putting up of prices so high as to threaten starvation to great numbers of our people, which would have resulted in physical suffering, rioting, and bloodshed there can be little doubt.

The President chose for administrator of this very difficult problem a young citizen of California—Mr. Herbert Hoover—whose great work as the head of the Belgian relief organization had pointed him out as better qualified for this duty than any other American was known to be. The fixing of prices at a figure sufficiently high to stimulate production, which is an absolute necessity, is incompatible with very low prices of foodstuffs; so we may not anticipate any considerable reduction in prices. But we have a fairly good assurance that they will not advance to the fabulous figures which would have been inevitable had there been no food control.

FUEL, STEEL, IRON, AND COPPER.

As measures of war necessity the Congress and the President have taken similar measures with respect to fuel, steel, iron, and copper. A price was fixed sufficiently large to stimulate production and to give a fair return to producers, without permitting opportunities for enormous raising of prices through speculators or through different departments of the Government or allied Governments, bidding against each other and creating an unnatural and abnormal price.

SUMMARY OF GREAT WAR MEASURES.

There has been some criticism of Congress upon the part of those who believe that there should have been greater expedition in the passage of war measures. It should be remembered, however, that the change from peace to war is of such an extraordinary character that it requires some time, not only for the people of the country, but for the membership of Congress itself, to become familiar with the necessity for drastic and warlike measures. There was, as it is proper that there should be in the Congress of the United States, much discussion upon the great principles involved. The great war measures were enacted in the following order:

Congress met in extraordinary session at noon of April 2, 1917. The House organized by the election of a Speaker and other officers, and appointed a few necessary committees on that day. At 8 o'clock the same evening the President appeared in person before the two Houses of Congress, and in the presence of the Supreme Court of the United States, the Diplomatic Corps with all the representatives of foreign powers at peace with the United States, and with the galleries overflowing with distinguished citizens, delivered his famous war message.

On April 5, between 2 and 3 o'clock in the morning, the House passed the declaration of the state of war which had come from the Senate, and it received the approval of the President.

April 24 the President approved the great liberty bond bill of $7,000,000,000 for the purpose of conducting the war.

May 10 the President approved the joint resolution authorizing the seizure of interned German ships.

May 12 the first special war appropriation bill was passed.

May 16 the President approved the bill increasing the Navy and Marine Corps to 150,000 men.

May 18 the selective-draft bill was approved and became a law.

June 15 the espionage bill was approved, and also the first special urgent deficiency war appropriation bill.

August 10 the food-survey and food-control laws became effective.

September 24 the President approved the second great bond bill of $11,000,000,000.

In the latter part of September the war emergency appropriation bill for $8,000,000,000 was approved.

In October the soldiers' and sailors' insurance bill and the enormous war-revenue tax bills will no doubt be approved.

WHY ARE WE IN THE WAR?

The question is frequently asked, Why are we in the war?

Frankly, I agree with the distinguished Secretary of the Interior—our fellow Californian—who said that "We are in the war because we could not keep out."

The President in his humane desire to avoid war had receded from one point to another until he could go no further. There was no alternative except that of backing down completely or of accepting the challenge of Germany and going to war. There was also the practical certainty that war could not be eventually avoided, even by the most complete and abject recession upon the great point at issue at the time, that of murderous and unrestricted submarine warfare. Evidently it would have only postponed the war between Germany and the United States until the close of the European war, when Germany would have had a freer hand to deal with us and wring from us the necessary billions to pay her war expenses.

Our Government was in possession of ample knowledge that war with Germany could not be avoided, and the only question involved was as to whether it should be now, when we could join our strength to those powerful countries allied at war with Germany or whether it should be postponed until a time when Germany could take up the questions at issue with the United States unencumbered by the struggle with these other powers.

There is sufficient evidence upon which to base this conviction, which was undoubtedly held by our President and his advisers. While our neutrality laws had from the beginning given Germany the same opportunity of purchasing supplies and ammunition in the United States that were given to the allied powers, Germany, owing to the control of the seas by Great Britain, was not in a position where she could avail herself of our neutrality. The German Government, however, would never accept this theory, and practically insisted that as Germany was unable to trade with the United States in food supplies and munitions of war, it was our duty to refuse trade with other countries.

The United States had also taken a position offensive to Germany in its sympathy for Belgium. We were shocked at the invasion and destruction of that country, an act which was not defended even by the German Emperor except upon the ground of military necessity. It is true that our Government never officially protested against this monstrous act, and it is to our shame, mitigated only by our extreme desire to maintain peace, that at least a vigorous protest had not been made at the time. Notwithstanding the absence of an official condemnation of the invasion of Belgium, Germany well knew from the expressions of our free press and the utterances of public men that the destruction of Belgium was held in abhorrence in this country.

The vigorous objections which had been made by the United States to the claim of right to debar neutral vessels from hundreds of miles of the open sea off the coast of Europe, and the destruction of such neutral ships by submarines as a penalty for entering this unauthorized zone, was another grievance of the German Government. When many of our vessels had been torpedoed, with loss of American lives, and the great British steamer Lusitania was sunk without warning, with a loss of life of 114 American men, women, and children, our Government made such a vigorous protest that the German Government promised that further sinkings without warning would be avoided.

All these various interferences—not with the rights but with the will of the German Government—which we could not in decency have avoided constituted in their eyes a great number of offenses which they had determined to avenge at the close of the European war, a decision which they were at little pains to conceal.

BULLYRAGGING THE AMERICAN AMBASSADOR.

The American ambassador to Germany, Hon. James W. Gerard, has recently published the memoirs of his experience during his term of service at Berlin. In this valuable contribution to the history of the great war, describing the submarine controversy, Mr. Gerard makes the following statement:

> During this winter of submarine controversy an interview with Von Tirpitz, thinly veiled as an interview with a "high naval authority," was published in the usually most conservative of newspapers, the Frankfurter Zeitung. In this interview the "high naval authority" advocated ruthless submarine war with England and promised to bring about thereby the speedy surrender of that country. After the surrender, which was to include the whole British fleet, the German fleet, with the surrendered British fleet added to its force, was to sail for America and exact from that country indemnities enough to pay the whole cost of the war.
> After his fall Von Tirpitz, in a letter to some admirers who had sent him verses and a wreath, advocated holding the coast of Flanders as a necessity for the war against England and America.

Mr. Gerard also describes an interview which he had with Emperor William at the new palace at Potsdam on October 22, 1915. He states that the interview lasted about an hour and a quarter and that he and the Emperor were alone in the room. He described the dress of the Emperor and said:

> The Emperor was standing, so, naturally, I also stood; and, according to his habit, which is quite "Rooseveltian," he stood very close to me and talked very earnestly. I was fortunately able to clear up two distinct points which he had against America * * *. The Emperor showed great bitterness against the United States and repeatedly said, "America had better look out after this war," and "I shall stand no nonsense from America after this war."

Ambassador Gerard describes a scene at a social function given at the residence of one of the cabinet ministers in January, 1917. Mr. Gerard states that from early in 1915 until he left Germany he never had a conversation with a German without his alluding to the sale of munitions by the United States to the allies. At the party in question he states that a large German—one of the Dukes of Mecklenburg-Schwerin—> planted himself some distance away from me, and in a voice so loud, and slapping his chest so hard, that everyone in the room stopped his conversation in order to hear, addressed me in German, saying:

> "You are the American ambassador, and I want to tell you that the conduct of America in furnishing arms and ammunition to the enemies of Germany is stamped deep on the German heart; that we will never forget it and will some day have our revenge."

Mr. Gerard adds:

> As he wore on his breast the orders of the Black Eagle, the Red Eagle, the Elephant, and the Seraphim, when he struck all this menagerie the rattle alone was quite loud. I reminded him politely of The Hague Convention, of the fact that we could not change international law from time to time with the change in the situation of the war, and that Germany had furnished arms to England to use against the Boers. But he simply answered, saying, "We care nothing for treaties."

Omitting consideration of this personal attempt to bullyrag the American ambassador by titled Germans and by the Emperor himself, it shows the general feeling which pervades the ruling classes of Germany, and leaves no doubt in the mind of any thinking person that if our President had humiliated himself and the country by submitting with a mere verbal protest to the continuation of the submarine war, it would not have saved the country finally from war, but would only have postponed it.

That Germany has long contemplated the great prosperity of America with envious eyes, and that the German idea of world conquest, which has been fostered by her philosophers, her generals, and her admirals, receives a very strong evidence from a report made by the late Admiral Dewey shortly after the surrender of Manila in 1898. Admiral Dewey reports a conversation which he had with Admiral von Goetz, of the German Navy, who was a guest of the United States, a military observer of the German Navy, in 1898 in our war with Spain in Cuba, which he deemed of sufficient importance to embrace in an official report to the Navy Department at Washington. The German officer boldly warned Dewey that about 15 years from that time Germany would start a great war, take Paris, and then hurry across the channel and crush England. This will be found in United States Naval and Military Records, No. 38, volume 52, page 478. Admiral von Goetz boldly said to our officers:

About 15 years from now my country will start her great war. She will be in Paris about two months after the commencement of hostilities. Her move on Paris will be but a step to her real object—the crushing of England. * * * Some months after we finish our work in Europe we will take New York, and probably Washington, and hold them for some time. We do not propose to take any of your territory(?), but we do intend to take a billion or so of your dollars from New York and other places. The Monroe doctrine will be taken charge of by us, as we will then have to put you in your place, and we will take charge of South America, as far as we wish to. * * * Don't forget this, and about 15 years from now remember it, and it will interest you.

Evidently without any fault of our own so far as we can see, the United States was mapped out for a war with Germany, which included this enormously wealthy country in its plans for world conquest.

The American public has not forgotten the attempt made by the German fleet to interfere with Dewey in Manila Bay in that memorable month of May, 1898. Dewey stopped the interference by notifying the Germans that if they were looking for a fight they could get it right there.

THE INFAMOUS ZIMMERMANN NOTE.

The recent revelations made by our State Department of the secret correspondence and messages of German officials all go to confirm these conclusions. One of the most significant of these was the now famous dispatch of the German foreign minister Zimmermann to the German ambassador to Mexico. It is to be remembered that this dispatch was sent at a time when the United States was presumed to be on terms of perfect friendship with Germany and our Government was doing its utmost to avoid war. This message was intended to bring Mexico into war with the United States and also to entangle us in a conflict with Japan. The inducement held out to Mexico that she should retake from the United States the States of Texas, New Mexico, and Arizona would, if it were not so serious a matter in its intent, be an amusing example of the working of the German official mind. It recalls the tactics of the Evil One who took the Savior to the top of a high mountain and showed him the whole world, which would be given him if he would fall down and worship.

The message was as follows:

On the 1st of February we intend to begin submarine warfare unrestricted. In spite of this, it is our intention to endeavor to keep neutral the United States of America.

If this attempt is not successful, we propose an alliance on the following basis with Mexico:

That we shall make war together and together make peace. We shall give general financial support, and it is understood that Mexico is to reconquer the lost territory in New Mexico, Texas, and Arizona. The details are left to you for settlement.

You are instructed to inform the President of Mexico of the above in the greatest confidence as soon as it is certain that there will be an outbreak of war with the United States, and suggest that the President of Mexico, on his own initiative, should communicate with Japan suggesting adherence at once to this plan; at the same time offer to mediate between Germany and Japan.

Please call to the attention of the President of Mexico that the employment of ruthless submarine warfare now promises to compel England to make peace in a few months.

(Signed) ZIMMERMANN.

Another of the secret revelations of the War Department which has a peculiar interest to California is a secret code message of April 11, 1916, addressed to Von Igel, the German spy whose offices were raided in New York. The dispatch to Von Igel reads:

Herewith respectfully send an extract regarding the troops stationed in California and the armament of the coast fortifications.

This was a year before war was declared, and it shows that our scant military defenses on the Pacific coast were under observation for some time.

THE WAR A RESULT OF GERMAN PHILOSOPHY.

It is difficult for Americans to understand the Germanic idea of the perfection and infallibility of Germany, as expounded by its great writers and philosophers. So preposterous do these ideas appear to the average intelligent American that were it not for the terrible form which this philosophy has taken it would be regarded as a subject for humor. The average German, as we know him in the United States, is an intelligent, industrious, reasonable being and a good citizen. He obeys the laws and is loyal to the Government of his adoption. We rightly infer that the people from which he has sprung, and which he has left behind in Europe, are of the same general nature. We know that they have achieved marvels in manufacturing, in commerce, in social government, and in the arts.

If such philosophers and writers as Treitschke, Von Bernhardi, Nietzsche, Reimer, and other prominent German writers were Americans and writing for the American people, they would be treated about as seriously as have been some of our own writers, for instance, Henry George, or Mr. Bryan, or Col. Roosevelt. They would receive commendation from those who agreed with them, and they would be the subject of the cartoonists of those who did not. In Germany, however, writers of the peculiar German philosophy appear to have had a tremendous influence upon the public mind. The infallibility of Germany and of German philosophy, and particularly their own, has become an obsession with the people. The idea of German "kultur" as a superhuman development of the German mind and character and infinitely superior to that of any other country is actually taken seriously, and it is considered of so much importance that Germans are willing to die by the thousands and the millions in order to impress this philosophy, willingly or unwillingly, upon the other nations of the world. It is a harsh philosophy, carrying to the extreme, not only as a physical fact but as a moral virtue, Darwin's theory of "the survival of the fittest." It is made a great principle of ethical virtue that the weak shall be destroyed in order that the strong may become stronger.

Von Bernhardi, in his book "Germany and the Next War," published in 1913, said:

War is a biological necessity of the first importance, a regulative element in the life of mankind which can not be dispensed with, since without it an unhealthy development will follow, which excludes every advancement of the race, and therefore all civilization.

The law of the stronger holds good everywhere.

No power exists which can judge between States and makes its judgments prevail. Nothing in fact is left but war to secure to the true elements of progress the ascendancy over the spirits of corruption and decay.

Lastly, in all times the right of conquest by war has been admitted. It may be that a growing people can not win colonies from uncivilized races, and yet the State wishes to retain the surplus population which the mother country can no longer feed. Then the only recourse left is to acquire the necessary territory by war.

From this point of view efforts to secure peace are extraordinarily detrimental to the national health so soon as they influence politics.

The efforts directed toward the abolition of war must not only be termed foolish but absolutely immoral, and must be stigmatized as absolutely unworthy of the human race.

Christian morality is personal and social, and in its nature can not be political. Its object is to promote morality of the individual in order to strengthen him to work unselfishly in the interests of the community.

Reflection thus shows that war is not only an unqualified necessity but that it is justifiable from every point of view.

Reimer, in his book, A Pan-German Germany, published in 1905, said:

It is precisely our craving for expansion that drives us into the paths of conquest, and in view of which all chatter about peace and humanity can and must remain nothing but chatter.

If the nations in question have nothing Germanic in them, and are therefore foreign to our kultur, the question at once arises, Do they stand in the way of our expansion or do they not? In the latter case let them develop as their nature prescribes; in the former case it would be folly to spare them, for they would be like a wedge in our flesh which we refrained from extracting only for their own sake. If we found ourselves forced to break up the historical form of the nation in order to separate its racial elements, taking what belongs to our race and rejecting what is foreign to it, we ought not, therefore, to have any moral scruples or to think ourselves inhuman.

Nietzsche, in his book, The Joyous Wisdom, says:

Hatred, delight in mischief, rapacity, and ambition, and whatever else is called evil, belong to the marvelous economy of the conservation of the race.

Quotations of similar sentiments could be made from prominent German writers almost without limit, and these appear to be accepted as a basis of national growth and principle.

It seems a horrible perversion that a whole nation should accept such terrible doctrines of national life, so opposed as they are to the teachings of Christianity and of all religion, and so repugnant to the humane influences and principles which all agree should govern in the relation of human beings to each other, and which are accepted as well in Germany as in all other countries, as the rule of private life. The drawing of a distinction between the moral obligations of a nation and those of an individual appears to be the vital error of the German Government—that a nation may in the national interest commit all manner of offenses and crimes which in an individual universally would be regarded as infamous; that the nation may do all manner of evil in the hope "that good may come."

President Wilson, in his admirable reply to his Holiness, the Pope, obviously had this immoral distinction constantly in view.

DUTY OF CITIZENS TO THE COUNTRY.

Most people will agree that the facts which I have heretofore recited leave little or no room to doubt that at any time for the past 18 months or two years it was impossible to have avoided war with Germany, either now or at a later date. That being the fact, there is no other course to pursue but to wage war with the greatest vigor of which we are capable. Whether we could have avoided war or not, however, we are indubitably at war, and it is the duty of every citizen to sustain the Government in every way humanly possible for him to do. It is no excuse to stand back and make the claim that our entry into the war was unconstitutional—which claim has no foundation to rest upon—and by constant outcries and protests accomplish as much as possible for the cause of our foreign enemy.

We have reached a point where those who are not for us are against us, and this can not be too clearly understood.

Public arguments that would have been perfectly privileged before war was declared, if they have a tendency to give aid and comfort to the enemy, become treasonable now. Free speech is guaranteed by the Federal Constitution, but that kind of speech which would give aid and comfort to the enemy passes beyond the limits of freedom into that of license. The line of division between free speech and license is that which is determined by the fact whether it be of a character to give aid and comfort to the enemy. There are many who seem unable to draw that distinction. They should, however, give this distinction grave consideration. If they value their standing in the community and would wish their memories to be held in honor by their children, and their children's children, they will refrain from taking a position antagonistic to their country in war.

We have had in all our wars classes who were opposed to the Government. In the Revolutionary War they were known as Tories. As we look back upon it they had the basis of love of mother country, while the revolutionists were in the attitude of rebels to the authority of the mother country. Yet the Tories were held in great disesteem during the period of the Revolutionary War, and still greater after the close of that war. Many of them left their homes in the triumphant United States and returned to Great Britain, or removed to Canada, because the loyal people of America—those who had conducted the revolution—regarded them as traitors. No American of the present day who traces back his ancestry but feels a sense of disgrace if he find that some of his progenitors were Tories.

During the Civil War we had throughout the Northern States considerable numbers of people who for various reasons were antagonistic to the Union. Some believed that the Southern States had a right to withdraw from the Union. Some were related by ties of nature to the South. From a position of criticism and lack of sympathy they became active in all manner of schemes to retard the Union Government. They formed secret societies in some of the States. The cordiality with which they were hated by all loyal people was out of all proportion to the feeling entertained toward the armed and open soldiers of the Confederacy. There can not be found to-day in the United States a single person who would not conceal, if possible, the fact that he was the descendant of a "Copperhead."

We sometimes hear the statement made that we are not justified in war unless our country is invaded. Those who make this claim are loud in their protestations that if the United States were to be invaded they would do marvelous deeds of heroism. I would call the attention of all such persons to the fact that Germany, which now claims to be making a war of defense, is doing all of its fighting in foreign territory—on the east in Russia and on the west in France and Belgium. The place in which to fight a war is where the war is and where the enemy can be defeated most effectually.

Our gallant soldiers under Gen. Pershing are in the friendly country of France preparing to fight in conjunction with our allies to clear France and Belgium from the invaders. The United States is exercising every power possible to win this war, which is a war for its own defense and for the future of our country and of the world, as much as it is for the democracy of the world. Indeed, the cause of the world is wrapped up in the cause of democracy.

Let all who are in a mood of criticism of our Government for entering into war, or of the manner in which the war is being conducted, take note of the sentiment which has always prevailed after every war in regard to those whose position was equivocal and somewhat similar to their own—in the Revolutionary War and in the Civil War—and if they are unable to bring their minds to a cordial support of the Government let them quietly accept the situation as one for which they are not responsible and which they can not help, and refrain from doing their country some injury and themselves irreparable injury. Let them, with as little delay as possible, bring their minds into harmony with the patriotic spirit of the day and join heartily in the patriotic work of contributing to American victory.

Let no one doubt that the great result will be a victory for our arms and for the cause of democracy. The world is not going backward. It is not going to surrender the great progress and advance which it has made in the past 150 years and return to the autocratic conditions from which the world has nearly emerged. The American position in this war is unselfish and unattended by any desire for profit, and it will receive no profit except in the satisfaction of having saved the world from the domination of a cruel and unsympathetic autocracy.

The unanimity of the desire to serve our country in its need is one of the most cheering developments of the time, and one of the compensations, if there can be any compensation, in the great tragedy. One million three hundred thousand American men have offered their services to the country in one way and another. More than a million of these have volunteered the service of their bodies as soldiers in our Army and sailors in our Navy, as a bulwark of defense to their country. The others have offered their services in such ways as they considered themselves best qualified to act. Millions of others have changed their mode of life or increased their activities in order to contribute in some way to the general welfare. Hundreds of thousands of children in the public schools have done that which they could in the way of cultivating gardens and producing food to increase the national supplies. The unused land along the roadways, the unoccupied lots in cities, the back yards of little homes, and even the lawns in front of beautiful residences have been devoted to this cause. This desire for service has extended through all occupations and to all ranks of society. The men of greatest ability in all lines of industry—railways, vast business and manufacturing enterprises, the law, banking, mining, education, and all the other great occupations—have furnished their quota to the national needs by volunteering of service.

One of the most noticeable features of official life in Washington is furnished by the great boards and commissions, composed generally of volunteer members, supplemented usually by experienced officers of the Government. These men are serving without compensation other than the satisfaction of doing real service to the country. They include such men as Daniel Willard, president of the Baltimore & Ohio Railroad Co., and one of the leading railroad men of the United States; Edward Chambers, vice president of the Santa Fe Railway System and many years an honored citizen of California; Herbert Hoover, also a Californian, as head of the food administration of the Government, who receives a salary of $1 per year in place of the $150,000 which he was drawing before the great war drew him into the service of humanity; great automobile men like Howard E. Coffin and S. A. Waldon, who are among the leading spirits in the Aircraft Production Board; G. Harold Powell, manager and organizer of the California Fruit Growers' Exchange; Mark L. Requa; Dr. Ray Lyman Wilbur, president of Stanford University; Curtis H. Lindley, the eminent legal authority of San Francisco, all of whom are serving with Mr. Hoover in the food administration. Recently, as the one best man to handle the second liberty loan of $3,000,000,000, Frank A. Vanderlip, president of the National City Bank, of New York, has taken a desk in the Treasury Department to direct the great financial campaign. One could go on indefinitely with the names of these patriotic men who have practically abandoned their private business in order to give their invaluable services to the Government.

It is also one of the evidences of universal devotion to our country to observe the wiping out of partisan lines and differences in devotion to the great national cause. Former President William H. Taft and former President Theodore Roosevelt, although vastly different in their temperaments and in their personal inclinations, are both rendering untiring and invaluable service in teaching patriotism and devotion to the country and a firm and unqualified support to the administration of President Woodrow Wilson in the conduct of this great war.

Among our other great men who have sacrificed something of personal views and have brought themselves into harmony with and support of the President is that really great American, William Jennings Bryan. Abandoning his attitude of radical pacifism, in Mr. Bryan's latest outgivings he declares for loyalty to the country in the war and advocated the best policy of bringing about peace is to fight for it, straight through to the end. In a recent address Mr. Bryan said:

> People ask me every day how long this war will last. My answer is that I do not know, and I do not know anybody who does know. But I can state a fact that is worth more than any guess, prediction, or prophecy, and that is that no matter whether the war be long or short, the shortest road to peace is the road straight ahead, with no division among our people.

Judge Alton B. Parker and former Justice Charles E. Hughes, both sometime nominees of their respective parties for President, stand on precisely the same ground, and are giving the most unlimited support, through their able utterances and exhortations to the people, to the administration in its prosecution of the war.

The American women also are giving undivided support to the national cause. They have everywhere volunteered to assist in the great work. They have organized Red Cross societies and relief organizations of every description for the purpose of brightening the lives of our soldiers and sailors and the care of those of their dependents who remain at home. They have converted social organizations into great patriotic organizations. Whoever has witnessed the thousands of women all over the United States diligently using the hours which otherwise would be spent in leisure or in the pursuit of pleasure, knitting sweaters, wristlets, and other garments for the comfort of men that they have never seen, and never will see, can not but be touched by their loyal and unselfish activities.

These are all splendid portents and all tend to bring about the final victory.

Speaking for myself, in normal times I am a partisan, and heartily and firmly believe in the national principles and economic policies of the Republican Party. I now do so believe. But in all the great questions arising from this war I know no political party. I cast my vote in Congress on all war measures absolutely without reference to political considerations and solely with a view to the honor and success of our beloved country. I am first of all an American, and as an American feel that our success in this great war in which we are engaged is the overshadowing consideration. I hold it to be my highest duty, as it is my pleasure, not only to refrain from carping criticism of the President and his administration in the conduct of the war, but to give my voice and vote to every measure of legislation that will strengthen his hands as the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. Upon him the American people have placed the responsibility. To him should Congress give the power, reserving criticism, if any be deserved, until unencumbered thereby, the great work has been performed.

Let us all, whatever may be our individual fortunes in life, as Americans, stand together for our common country. Let each in his own way contribute every ounce of power which he may be possessed of or enabled to exercise for the cause of our country. We firmly believe that success in this terrible war will be effectual in bringing about a condition which will prevent all war in the future. It is a war against wars; in favor of the weak and poor of every country; against the exercise of unbridled power, the burdens of militarism, and of autocracy; and a war for the preservation and integrity of our own beloved country, the United States of America.

THE SPIRIT OF THE WEST.

Mr. Speaker, I was much interested in and pleased with the address delivered a few days ago by the gentleman from Washington [Mr. JOHNSON] on the recent patriotic action of the people of Tacoma and Pierce County, in that State, in reference to the establishment of Camp Lewis, which is the official name of the fine cantonment at American Lake. The soldiers of the new National Army from my own State of California are now assembling at Camp Lewis, and it is a pleasure to know that they are to be quartered during their period of training among a people so patriotic and enterprising as the people of Washington, in the city of Tacoma and Pierce County.

This patriotism and energy are emphasized by the circumstances surrounding the establishment of the American Lake cantonment. As far back as the fall of 1916 the people of those counties bonded themselves to the amount of $2,000,000 to finish the purchase of the tract of land, nearly 15 miles square, at American Lake, and presented it, without cost, to the United States Government for cantonment purposes.

This is an action of which the gentleman from Washington is and well may be proud. It is a fine example of the "spirit of the West," and particularly of the Pacific coast. It is that spirit of self-reliance and cooperation which is so rapidly building up the three great Pacific States of Washington, Oregon, and California and their neighboring States west of the Rocky Mountains.

When they ask the Federal Government to establish some obviously necessary public work of whatever nature, as a rule they offer a substantial cooperation, often of greater value than the amount of the expenditure of the Government itself.

I specially invite the attention of the members of the House to this fact, and to this particular instance. It is an exhibition of that same spirit of the West which has imbued the people of California from the days of '49 to the present, and which has been strongly exemplified by the people of my own county of Los Angeles.

In the establishment of Los Angeles Harbor, during the past 20 years, the people of that great city and county have taxed and bonded themselves to the extent of more than $5,000,000, which they have expended in the opening and development of a deep-sea harbor, or an amount dollar for dollar with that expended by the Federal Government. This expenditure has been attended with gratifying results. Los Angeles Harbor now transacts a large foreign and domestic commerce, and handles a greater quantity of lumber than any other port in the United States. Within a year the people of Los Angeles County have voted over a million dollars for a single feature of harbor protection to meet a similar expenditure on the part of the National Government; thus completing an outlay in excess of $6,000,000 upon national harbor purposes, raised by direct taxes and bonds, while the Government has expended a similar amount.

Recently the Navy Yard Commission, created by Congress for the purpose, after searching personal investigation and observation, has reported to the President a system of naval defense of the Pacific coast, from Puget Sound to the Mexican border. Included is a recommendation for a submarine base and an aviation operating base at Los Angeles Harbor. To facilitate this great national work the city of Los Angeles has, through its mayor and city council, and by an overwhelming vote of its people cast at a popular election, donated free of cost a very valuable tract of land bordering on the harbor, which has been valued, at a conservative estimate, at $4,000,000. The proposed expenditures of the Government to perfect this submarine base amount to $2,250,000. It will thus be noted that the people of Los Angeles are meeting the Government in this particular case on a basis of nearly 2 to 1.

The proposed plan of the Navy Yard Commission, of which Rear Admiral J. M. Helm is the chairman, is the first comprehensive and coordinated system of national defense of the Pacific coast that has ever been proposed. It is of such broad national character that the people of the Pacific Coast States are extremely gratified at this evidence of interest of the great Navy Department in a matter of national welfare, and they will evidence their appreciation in a substantial way wherever it is possible for them to do so.

The action of the people of Washington in bonding themselves in the sum of $2,000,000 and presenting to the Government free of charge a splendid field for training the new National Army, 15 square miles in extent, and the presentation to the National Government of a magnificent tract at Los Angeles Harbor for Government purposes, having a value of $4,000,000, are evidences of the characteristic loyalty of the Pacific Coast States and a striking example of the energetic and loyal "spirit of the West."

Government's Shipbuilding Program.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RUFUS HARDY,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, October 3, 1917.

Mr. HARDY. Mr. Speaker, I wish to ask unanimous consent to extend my remarks on the subject of our merchant marine and the Government shipbuilding program.

It was my desire to discuss at length the question of free ships for our merchant marine as the best, if not the only, means in normal times of building up and sustaining a great American merchant marine, but at this time the question of free ships is perhaps of no importance, because at this time, if we were permitted to do so, we could not buy ships abroad cheaper than we can build them or buy them here.

The pertinent question to-day is how we may best aid the Government in its purpose to build up a vast fleet of merchant ships at Government expense. On this question the Government's shipbuilding program is the whole issue. We want a program that will get ships—get them quickly and get them with the greatest practicable economy. A vast number of ships have already been contracted for, and the Government has contracted for a vast quantity of steel plate. In my judgment the Government is paying exhorbitant, if not unconscionable prices under these contracts.

Bearing on the statement I have just made, I place in the RECORD the following statement:

GOVERNMENT'S SHIPBUILDING POLICY.

[Statement by L. P. Featherstone, president Texas Steel Co.]

This statement is prepared for the purpose of showing that it is to the interest of the Nation to own its raw material for steel making and its yards for shipbuilding, in that it relieves itself of the present peril to Messaba Range ore supply, that is possible from destruction of locks by dynamite, at the enemy's instigation, between the Great Lakes, at the same time utilizing a new ore supply, distributing its plants geographically, thereby adding to its safety, and by this distribution increasing the Nation's efficiency and ability for steel production and shipbuilding.

To show that the ore and limestone of Texas and the coking coal of Alabama, with freight rates by rail and water, so coordinates this material that the Nation's merchant-marine ships can be built at Beaumont, Tex., on a basis such that the Government can submit to the extortion under existing contracts for one-third of its $1,800,000,000 appropriation and can on one-third effect such a saving as to make a clear gain of 344 ships of 6,200 tons dead-weight capacity, and with such a reduction on the other third by reason of its independence, given by raw-material ownership, that still more ships will be built from its $1,800,000,000 appropriation.

The proof of the foregoing statements is submitted in detail in the following pages:

Cost pig-iron production—Comparison between Philadelphia and Beaumont.

AT PHILADELPHIA.

Iron ore (gross ton):
Lake ports, fixed	$5.05
Freight and handling	1.60
	6.65
Coke (net ton):
Connelsville, fixed	6.00
Freight and handling	2.20
	8.20
Limestone, delivered at Philadelphia (net ton)	2.00
2 tons ore, at $6.65 per ton	13.30
1⅛ tons coke, at $8.20 per ton	9.84
One-half ton limestone, at $2 per ton	1.00
	24.14
Labor cost and plant maintenance	2.00
Cost of pig iron per ton at Philadelphia	26.14

AT BEAUMONT.

Iron ore, delivered at plant (gross ton)	2.75
Coke, by-product process (net ton)	5.63
Limestone, delivered at plant (net ton)	2.40
2 tons ore, at $2.75 per ton	5.50
1⅛ tons coke, at $5.63 per ton	6.75
One-half ton limestone, at $2.40 per ton	1.20
	13.45
Labor cost and plant maintenance	2.00
Cost of pig iron per ton at Beaumont	15.45

N. B.—Cost $10.69 more to produce pig iron at Philadelphia than at Beaumont.

STEEL PLATES.

The difference in cost of conversion of this pig iron into steel plates is proportionately less at Beaumont. The scrap for economizing conversion of this pig iron into steel can be had in Texas at figures considerably lower than the same material is obtainable in the East. The manganese content is ample for ordinary steel requirements, making necessary only slight manganese addition for ship steel plates.

The material lost in process of conversion of pig iron or molten metal into steel is usually estimated at 10 per cent; with this high-grade material it should be less.

The usual labor and maintenance cost of the conversion of iron into steel run from $6 to $9 per ton in the years 1912, 1913, 1914, and part of 1915, these figures making an average of $7.50 per ton. War conditions have not doubled this labor and maintenance conversion cost.

However, allowing doubled cost, the cost for converting the pig iron or hot metal into steel plates would be ——per ton	$15.00
Adding to this pig-iron or hot-metal value, at stated cost do	15.45
You have cost of material and conversion ——do	30.45
Deducting usual estimated 10 per cent conversion loss, you have left 1,800 pounds of steel, which has cost $30.45 per ton, which makes cost of steel plates ——per ton	33.83
Adding 33⅓ per cent to this for contingent and profit fund, amounting to ——per ton	11.28
Would bring steel-plate cost at Beaumont to ——do	45.11
Government has fixed price for plates at ——do	65.00

SUPPLY THE MATERIAL AND BUILD SHIPS FOR THE GOVERNMENT.

Propositions submitted to the United States Government and now under consideration:

First. We will sell to the Government 20,000,000 tons iron ore, 15,000,000 tons coking coal, and 10,000,000 tons limestone at a total cost of $14,000,000.

We propose with this material repurchased from the Government as used, at 50 per cent advance, to supply the Government steel plates at $45.11 per ton, and with the plates to build ships for the Government at $130 per dead-weight ton. These prices subject to reduction on arbitration basis if found to be in excess of a fair profit on cost of production and maintenance of plant.

When 60 ships of 10,000 tons dead-weight carrying capacity have been constructed, at $130 per dead-weight ton instead of $155 per dead-weight ton, price now being paid to eastern steel-ship combine, the Government will have saved $15,000,000 on this shipbuilding contract, or enough to pay for the raw material purchased from us under our first proposition. The raw material remaining will be sufficient to build for the Government a merchant marine fleet equal to half the steel steamship tonnage of all the world before the depredations of the submarine, or sufficient to supply the plates for more than 3,600 steel ships of 6,200 dead-weight tons' carrying capacity, the average size now being contracted for by the Government. Sufficient material to produce more than twice the number of ships which the Government will be able to get for its whole $1,800,000,000 appropriation for its merchant marine fleet if the present contract price being paid is allowed to absorb the whole appropriation.

GOVERNMENT CAN MAKE PLATES FOR $33.83 PER TON—IS NOW PAYING $65 PER TON.

The proposition of $45.11 per ton for steel plates made to the Government and $130 per dead-weight ton for ships constructed is based upon a safe business margin and a substantial profit.

As an evidence of good faith, it is proposed to back this indorsement by the investment of the proceeds of the raw material of $14,000,000 and a million more, to be put into plant for profitably producing these steel plates at $45.11 and building these ships at $130 per dead-weight ton.

It is shown to the Government that with a properly constructed modern plant the Government can by the utilization of this raw material produce these steel plates at $33.83 per ton at Beaumont and can build these ships at $100 per dead-weight ton.

As evidence of the reasonableness of this statement, Mr. Denman, in his report (CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, Aug. 15) states that "England is now building ships of the same character for $80 per dead-weight ton, with $60 per ton steel plates." Ships of this character were being built in the United States in 1914 at $50 per dead-weight ton. The advance on cost of raw material has been relatively inconsiderable. While labor cost has advanced, the great advance has been based on monopolistic profits.

BY THESE ADDED FACILITIES GOVERNMENT CAN SAVE $495,876,000.

The board has asked and it is understood that the Government has appropriated $35,000,000 to be put into shipyards in the East. As much put into a shipbuilding plant at Beaumont, with half that amount into a steel-plate producing plant, will produce one-third of the ships required by the Government, allowing 25 per cent more than England's $80 per ton cost for ships—that is, $100 per dead-weight ton—at a saving which would make possible the production of 344 ships of 6,200 tons dead-weight capacity (the average size of ships contracted for) as a net increase over what is possible to have out of this $1,800,000,000 appropriation if the entire contract for steel-plate production and shipbuilding is to be continued under the control of the eastern steel-ship building combine.

The ownership of the steel-making raw material, with consequent independence of the Government, will compel the eastern shipbuilding combine to make such a revision of their figures as will enable the Government to secure such ships as it is unable to build for itself on at least a difference-splitting basis, which would make an additional saving sufficient to build 172 ships, making a total of 516 ships which the Government will own out of the proceeds of its $1,800,000,000 appropriation, which it will not have if the present program of turning over contracts at present prices to the eastern steel-ship combine is continued.

Each of these 516 ships is now costing the Government, under existing contracts averaging $155 per dead-weight ton, $961,000 per ship, which will make a total saving to the Government of $495,876,000.

I wish to add but little to that statement.

I know L. P. Featherstone. I believe him to be one of the most substantial business men of Texas, a man of large means, and a true, loyal, honest American citizen.

Just one thing further: Mr. Featherstone, the president of the Texas Steel Co., tells me that his company is now ready to enter into a contract with our Government, straight, without conditions and without any advance payment, to sell and deliver to the Government 500,000 tons of steel plate at $50 per ton instead of the $65 per ton which the Government is now paying, and that his company will give a good and sufficient bond in the sum of $100,000 for the faithful performance of their contract.

If the Government for any reason can not entertain the propositions which have been submitted as stated herein, it does seem to me it ought to entertain the proposition which the Texas Steel Co. is ready to make for the unconditional sale to the Government of 500,000 tons of steel plate at $50 per ton.

Aviation.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JAMES C. McLAUGHLIN,

OF MICHIGAN,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, October 3, 1917.

Mr. McLAUGHLIN of Michigan. Mr. Speaker, under permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I insert the following address delivered by Hon. SIMEON D. FESS at the dedication of the Wilbur Wright Aviation Field, September 27, 1917:

THE PART THE UNITED STATES MUST PLAY IN THE WORLD WAR, WITH ESPECIAL REFERENCE TO AVIATION.

(An address delivered by S. D. Fess at the dedication of the club house on the Wilbur Wright Aviation Field, Sept. 27, 1917.)

Mr. President, Capt. McCauley, Cadets of the Wilbur Wright Aviation Field, and friends, the invitation to address you on this dedicatory occasion was cordially extended and gladly accepted. Since that time I have been considering what is most appropriate for me to say. Naturally, I shall be expected to give some impression of the international situation as it appears to some of us at Washington.

For over two years, from August, 1914, we were virtually living over a threatening volcano. We were using our best ability to maintain neutrality. After repeated failures to induce the warring nations to agree upon a code of warfare, especially on the sea, where neutral rights were in danger, we announced that we would take our stand upon the customs and practices, the rules and usages, of international law as then in vogue, and would hold all belligerent countries to that standard so far as they affected the rights of neutral countries. We thus at once bound ourselves to an observance of international rather than municipal law. We therefore were powerless to modify any of its decrees unless all belligerents assented, and were compelled to permit the exercise of all international rights claimed by the belligerents if sanctioned by prior practice.

The exportation of arms to a belligerent country by neutral citizens was a practice well established by all the countries now at war, and carried with it the right of belligerents to purchase in neutral countries as evidenced by Article VII of the Hague conference, which our representatives in that conference strongly urged. When the stage was reached that one belligerent, having the right to purchase, could not deliver because her enemy had driven her fleet off the sea to hide in the Kiel Canal, demanded that her inability to deliver should lead our country to forbid her enemy, who could deliver, from further purchases, we were confronted with a situation to test our ability as well as sincerity to make good our insistence. We were face to face with the issue whether Germany's misfortune was a sufficient ground for our reversal of our insistence that all countries strictly observe international policies. Of course we could take no such ground, and were at once the subjects of bitter charges in Germany with an unneutral position.

Our demands of full recognition of international law caused us to call England to task on her various policies of blockade. We made it plain that her "indefensible" blockade would not be respected unless she made it valid by making it effective.

We also demanded that it should not be extended to violation of the recognized custom of "neutral flags cover neutral goods." We also demanded that it could not extend to neutral coasts save and except where it was clearly a continuous voyage, as in the Springbok case of the Civil War, and then only under undoubted conditions.

We complained of her desire to totally obliterate the difference between conditional and absolute contraband in time of war.

Fellow citizens, I myself called attention on the floor of the House to the dangers of allowing any great naval power under the stress of war to take steps which would tend to bind all nations when the war had passed.

Our frequent notes to England on these restraints of trade, all grounded in breaches of our neutral rights, gave Germany additional argument in her contentions against Britain.

Germany's first war-zone order, to take effect February 18, 1915, was rested by pretense of the Imperial Government upon Britain's North Sea war-zone order of November 2, 1914.

However, these were not similar. In other words, Germany could not justify an undertaking to torpedo all vessels entering certain waters in the high seas on the basis that Britain had cautioned all neutrals from entering the North Sea not to go outside of well-defined bounds for fear of striking mines which had been placed in the sea by both Germany and England, but assuring safety, so far as England was concerned, if vessels would respect sailing directions while in the sea. This latter order did not forbid entrance on penalty of death, while the German order was a threat of open murder on the seas, the highway that no nation possessed.

During the discussion of these critical decrees, attacks were made upon merchantmen both from the sea and air. Before diplomatic discussion had progressed far, our Nation was stunned by a warning published in the American press against citizens taking passage on the Lusitania; and later horrified by the awful fatality of the destruction of that liner, with over 100 American citizens on board.

You all know what followed. In due time an attack was made on the Sussex, which brought from our Government the announcement that unless the submarine policy was discontinued so far as it affects American rights this country would sever diplomatic relations. For the time the promise was made to discontinue these attacks.

Unfortunately for the country we were in the midst of a national political campaign in which the slogan was used "He kept us out of war"; a pitiable performance to say the least, but a woeful blunder considered from an international point of view, because it prepared the unthinking population of our country to believe that the issue of war was the mere caprice of the head of the Nation.

After two and a half years of effort toward neutrality we found ourselves enmeshed with world problems, involving the honor and integrity of our own nationality.

Personally I came most reluctantly to the firm conviction that we had to deal with Germany. The various machinations throughout the country indicated the German mind toward us so far as the Imperial Government went. It seemed we were destined to defend our rights or surrender our honor as well as our nationality. The Zimmermann note left no doubt as to the purpose of the ruling House in Germany.

It seemed to Congress the height of unwisdom to further delay our published determination to resist the ruthless submarine policy whose purpose was to starve the enemies of Germany, even if to do so meant the enmity of our own country. If our future enemy could succeed in starving Britain she could dictate her own terms of peace, the first item of which would have been the transfer of the British fleet to Germany. In that case it would not be difficult to see what the future of our own country would be.

The country, through its President and its Congress, declared that it could not submit to this possibility and would call the entire resource of the Nation, both men and money, to resist it. Young men, you are but one unit in the almost miraculous mobilization of the Republic's energy to maintain our rights. It was the step we had hoped we would be spared from taking. Some of us had been close students of the causes which led to the war and the movements both on field and in forum since it broke.

The world has been unutterably horrified over the total lack of any humanitarian considerations in the war. We have read of the occurrences of inhumanity which lead us now to believe that the highest reaches of human intelligence expressed in discovery and invention are exhausted in a campaign of brutal conduct which refuses to consider any element save force and ability to reach the desired end. Terrorism of a nation of noncombatants by wholesale desecration and wanton destruction of life and property has come to be the daily occurrences.

This principle of warfare in action sees the ruthless destruction of food supply on the sea to the threat of a world famine in foods. It sees noncombatant populations of men, women, and children treated as if they were in the line of battle.

These orders are given by the heads of the armies whose allegiance is due to the head of the Empire, whose word is law, as he holds in his hands both the purse and the sword of the nation. But yesterday I called the attention of Members of the House to the Prussian system of government, so generally misunderstood in this country. This Nation must understand the character of the Imperial Government of Germany, against which we were destined to defend ourselves, a conviction that forced itself upon the country by evidence too apparent to ignore.

For over three years Germany has held the world at bay and has terrorized all populations, neutral and belligerent. During that time we have witnessed the breaches of organized militarism which have percolated from the top to the minutest detail of the German life, governmental, professional, industrial, social, and what the Kaiser strangely terms spiritual. It appears to have embraced the entire German population in such a way that I fear our people have no conception, else they would not give credence to the frequent reports of German uprisings which promise revolution. If I mistake not, the German people are with their imperial rulers to the extent of complete submission to the Kaiser's will.

This war will not end because of the weakness of our enemy. It must end because of the strength of our forces we shall send against our enemy.

The solidarity of the German Government is probably not equalled by any other great power of the world. The German mind easily responds to orders. Liberty, such as we Americans know, is not favorably regarded in Germany, not even by the common people. Our liberty is denounced as license to be suppressed. Their reticence and obedience are the results of generations of that sort of repression that makes for subserviency. I am told by special students advancing their station in university work that Germany does not tolerate what we know as freedom of thought and action. I am convinced that Germany has no fears from internal revolution.

The marvelous achievements of these people along agricultural pursuits give me no hope that the end will come through a shortage of food. We must keep in mind that under the old methods of agriculture Germany in 1871, with 36,000,000 people to feed, could not do it without resorting to importation from outside. In 1914, with the same territory, under modern intensive methods of farming Germany not only fed 68,000,000 people, but was an exporter of food.

Since that day she has added territory occupied by at least 50,000,000 people, all of the able-bodied of whom are at work in the fields to produce for the soldier under the penalty of starvation, for it is apparent that if starvation must come it will meet these people first.

There is some conviction expressed that Germany must break because of her system of finance. The one significance of this matter is the fact that so long as the nation deals alone with itself, not required to deal with the outside world, her solidarity is such that credit will take the place of exchange, and if the nation produces the commodity as a whole it will be exchanged, distributed, and consumed by the nation as a whole, without the rigid exactions of the laws of trade through the medium of a value of exchange save credit.

My firm conviction is that we shall make a great mistake if we build our plans with a view of a breakdown of Germany because of one or all of these considerations.

She still holds her position on all fronts, save parts of the west, where we can but nibble, and is free from a single foreign fighter on her soil. The entente holds a different position. The eastern front is perhaps hopelessly broken. Poor Russia in the throes of revolution, possesses anything but a solidarity. She is an overgrown country, where growth has been by accretion, and whose nationality is without a unified spirit. A country of 180,000,000 people, 90 per cent of whom, a population which we would call illiterate, speaking 40 different languages, and possessing no continuity in national evolution. A country badly misgoverned in the past and consequently sorely unprepared for what we call self-government upon a national scale.

At best it would tax a great nation to maintain in fighting trim a great army at the front. But when such a country is compelled to battle its way through revolution from an irresponsible oligarchy to a well-governed democracy, that alone is problem enough, to say nothing of keeping an effective force at the front. It would appear a wise course for Americans to proceed on the ground of no hope of assistance from Russia.

Neither can we expect any favorable results from Roumania.

We have reasons, however, for believing good results may be expected from Italy. But so long as her splendid army remains unsupplied with necessary munitions, disappointing results await us. But so soon as our own country can provide the necessary supplies the classic nation of antiquity will give a good report of herself. All this is contingent upon our ability to handle the submarine situation.

From beautiful France and stricken Belgium we must not expect more than to "hold the fort." Both of these countries are contributing their all to this life-and-death struggle. Their resources are taxed to the utmost, and, as it now appears, totally inadequate to meet the exigencies of additional war demands. They can not help us in mobilizing American armies, except in their wonderful resourcefulness in mental and moral abilities of invention and discovery, but must depend largely upon us for their needed supplies to continue their own effectiveness at the front.

Great Britain should be able to increase in effectiveness with Germany, from whatever source the latter may draw, but must depend upon outside resources for supplies. The one vital contingency here again is the submarine.

It now appears that Germany's advances can be successfully met, as indeed for weeks she has had to recede from the advancing entente columns on the west, as Austria has been repulsed by Italian troops.

This situation makes it easy to see the part the United States must play in this world tragedy. Our entente allies must be supplied from countries beyond their own borders separated by submarine infested seas.

The food for Italy, France, England, and Belgium must come from North America. Not one of these countries, excluding their colonies, can subsist upon its own productions, shut off as they now are by the submarine from their colonial possessions.

This food can not come from Russia, as is easily understood. It can not come from Australia, New Zealand, South Africa, or India. These countries are three times the distance from warring Europe as our own country, and it would require that much more tonnage and greater risk. The tonnage is not in the world, and even if it were the submarine would make its delivery very dubious. These supplies must come from the United States and Canada. They must cross the seas, which are sowed with mines and submarines. It at once is clear that our country must not only produce in large measure these supplies of food and munitions, but must clear the seas of these pirates of the underworld that military forces fighting our enemy may continue effective service, and thus save us from the necessity of sending men enough to take the place of those displaced by lack of food to keep them in line.

This clear choice between sending necessary food for our fighting allies or American sons to take their places in the trenches should quickly and effectually close all complaints against our campaign to conserve against waste that we may send food to Europe to feed the men who are fighting our common enemy.

Our duty is plain. We must mobilize production. We must clear the seas. We must supply our allied soldiers fighting our enemy, and we must in the meantime convert our vast wealth into instruments of command.

Young men, I need not here outline to you what has been done. While the world does not know it in detail, in a general way it discerns the most peaceful as well as the most wealthy Nation on earth in the short space of a half year's time, totally transforming itself from a quiet, industrial people into a powerful warlike machine. Our people are amazed to see the total energy of man and money converted into a fighting organism.

The annual expenditure up to six months ago had never reached much above the billion mark. This year of war it may reach the bewildering sum of twenty-two times that figure.

Our small Army, of less than 100,000 men when the war cloud broke in Europe, reaches already beyond the million mark, with the promise in the near future, in Regular Army, Federalized Militia, and National Army, a line of defenders which will test the pacific natures of our population.

Our Navy, both in craft and personnel, is growing with no limit save physical possibilities. Our merchant marine will soon be second only to Britain's.

My young friends, of all the varied lines of service now demanded by the Nation in this hour of crisis, yours is the most interesting, picturesque, and probably at this time the most important.

As I suggested a while ago, the titanic forces on the west front seem deadlocked. I have no fear that the enemy can break our lines, and but small hope that our allies can break through the German lines because of the modern methods of trench warfare. This is not due to any lack of heroism, but rather to the new science of warfare, which does not admit of the famous charges of the great wars of the past which detail the heroic advances on the world's great battle fields.

This character of trench warfare makes it absolutely necessary that the eyes of the army be far above the fighting forces to answer both for distance and obstruction. Three years ago this use of the aeroplane was a vague conception—little more than fugitive speculation. To-day it is an awakening reality. Armies can not be effective if blind. Guns may shoot 20 miles, but if they miss the enemy it is but waste. The one necessity for assured victory is eyes to see and intelligence to direct these commanding instruments of warfare. This is peculiarly the function of the aviator, the part you are to play in this world drama. I know of nothing more strangely dramatic than the growth of dependence upon the commanders of the air. But yesterday the aeroplane was a freak of the imagination.

The flying machine was on a par with "perpetual motion," the conviction of a mind somewhat unbalanced. When the Wright brothers, both in Europe and America, demonstrated its possibilities, the world was still heretical. When Parmalee in a Wright plane carried his bolt of silk from this place to Columbus the reports in the papers were looked upon as "made up." However, aviation was a demonstrable fact. By 1911 the Government decided to purchase one plane for the Army. Congress in that year set aside $125,000 to be used for aeroplanes. The Mexican situation induced a large appropriation in 1914, when that of 1911 was doubled. By many this was looked upon as reckless waste.

When the war broke in Europe the field was opened for this new fighting craft and the experts were mobilized. Orville Wright said within the past month that the war has advanced aeroplane invention at least 50 years ahead of what it would have been had there been no war. To-day we behold aircraft in army formation not unlike movements of armies on land or navies on sea. We are told that the eyes of the infantry are the scouts and bombers, who circle above the enemy at times not over 500 feet high to ascertain their plans; that the eyes of the artillery, because of the character of the work required, sometimes called "spotters," circle as high as 5,000 feet, from which they observe the location of the flashes and report the same back by wireless in order to direct the fire of the big guns. Above these spotters will frequently be found the observers and photographers, to reassure the information conveyed by the spotters. Then far above these, to the distance of 15,000 feet at times, will sail the fighters, whose real purpose is to be ready to swoop down upon enemy planes which might appear to interfere with the eyes of the armies. Enough has been accomplished by these airmen on the various fronts of Europe so far not only to prove the wonderful facility of these aerial hunters but also the possibilities of the science of warfare in the air. This week the people of the Capital have been treated to a wonderful fête in the air, when the Italian flier, in his powerful three-engine plane, carried his 10 passengers over the city with wonderful facility of flight.

It was a conclusive demonstration of possibilities of aviation. What will be done in the near future no one will now attempt to specify.

You have all noticed the recent statement of Gen. Wood, as reported in the press, that we must not depend on the aircraft to end this war, but rather upon the boys in the trenches. This may be true.

While I would not deign to criticize this statement, it does appear to us at Washington that the effectiveness of the trench warfare must rely very greatly upon the direction given from the air. Congress has at least so interpreted its duty. Instead of the $250,000 of 1914, we at one bound in this special session appropriated the enormous sum of $640,000,000 for the Army, and just last week $35,000,000 more for the Navy. Here is the enormous sum of $675,000,000, or enough to construct two Panama Canals, to be devoted to taking possession of the air. Young men, it is not too much for me to say to you that while Washington authority does not minimize the tasks of our Army and Navy, it is centering its hopes upon your service to break the forces in favor of our cause. However, I here and now express the hope that no condition may ever arise to make it necessary for any American flyer to bombard an unprotected city filled with innocent women and children, which has become the daily diversion of our enemy.

However, an insistent demand is heard for reprisals. This demand grows more intense with the passing days. It is claimed Germany can concentrate her air power on the front, as the allies dare not, since they must keep their planes back to protect the cities subject to attack by German planes. If this campaign continues, many think the entente should do likewise to compel Germany to draw off her craft from the front to protect her cities.

It will be very unfortunate if it should appear necessary to do this. America's ability in production is so unlimited that it is simply physically impossible for Germany to match us in the production of this craft. Only to-night I am informed that a local company is under contract, beginning January 1, 1918, to deliver 25 planes per day. That is only one concern. When the giant Republic once becomes aroused to the real task before us, we will summon our best talents and we will take possession of the air. We will not only drive our enemy out of the air, but we will endeavor to show what can be done in the enemy country from a mobilization of forces in the air against railroads, lines of communications, munition plants, naval and submarine stations, as well as fighting columns of men.

While I have never been optimistic as to the duration of the war—indeed, I have been fearful it may be a long war—yet I feel free to assert that I see no reason why the entente forces, excluding the United States, will not be just as strong in the spring of 1918 as Germany can possibly be. With the trained men we shall have in Europe by that time ready for the drive, and our aircraft in force ready to clear and lead the way as well as direct the movement, I am convinced we will see the line break which ought to be the beginning of the end.

In that critical season I have no doubt that the cadets from this beautiful Wilbur Wright Field will have a notable part to perform, and it is not an overstatement for me to declare that the people of the country at large will look with unusual interest upon the reports which shall detail the part you shall play in this great occasion.

Fellow citizens, the possibilities of America aroused and organized, are well symbolized by what has taken place on this field within the past few weeks. Only a short time ago this section was a choice bit of agricultural promise, consisting of our very best country seats, with prosperous homes surrounded by rich fields soon ready for the harvest. To-day all this has given way to a unique military city, possessed of every convenience of modern life. More than 100 buildings for the housing of the officers and enlisted men, representing the very newest division of military service, stretch along the upper terrace for a distance of 2 miles, overlooking the aviation field proper, as level as the sea, over which the airman can be seen almost any hour of the day in his wonderful if not miraculous maneuvers which guarantee our supremacy of the air in this test which all the world is watching with pulsating heart.

If one were in doubt as to the future possibilities of air navigation he need but witness the daily demonstrations of our air pilots over the Wilbur Wright Field.

And now I wish, on behalf of the good people of this community, especially of Dayton and Springfield, who have made possible the erection and dedication of this particular building for your comfort and recreation, to express to you our best wishes for your future.

We who have for months been absorbed in the atmosphere of war, where our major thought must needs be of overcoming by skill of mind and force of hand, are apt to forget that better self, the spiritual man, which, after all, must always remain the most important.

We at home who can not see active service in the field must not neglect to do what makes that service most effective. I at this very moment see ladies in this building busily knitting, never ceasing during the proceedings of this interesting day. It is but a part of a nation-wide enterprise in which the womanhood is enlisted under the banner of the Red Cross to assist in alleviating the inevitable horrors of war. It is also one significant evidence that our people realize that we are really in a war.

The good citizens who must remain at home, but who follow in spirit and hope our boys wherever they shall go, will do their utmost to surround our sons with comforts and recreation facilities as can be supplied by such organizations as the Young Men's Christian Association and kindred associations.

It was a beautiful conception of our good friends here to anticipate the Government by taking this step to erect here in this permanent aviation field this club house to be dedicated to the better things in life. The soldier in active service will appreciate this opportunity.

You are destined to have days of loneliness, of homesickness, of great distress of mind. Here is the one place where you shall be able to come to forget for the moment your strenuous course, to write home to parent, relative, friend, sweetheart, and to participate in games, in athletic sports, and live again the scenes of home and college.

As the Representative in Congress of the district in which is located this Wilbur Wright Aviation Field, the largest and most beautiful in all the world, I desire to thank on behalf of the Government the public-spirited men and women for their success in adding to this already wonderful group of buildings this splendid club house.

I also wish, on behalf of the people of the district and surrounding districts, to thank the commandant of the field, and especially Capt. McCauley, for the field day, open to the public, that all may witness the wonders of aviation, the newest and by all odds the most interesting branch of the service.

And to you, the officers and cadets of this camp, our people of the State and Nation at large are looking for decisive results in this the greatest conflict of all ages.

The Interior Department and the War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. SCOTT FERRIS,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 4, 1917.

Mr. FERRIS. Mr. Speaker, the Interior Department, accustomed to handling only domestic problems, has been spurred to unusual functions by the war, and is now performing work of vital importance to the national defense. A summary of the activities of the department, prepared at the direction of Secretary Franklin K. Lane, shows that the Interior Department has its part in this war just as the State, War, Navy, Commerce, and other departments respond to emergency conditions.

The war activities of the Interior Department cover a wide range, for there is probably no other governmental agency which covers so diversified a field in times of peace. When war came Secretary Lane and his assistants found many tasks ahead of them. These war-time tasks ranged from encouraging Indians to subscribe for liberty bonds to the harnessing of water power for manufacturing purposes or leasing Government land to build up the Nation's food supply.

Practically every bureau of the department has responded to the needs of a Government engaged in war. Some of the bureaus have loaned their geological and topographic experts to the Army; others have made fertile fields of barren places, and still others have assisted in developing the nitrate supply, rendered technical assistance to the Council of National Defense, and classified the mining engineers and chemists of the country.

In a hundred different ways the Department of the Interior has aided in a material way since war was declared. It has worked silently, with no sounding of trumpets. The public has not heard of much of its labors, nor is there a popular appreciation of the big national projects that come within the jurisdiction of this department even in times of peace. Here is a brief summary of some of the unadvertised accomplishments of the Department of the Interior and there is appended a more detailed statement of the work of its several bureaus:

1. The Reclamation Service has rushed the extension of canals and laterals where the greatest acreage might be brought under cultivation to prevent a shortage in the food supply of the world. Legislation was obtained for the temporary delivery of water to arid lands, and liberal homestead regulations have encouraged the struggling farmer and increased his output.

2. The Indian Bureau waged an intensive food-supply campaign, and on 73 reservations 472,156 acres of land were cultivated this year in comparison with 358,796 last year. A woman expert in canning and drying has gone among the Indian women and girls to teach them the modern art of preserving food.

3. Indian adults and minors subscribed to approximately $4,500,000 worth of liberty bonds, and were encouraged to do so by the Interior Department.

4. Nearly a hundred topographic engineers of the Geological Survey have received commissions in the Army and will map areas of military importance in this country and abroad. The Geological Survey has gathered statistics regarding the minerals and substances required for the successful conduct of the war, and this data has been supplied the committees dealing with the supply of war materials. Much of the data supplied is of a confidential and highly important nature.

5. The General Land Office has stimulated the sale of Government lands in the West, and reports that "a constantly increasing utilization of the water resources of the West has added largely to the area of irrigated lands capable of intensive cultivation. * * * Even inferior lands for which there were no buyers a few years ago, when offered for sale now very readily sell at prices way above the appraisements."

6. Probably no bureau of the Interior Department has undertaken so many war activities as the Bureau of Mines. The director of this bureau is a member of the military committee of the research council and other committees dealing with fuel and mineral problems under the Council of National Defense. The bureau has submitted special reports on a number of vital subjects. It cooperated with the War Department in the nitrate-supply investigation, prepared an inventory of mining engineers and chemists, and conducted a valuable inquiry incident to the greater production of raw materials for acids. The chemical and mining divisions of the bureau are also working with the War Department in investigating war gases and masks.

7. One of the chief activities of the Bureau of Mines has been the problem of finding ways and means of supplying, from the deposits existing in this country, the manganese essential to the production of high-grade steel. With the Government purchasing millions of dollars worth of steel the importance of this work can not be underestimated. A greater production of quicksilver, potash, petroleum products, and coal are other tasks to which the experts of this bureau have applied themselves since the outbreak of hostilities.

This general survey gives some indication of how the Department of the Interior has met the emergency of to-day. The quick transformation of the department into a war agency is the more remarkable when it is considered that ordinarily this department deals only with domestic matters. The smooth-working machinery of peace times, however, was rapidly adjusted to meet the new conditions, and the response of every official and subordinate employee has been inspiring and invaluable.

Below there is published detailed reports submitted by the several bureau chiefs to the Secretary of the Interior, who asked for a statement of the scope of the war-time work of the department. A reading of these comprehensive reports, going into every phase of the department's new functions, gives an indication of how all of the Government departments are now coordinating in bringing the war to a speedy and successful conclusion and should gratify an appreciative country.

The reports supplied to Secretary Lane by the various bureaus of their "war activities" are as follows:

Reclamation Service.

Immediately after the declaration of hostilities between the United States and Germany consideration was given to the world shortage of food then not generally realized. The available information indicated the readiness of the service to serve water to about 1,600,000 acres of land, and that less than 1,000,000 acres had been cultivated in 1916.

Ways and means were considered by which the cultivated acreage could be increased. It was found that only a small part of the uncultivated area was unentered public land, that most of it consisted of uncultivated portions of farms that were practically in cultivation or land held by nonresidents. Some tracts were held in areas larger than permitted to obtain a water supply under present laws.

Legislation was obtained authorizing the temporary delivery of water to lands of nonresidents and excess holdings pending the war emergency. Regulations were made to accommodate those who were struggling to prepare their land for cultivation, including the delivery of water at a nominal rate on condition that the land be promptly planted to food products. These regulations are being continued and modified as seems most likely to stimulate such cultivation.

Farmers were asked to start planting the maximum area in food products and to cultivate the same assiduously so as to obtain maximum results. Some experimental work has been started by the Government upon public land which requires expensive preparation, and legislation has been requested authorizing the Government to enter upon such preparation in a comprehensive way to complete the cultivation of irrigable lands. Wherever practicable lands withdrawn for later opening or use in building and operating the projects have been leased for one or more years to private parties contracting to crop them and water is being served to such areas on a temporary rental basis.

Work has been rushed upon the extension of canals and laterals where the greatest acreage might be brought under cultivation and upon drainage where the ground water is affecting the productivity of fertile lands. As the end of the season has not arrived, it is impossible to state positively the results, but it is known that a large increase of cultivated acreage has been secured and the proportionate increase in crops is expected.

One of the food products extensively planted was the potato, and indications are that the yield of these will be large on many of the projects. The condition was then presented that this large yield would depress the price of potatoes; the probable car shortage might prevent carrying to market districts, and lack of local storage prevent keeping them at home, while the low price would encourage waste. In this emergency the department undertook to ascertain the facts and spread information concerning the best means of storage and the necessity therefor. Regulations were approved by which in case of necessity the Government would cooperate with advice, management, and financial assistance in providing such storage as seemed to be necessary for preserving the crop and avoiding waste. Arrangements are now being made for storage on several of the projects, but most of them will in light of information given and with local resources be able to conserve the potato crop. Similar provisions are being made for storage of other vegetables and apples.

Indian Office Activities.

Farming and stock raising: An intensive food campaign was waged in contribution to the national resources during the world war, resulting in a general awakening and endeavor among the Indians to do their part in the emergency and in an increase of cultivated acreage from 25 per cent to 50 per cent greater than ever before. Reports show that on 73 reservations the Indians cultivated this season 472,156 acres, as compared with 358,796 acres last year, an increase of 113,360 acres, or 31.6 per cent. Practically every reservation showed a gain, the highest being 100 per cent and the lowest 5 per cent. Following aggressive measures, approximately between 40,000 and 50,000 acres of additional surplus land will be leased for next season's crops.

The conservation feature of the campaign was emphasized by forwarding to the different reservations and schools for distribution among employees and Indians 12,000 copies of pamphlets issued by the Department of Agriculture and the National Emergency Food Garden Commission on canning and drying fruits and vegetables. A woman expert in canning and drying was also sent to a number of places to give special instruction to the Indian women and girls.

In Montana per capita cash payments were made of $300 on the Crow Reservation and $200 to the Fort Peck Indians, chiefly to aid them in complying with the food campaign by a fuller cultivation of their lands.

Enlistments and liberty-bond subscriptions: The Indian Bureau, in cooperation with the States, conducted the registration of Indians for the military census, requiring its employees to serve wherever necessary without compensation and directing superintendents to aid in securing full consideration to the exemption claims of Indians. Aside from voluntary enlistments by citizen Indians, fully 1,000 young men among the students and ex-students of the schools offered service in the National Guard or some branch of the military.

The purchase of liberty-loan bonds from individual Indian moneys not drawing more than 3½ per cent greatly interested many Indians not only as a safe investment but as a concrete expression of patriotism. The following subscriptions were definitely reported: By 525 adult Indians, $3,273,450; by 851 Indian minors and students, $1,334,400; to which 1,147 employees in the Indian Service added $178,750, making a total of 2,623 subscriptions for $4,786,400 worth of bonds.

Geological Survey.

The Geological Survey throughout the present administration has been called upon to contribute largely to the work of gathering data concerning the resources of the country. It has taken an active part in supplying facts needed by many of the committees dealing with war necessities and in the proper administration of the laws relating to the taking up of the public lands. Many of its technical members have been given commissions in the Army and are applying their special knowledge to the problems confronting the country at this time and practically all of its scientific force is employed solely in investigations having a direct war value.

The gathering of statistics regarding the minerals and substances required for the successful conduct of the war has been carried on by the Geological Survey to a greater extent than ever before. This data has been made available to the various committees organized by the President, and every effort has been made to anticipate the needs for information or to acquire at the earliest moment facts that are called for. As an illustration, the statistics regarding coal production that under normal conditions were published for semiannual periods are now collected each week so that the administrative officers charged with the proper utilization of this necessary commodity can have up-to-date information at their disposal for wisely formulating regulations. The Geological Survey not only is keeping statistical records of the resources of the country, but also has available or is diligently collecting data regarding the occurrences of the war minerals and the amounts available. This information is necessary not only for the various committees on national defense, but it is of great value to the investor or producer who is using this time to stimulate American production of war minerals and thus make America industrially independent.

To increase the food supply has been aimed at by part of the land laws passed by Congress, and these laws require the proper classification of the public domain. The work of classification is being done in large part by the Geological Survey and requires technical knowledge of the physical conditions of the regions considered and their resources. The administration of the stock-raising homestead law which was promulgated with the expectation that it would increase the Nation's meat supply, for example, requires the analysis of the field conditions by a corps of trained geologists and engineers who scrutinize each case presented with thorough and expert consideration so that a fair and impartial classification is made—one that means best utilization of the vacant land.

The studies of the water supplies of the Nation have been continued, and a great mass of facts acquired through years of earnest effort have been heavily drawn against to supply current demands for military information. As an example, almost immediately after the declaration of war the War Department was supplied with a report on the water supply of the entire region adjacent to our coasts or along the Mexican border. Steps have also been taken under the recent law to discover, mark, and improve the desert water holes as an aid to dwellers and travelers in the desert regions. Some of the arid region of the West has been examined under the authorization of Congress to explore by drilling suitable underground water supplies that may be available for irrigation and that may therefore be capable of increasing the food supply of the Nation.

Nearly a hundred of the topographic engineers have received commissions in the Army and many of them have already been ordered to foreign service with the troops and the rest have been assigned to mapping areas of military importance requested by the War Department. In fact, under the efficient organization of this branch of the service work on many of the projects desired by the War Department was undertaken even before formal request for it was received.

The engraving division of the survey prints thousands of topographic maps that are used by all classes of citizens, but lately has devoted most of its equipment and force to reproducing the maps and charts needed by the military arms of the Government in their war preparations.

General Land Office.

Despite the imperative demands of the war in certain particular lines of endeavor, the activity in the public land business augurs well for the continued development of our latent natural resources. This means more food, more mines, and more self-owned and self-supporting homes. The high prices of all farm and mine products have no doubt been an impetus in this direction. All recent offerings of public and Indian lands afford abundant proof of the increased demand for farm and grazing lands at higher prices. Even inferior lands for which there were no buyers a few years ago, when offered now very readily sell at prices way above the appraisements. Notable examples are seen in the recent sales of lands in the Round Valley, Crow, Uinta, and Fort Berthold Reservations. Four years ago the great Fort Peck Reservation, Mont., was opened to entry under the homestead law at appraised values of from $2 to $7 per acre; a comparatively small area was taken the first year, but a larger area has been taken each subsequent year until now about all the desirable lands in this reservation are taken. The tremendous interest in the Colville opening last summer shows the demand for lands. Since the decision of the Supreme Court revesting the Oregon and California railroad grant lands in the United States was rendered, the office has been swamped with inquiries concerning the possibilities of securing lands in these areas. So-called "dry-farming" lands in some sections of the West are selling from $20 to $40 per acre. The increased wealth resulting from the transformation of land worth 5 cents per acre per year for grazing purposes into land producing from $5 to $40 per season in grain is scarcely comprehended by those not familiar with the situation. The liberal and efficient administration of the enlarged homestead act during recent years has contributed much to this result.

A constantly increasing utilization of the water resources of the West has added largely to the area of irrigated lands capable of intensive cultivation. The era of disastrous speculation in irrigation securities that obtained a few years ago is over. Constant vigilance and effort on the part of the Land Department in the expert examination of hundreds of projects resulting in the rejection of the bad projests, the approval of the good ones and in the rehabilitation and readjustment of those only partially successful, has all operated to place reclamation on a sound, bedrock, business basis of permanent development.

Probably the greatest impetus to the public-land business in recent years is the stock-raising homestead act of December 29, 1916. Upward of 20,000,000 acres have already been filed on. If half of these entrymen make good, adding 25,000 small ranches supporting families and owned by the men who run them, the law will be amply justified.

In behalf of public-land entrymen and locators of mining claims, Congress, with the approval of the department, has passed a series of very liberal acts protective of the interest of those who enlisted in the Army and Navy, for the period of the war.

Unfortunately the oil-land controversy is not yet settled. The Land Department has done everything in its power to adjust this matter and to enforce existing laws, but existing laws do not reach the situation, either as to the present controversy or future development, nor do they permit of the expansion necessary to meet the demands of the present crisis.

On the whole the Land Department, handicapped by continual loss of experienced employees, is straining every effort to facilitate in every possible way the settlement and utilization of the public lands, believing that the more rapidly and effectively this can be done the greater will be the Nation's power in this world conflict.

War Work of the Bureau of Mines.

During the latter part of the fiscal year an increasing proportion of the work of the bureau has related to some phase of the military problems that are developing. Early in the year the director prepared a comprehensive outline of the possible service that the bureau could render in the event of war.

The director was appointed as a member of the military committee of the Research Council, and later of all of the various committees dealing with fuel and mineral products under the Council of National Defense.

Several highly important technical problems were undertaken in direct cooperation with the War and the Navy Departments. At the close of the year arrangements were being made to secure close cooperation through a special war minerals committee with various State bureaus and technical societies in the problem of stimulating domestic mineral production, particularly the production of those imported minerals that were most likely to be inadequate in supply.

A number of special reports were submitted by the director to the various committees of which he is a member. Among these reports were a general summary of the problems connected with minerals of military importance, a summary of the sulphuric acid situation, a report on the petroleum situation, and maps and charts dealing with coal production.

The following is a summary of the more important lines of special work that have been undertaken:

INVENTORY OF MINING ENGINEERS AND CHEMISTS.

Under the supervision of A. H. Fay a directory of over 22,000 engineers and chemists was made and classified by various industrial groups with regard to experience and point of service. This inventory of technical experience and talent is serving as a source from which men can be secured for almost any special service or for knowledge of particular mineral resources or deposits in this country and in other parts of the world.

NITRATE SUPPLY.

The bureau is cooperating with the War Department in an investigation of the nitrate situation and the methods of fixing the nitrogen of the air in the combined condition, so that it may be available for munitions and fertilizers. C. L. Parsons, Chief Chemist of the Bureau, went abroad to investigate processes in use in England, France, Italy, Norway, and Sweden, and to obtain information regarding the latest process used in Germany. His report and recommendations were adopted in substance by the committee on nitrate supply, and a large plant for the production of nitrate acid for war purposes and ammonia for agricultural purposes is in process of erection.

The preparation of nitric acid from ammonia is an essential step in the production of explosives from atmospheric nitrogen. The processes for ammonia oxidation have until recently been confined to the Continent of Europe, and chiefly to Germany, and have been carefully guarded. The Bureau of Mines, in cooperation with the Semet-Solvay Co., has developed entirely new apparatus for this process, so that the Government is free of all patents and secret rights for methods to produce this very important material.

RAW MATERIALS FOR SULPHURIC ACID.

The bureau has cooperated with the chemical and fertilizer committees of the Council of National Defense in dealing with the problem of mineral raw materials for acid manufacture. A comprehensive report was prepared on the acid situation by A. G. White, mine economist. An extensive investigation of the possibilities of saving pyrite or marcasite from coal mines has been undertaken by the mining division, with a view to producing a valuable by-product from what has formerly been a waste material and even a source of danger in the mines. A number of the most promising pyrite mines have been examined. The possibility of using pyrrhotite and the steps required to develop a home supply of raw material for acid manufacture have been carried out by the division of mineral technology.

WAR GASES AND GAS MASKS.

Because of the experience gained in the study of poisoning gases in mines and the study of combating such gases with various types of protective apparatus the chemical and mining divisions of the bureau are working in cooperation with the War and Navy Departments in investigating war gases and masks. This work, which has assumed very extensive proportions, is under the direction of G. H. Burrell.

NICKEL SUPPLY.

The division of mineral technology has undertaken the study of the possibilities of developing a domestic nickel industry. Those deposits which offer the best prospect of development have been examined. The necessary information has been secured as to the Canadian deposits which are the present chief sources of the world's supply. This investigation has been carried out by C. E. Julihn.

MANGANESE SUPPLY.

One matter to which the Bureau of Mines has paid particular attention since the beginning of the war has been the problem of finding ways and means of supplying, from the deposits existing in this country, the manganese that is required by the iron and steel industry, and which is essential to the production of high-grade steel. Mr. W. C. Phalen, of the division of mineral technology, has examined the chief manganese-producing districts of this country with a view to their importance in furnishing an adequate suppy of manganese ore. Results of this investigation indicate that a very considerable percentage of our requirements can be supplied.

QUICKSILVER.

Another of the mineral resources of the country to which the Bureau of Mines has given particular attention has been quicksilver. At the time of the entry of the United States into the war it was not known how much of a demand there would be for this metal. However, in order to be able to meet the demand whenever it should occur, the Bureau of Mines at once took steps to investigate the status of the industry, to study the processes which are used in extracting quicksilver from its ores, and to devise ways and means whereby any losses of the metal occuring in the operation of these processes might be prevented. With the cooperation of the industry most favorable progress has been made in the prevention of the waste that formerly took place, thus increasing the Nation's output of this most valuable war metal.

POTASH.

In the past this country has been dependent upon foreign countries for its supply of potash. Consequently at the outbreak of the war the Bureau of Mines at once took up the problem of determining how the supply of potash needed in this country could be commercially obtained from our potash-bearing minerals, and especially waste materials, such as mill tailings produced in the ore dressing and metallurgical processes connected with the treatment of nonferrous ores, and from dust from cement plants. Most satisfactory progress has been made along this line, and from present indications this country will be able to obtain in the future a considerable part of the potash it needs from what are now considered waste materials.

PETROLEUM PRODUCTS.

The bureau has a special division working on the production, transportation, refining, and utilization of petroleum. Immediately after the declaration of war a report was prepared upon the general conditions in the petroleum industry to show whether war needs could be readily met. This report was delivered to the committee on petroleum of the Council of National Defense and to the Public Lands Committee of the Senate, who were then considering the petroleum lands situation.

Special statistics have been gathered for refinery products, particularly with regard to the supply of gasoline. Methods of increasing the recovery of gasoline from heavy oils and from natural gas have been developed. A report on accounting and cost keeping for oil producers has been completed. The reserves of oil shale have been investigated with a view to developing methods of treatment to supply our future needs.

An educational campaign has been undertaken to eliminate waste in the use of gasoline. The bureau has cooperated with the Navy Department in the design and construction of oil storage.

Specifications for the gasoline to be used for aeroplanes for our Government have been furnished and an investigation has been started to determine the best gasoline for different phases of aviation. Information has been supplied to military representatives of our allies, and, to be of maximum and immediate service to the aviation department, the Bureau of Mines is establishing a station, in charge of a petroleum chemical engineer, to test all fuels received for flying purposes. At the Pittsburgh and Washington laboratories many samples of gasoline are being tested for all branches of the Federal Government.

COAL.

The Fuel Division of the bureau tests all coal used for military purposes. An educational campaign is being carried on with regard to the saving of coal. The director, as a member of the coal committee of the Council of National Defense, has made all the technical information in the bureau available for the committee's use. In addition, an extensive series of maps was compiled for the committee.

EXPLOSIVES.

The explosives testing sections of the Mining Division have done important work in testing various substitutes for the scarcer and more expensive elements in war explosives for the Ordnance Department and for industrial purposes. It is now investigating the use of liquid oxygen and carbonaceous material as a blasting explosive as a substitute, under favorable conditions, for dynamite in the mines and quarries.

EXPLOSIVES BILL.

A bill has just passed the House and Senate giving the Director of the Bureau of Mines authority to license the production and distribution of explosives for other than military purposes. The main purpose of this bill is to guard against the possession and use of explosives in time of war by dangerous or hostile persons. The carrying out of the provision of this bill will involve an extensive organization covering every district in the country.

OTHER INVESTIGATIONS.

Other work related to problems developing in connection with the war includes a study of the formation of smoke or dust concealing clouds for use in warfare; experiment with a special electric furnace to melt brass for cartridges; and a study of the recovery of tin from scrap.

David Kemper Watson.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CLEMENT BRUMBAUGH,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 4, 1917.

Mr. BRUMBAUGH. Mr. Speaker, it is with personal sorrow and regret that I announce to the House the death of a former honored Member of the House, Hon. David Kemper Watson, whose death occurred on Friday, September 28, at his home in Columbus, Ohio.

Mr. Watson was for years a prominent, respected, and leading citizen of his city and State. He was a man of great industry, ability, and genial personality. He was a great lawyer, and his wide learning and high character won for him many positions of public trust, all of which he filled with fidelity and honor. He was former United States attorney for the southern district of Ohio, attorney general for the State of Ohio, and a Member of Congress.

By appointment by his personal friend, President McKinley, he wrote an exhaustive treatise and made an exhaustive codification of the Federal Constitution, a work of such value and merit that it will always stand as a monument to his legal scholarship and ability.

He was a manly man, a useful citizen, and a Christian gentleman. I shall ask the Clerk to read in my time an editorial which appeared in the Ohio State Journal, which I adopt as my estimate of him and tribute to him:

DAVID K. WATSON.

The death of David Kemper Watson takes from our community a prominent and respected citizen. He was a man of learning and high character and had enjoyed many positions of trust, all of which he filled with honor and ability. All who knew him will grieve that he has left us and will preserve all their lives a gentle memory of him. He was a great lawyer and wrote an exhaustive treatise on the Federal Constitution, which is regarded as an authority in all the courts, and which will always stand as a monument to his memory. He was a most interesting companion. His views and sentiments were of a high order and his influence always for the good. Long will old friends mourn that he has gone from among us.

I shall close this brief announcement by printing two beautiful poems written by Mr. Watson, which show his high moral character and firm religious convictions, based upon his faith in immortality:

JESUS THE LIGHT.

Into my soul there comes a light,
Clear, strong, and bright,
Which breaks the darkness
Of the night.

Jesus, Thou art that light,
To Thee I look, to Thee I come,
And ask of Thee
To take me home.

Be Thou my guiding star,
When I am lost and wandering far
From home and friends,
Be Thou my light, my guiding star.

LIFT ME, YE GLORIOUS STARS.

Lift me, ye glorious stars,
Beside yourselves,
That I may live and grow and die
Above the baseness of the world.

Lift me, ye glorious stars,
Beside yourselves,
That I may know my soul
And feel its ever-widening growth.

Lift me, ye glorious stars,
Beside yourselves,
And tell me where is God,
For I would know and then obey His word.

The Coal Shortage and Freight-Car Shortage.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. OSCAR E. BLAND,
OF INDIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, October 3, 1917.

Mr. BLAND. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House of Representatives, in order that we may completely and effectively mobilize our enormous industrial strength for this war the administration in charge has been granted full and complete authority and power to regulate and take charge of practically every industrial institution of the Nation. The imperative necessity for more ships, more aircraft, more submarines, more ammunition, more food, and countless other things, indispensable to the success of the war, was early recognized by Congress and the President and his advisers.

But, gentlemen, it seems to me that one essential thing, and probably the most essential, that should have been done early has been sadly neglected in some particulars and grossly mismanaged in others. You can not turn the wheels of industry and increase the output of our numerous shops, mills, and plants without an abundant supply of coal. Without coal the plant must shut down, the workmen must seek new fields of employment, and the product of the institution can not be turned out.

It therefore has been my constant endeavor since coming here on the 2d day of April last to urge that such measures be taken as would reasonably be calculated to encourage and stimulate an increased production of coal. I was prompted in this effort not only by the realization of the importance and the absolute necessity of coal and coal products in the mobilization of our industrial strength but I was impressed by the experience of our European allies in this connection.

In order to increase the production of coal, which we all deem so essential, three things are absolutely necessary: First, a profit to the operator and miner that will justify investment in coal-mining projects which probably in peace times would not be profitable, and which price would encourage the development and expansion of abandoned workings, as well as new fields—a profit that would justify the investment in high-priced machinery, mine equipment, and good wages. This profit should not be threatened unduly with the hazard of confiscation or unreasonable charge. Second, there must be a reasonable guaranty that there will be sufficient railroad equipment for the transportation of the products of the mines. Third, that there must be a sufficient amount of men to work in the coal mines.

Now, as to the first of these requisites, the price. Scarcity and competition, and probably in some instances the element of human greed—which I attribute mostly to the middleman—brought about during the past summer a high selling price for coal. Consumers, notwithstanding its scarcity, demanded a lower price, which, as I will show you, in some instances was also prompted by the element of human greed, heedless of the fact that an unwise regulation and reduction of prices would only result in an enormously decreased production, the one thing which this Nation can not stand for. The miners' organization demanded higher wages, and they were clearly entitled to them. The officials of the miners and operators met in New York and a wage scale was agreed upon, in which the miners received increased wages. The coal operators realized that the unrestricted sale of coal on the market would result in prohibitive and outrageous prices, and, Mr. Speaker, these splendid and patriotic men, realizing the trend of affairs, did a thing that no other organization of men in the range of my knowledge ever attempted to do. They met in Washington City with the Hon. Francis Peabody, chairman of the committee on coal production of the Council of National Defense, and voluntarily agreed to the price of coal, which was an enormous reduction over the selling price in the open market at that time, and, in my judgment, such a price as would have been calculated to have brought about, and was bringing about, an enormous increased coal production in the United States. A price on bituminous mine-run coal and screening of $2.75 per ton was agreed to. Under this agreement the little wagon mines by the thousands and tens of thousands were opened all over this Republic, which not only took care of the local trade, but was contributing millions of tons for railroad shipments. Thin veins and small isolated tracts, old abandoned fields, and new fields were being quickly developed, and, of course, under the speeding-up process, at great cost and risk. I traveled from Washington through Maryland, Pennsylvania, Ohio, and Indiana by automobile during that time, and I visited railroad and wagon mines that were busily engaged in turning out coal that are shut down to-day, and I saw prospecting and development going on everywhere.

Dr. Garfield, a splendid gentleman, but, as far as I know, without any special knowledge of the coal question, was by the administration appointed as coal director, or coal dictator, and he immediately gave attentive ear to every large consumer who demanded cheaper coal. Such men as Mr. Insull, the great utilities king of Chicago, who uses half a million cars of screenings every year, and the Armour plant, of Chicago, who are very large consumers, demanded that a lower price be fixed, and Mr. Insull to-day is buying his screenings at $1.70 per ton instead of $2.75 as a result of the efforts of himself and others who worked with him. Without due investigation, without proper consideration, without going into detail, without weighing the consequences or making proviso or exceptions, and, as I remember it now, without the coal producer being heard, the coal dictator arbitrarily fixed a price on coal of $1.70 for screenings and $1.90 for mine run. Now, I am not saying that this is not a good price for coal when conditions are normal. It is probably too high under normal conditions, and there could be no complaint if it were not for the fact that the fixing of this price has struck the coal industry of this Nation a hard blow and done more to decrease the output than any other single act that could have been done. No provision was made for the fellow with the thin vein or the bad roof or who mined block coal. No provision was made for the fellow who ran the wagon mine and hauled coal to the railroad, and it was through the efforts of myself and others interested that a ruling was made permitting the wagon-mine fellow to charge for his wagon haulings. No one will contend seriously but what the operator with a new mine, with favorable conditions, with good equipment, can and will make a handsome profit at the present figure, and will continue to operate, and he will be pointed to as the "coal baron" who is made rich under the present fabulous figure. But woe to the fellow, whose mine was run down, who is required to buy new equipment, and who mines under expensive conditions. The coal car that not long ago cost $40 now costs $120, and motor, which is absolutely necessary to a large production, did cost $2,200 and now costs $5,000, and copper wire, steel rails, and all the thousand and one articles of equipment have so enormously increased in price that the operator, unless he is well financed and operates under the most favorable conditions, will not invest in them. He intends to patch up his old track, haul his coal with mules, fix up his old cars, and try to get along under the present prices and make as large profit as he can. Could you expect him to act otherwise? But let us look to this side of the question. What condition will his mine be in at the end of this war, or during the last part of the war if it continues any great length of time?

As an example of the foolhardiness and irresponsible conduct on the part of those who are responsible for fixing of coal prices let me cite you to a Pennsylvania case, where coal from the Pittsburgh field is shipped down the Ohio River to Steubenville and there made into coke. A ton and a half of coal will make a ton of coke. Mr. Coke Man, under the present price fixed by the coal dictator, gets $6 a ton, and all the countless by-products, including gas, will sell for more than he paid for the coal. Fine thing for the coke man, but certainly hard on the coal producer. I merely refer to this for the purpose of convincing you that the present price of coal was established without regard to consequences and without due investigation as to the many ramifications of this most important enterprise.

As to the second requisite for increased coal production, which is that of sufficient transportation facilities, I desire to say that from the best available figures obtainable in the departments of this Government there are only 900,780 coal cars in the United States. These cars are used to-day for shipping automobiles, sand and gravel, iron, stone, and countless articles of commerce, while on the other hand there are 1,041,033 box cars. Box cars are used to transfer goods both ways. Coal cars ordinarily travel one way empty. The building of numerous steel cars has rendered useless thousands of the wooden cars included in the above figures, for the reason that they can not safely place a light wooden car in a train of heavy steel cars. It is estimated by the best railroad men of the country that it requires 200,000 freight cars per year—this includes all kinds—to take the place of the cars put out of commission.

The present capacity of the nine car factories in the United States, including the railroads, who put out 20,000 cars per year, if speeded up to the limit of their capacity could probably build a little less than 300,000 cars per year. I have authentic figures to the effect that these factories, including the railroads, to-day, on account of shortage of labor, shortage and high-priced materials, and especially on account of the difficulty in securing money while the Government is in the market, are turning out only a little over 135,000 cars per year. From this number enormous quantities are going to France and Russia. We also have an enormous shortage of locomotives and several thousands of locomotives are being furnished to France and Russia. I here desire to insert a statement from the Washington Evening Star, dated at Buffalo, September 26, by Daniel Willard, chairman of the Council of National Defense, in his address to the Grain Dealers' Association:

The more engines we send to Russia, the fewer of our boys will be sent to France. Russia wants from 1,000 to 1,500 locomotives, and France wants an equal number, this supply to come from a shop capacity of 5,500 locomotives a year, out of which America's demand in normal times would be 4,000. These engines are vital to the cause of the allies.

Now, we must take care of the allies. No one questions that, but I regard it my imperative duty to strongly urge and insist that in our care for the allies we do not cripple industries of the United States upon whom the allies, as well as the people of the United States, are dependent. I repeat here what I said in Congress on September 8: "I find no well-aimed attempt on the part of those in charge is being made to relieve this astounding condition that must eventually seriously handicap our ability to make the most of our opportunities." The car-service committee, in their near-sighted efforts to relieve the distressed conditions which hourly grow worse, put into effect a preferential shipment order, and I can not condemn them for so doing, because it was essential that some shippers be preferred over others, and thus the distress was only localized and the relief only temporary. But what is the future hope of the preferential shipping order? Where, from this policy, can we hope to come a permanent cure for our distressing conditions?

The railroad companies say that they can not and will not supply the enormous demand for freight cars and rolling stock. Money is too scarce, and materials and labor are too high. I have in my files a great number of letters from railroad commissions, railroad presidents, and other men intimately connected with the railroad business, in which they say, in substance, that the only remedy for the condition that now exists—and it must get worse—is for the Government, under the same kind of powers granted to it for building ships, to build railroad cars and sell them to the railroad companies on such terms as the Interstate Commerce Commission or the proper Government officials may determine. The Government can pay the price for material, and the Government can secure the labor.

On September 4 I introduced a bill as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That the President of the United States is hereby authorized to expend $100,000,000 out of the sums heretofore or hereafter appropriated for ships, or, in his discretion, out of any money in the Treasury not otherwise appropriated, for the construction or acquirement of freight cars to be used in the transportation by the railroad companies of the United States of coal and other products and commodities pursuant to the provisions of the act entitled "An act to amend the act to regulate commerce, as amended, and for other purposes," approved August 10, 1917; and in the execution of this authority for the acquirement and construction of said cars the President may exercise all the powers heretofore conferred upon him by law with reference to ships. The President may direct the Interstate Commerce Commission to exercise the power hereby vested in him, or he may designate such other person or persons as he sees fit to exercise said power and authority, subject to his approval; and the cars so acquired or constructed shall be used by the railroad companies under such terms and for such compensation as may be approved by the President, and, as far as possible, under agreements providing for the purchase of such cars by the railroad companies receiving them. The President shall cause to be made public, monthly, information as to the number of cars acquired and constructed, the names of contractors and the terms of contracts, and the disposition of the cars; and he shall submit a detailed report to Congress at its next regular session of each and all operations and expenditures pursuant to this act.

I do not think there is a man on the Interstate and Foreign Commerce Committee but what has courage and ability, and I do not think there is a one of them but what knows that the condition I complain of is alarming and is growing steadily worse, and I furthermore believe that they must recognize that the only relief probable is through the source offered by this bill, and yet no move has been made to this hour to bring this bill out of committee or any other bill calculated to bring about the same result. I have considered the advisability of having the Government loan the railroad companies money, but I fear that this would only prove a partial success. In our efforts not only to win the war but to maintain the prosperity and general welfare of our country we can not afford to take the chances of not having the means of transporting the products of our wonderful institutions. Mr. N. L. Amster, of Boston, Mass., of the Rock Island Railroad Co., in writing to me in support of the measures I introduced, states that on August 23 he wrote to President Woodrow Wilson as follows:

I wish to bring to your attention the serious condition of our railroads, with respect to their inability to market long-term bonds, which is so vitally necessary if they are to operate efficiently and economically, and if they are to retain their solvency.

You are doubtless aware that because of the financial recklessness that was brought to light by the Interstate Commerce Commission in their investigation of the New Haven; Pere Marquette; Cincinnati, Hamilton & Dayton; The Frisco; and Rock Island, that railroad credit received a severe shock, which precluded the marketing of long-term bonds. Recently the Adamson law, the increased cost of fuel and supply, and the refusal of the Interstate Commerce Commission to permit railroads advancing their rates has still further reduced the salability of railroad securities.

The Government issue of $2,000,000,000 3½ tax-exempt bonds and the present proposed issue of additional bonds at 4 per cent are further reasons why railroads could not find a ready market for their bonds. Meanwhile, both Government and public are calling for more and better service. You well know that unless railroads can market bonds they can neither make the necessary improvements nor meet maturing obligations, which may mean bankruptcy for many railroads, and would cripple their service to the country. It would also mean great hardship to many of our people who have their savings invested in railroad securities. It must also affect the stability of our savings banks and insurance companies, who own large blocks of railroad bonds, and here, too, the greatest sufferers will be those of limited means.

As president of the above mutual association and as chairman of the stockholders' protective committee of the Rock Island Railway Co. I have given the subject matter long and serious consideration, and am convinced that the United States Government can and should relieve the situation.

The Government has high and unlimited credit. It is issuing billions of dollars of bonds for itself and its allies. Railroads of this country are as essential in the conduct of this great war as are our allies. The people who have their hard-earned savings invested in railroad securities need and are entitled to the aid of this Government. May I therefore suggest that in the next issue of liberty bonds that there be included $200,000,000 or $300,000,000 for the purpose of loaning to railroads on proper and safe securities, subject to the approval of the President of the United States and the recommendation of the Interstate Commerce Commission, the Railroad Valuation Commission, or some special commission created for that purpose? Such financial aid from the Government at this time would enable the railroads to carry out their extension and improvement program, and put them in position to render efficient and uninterrupted service, which is imperative in the conduct of our war. Such aid will also prevent further shrinkage of securities held by our investing public and savings institutions, and will tend to free the railroads from the well-known money powers of Wall Street, to which you aptly called attention when governor in 1911.

The Government can do all this without the slightest risk. May I hope that this will receive your favorable consideration? I am deeply interested in this work, and am anxious to serve our country to the fullest extent of my power, and shall be happy to hold myself ready at your command to go to Washington or elsewhere to consult with anyone to whom you may refer this communication.

Lawrence B. Finn, chairman of the Railroad Commission of the State of Kentucky, writes me as follows:

Representative BLAND, M. C.,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. BLAND: In the Traffic World, a periodical published in Chicago, Ill., bearing date September 8, I note that you have introduced House bill 5919, appropriationg $100,000,000 to be spent by the President for the construction or acquisition of freight cars for the purpose of carrying coal and other products.

I heartily indorse this measure, as it is in conformity with views expressed by me as chairman of the Kentucky Railroad Commission on May 3, 1917, copy of which opinion I inclose to you, and the suggestion in the opinion approving your proposed policy is marked.

Yours, very truly,

LAWRENCE B. FINN, Chairman.

John T. Oliphant, president of the Oliphant-Johnson Coal Co., of Indiana, one of the largest coal shippers and producers of the State, in an interview in the Vincennes Capital, September 8, said:

It sounds good to me. The making of more cars and putting them on the rails would, indeed, relieve the extreme car shortage which the country has faced for some time.

Edward Theobald, of the firm of Anderson & Theobald, one of the largest sand and gravel firms in Indiana, in an interview in the same paper on the same date, said:

It is the greatest piece of constructive legislation I know of, and in the event 200,000 or 300,000 freight cars, including all kinds, were manufactured the present existing conditions would be relieved.

W. H. Doble, of the Pneumatic Scale Co., of Norfolk Downs, Mass., on September 28, 1917, wrote me as follows:

SEPTEMBER 28, 1917.

Representative BLAND, Member of Congress,
Washington, D. C.

DEAR SIR: The writer has noted with interest the following bill introduced by you: House bill 5919, appropriating $100,000,000 to be spent by the President for the construction or acquisition of freight cars to be so used.

We all realize that through the inefficiency on the part of the railroads at the present time it has created a burden upon the general public, owing to the difficulty in obtaining the necessities of life transported by our railroads throughout the country. Never before in history have the railroads had to deal with conditions as now exist in the matter of freight congestion, and although the number of freight cars now being operated is greatly in excess of former years it is evident that owing to the present abnormal conditions at least 50 per cent more equipment is needed in order to move freight with promptness and dispatch * * *."

Yours, very truly,

PNEUMATIC SCALE CORPORATION (LTD.),
W. H. DOBLE.

On September 4, H. R. Kurrie, president of the Monon, in reply to my inquiry, wrote as follows:

* * * It will be a great help to the general situation to have these cars, and with the Government going in the market for 4 per cent money, it is pretty hard for the railroads to get sufficient funds with which to expand. Then, too, the railroads are deferred somewhat in the purchase of new equipment by reason of the high price of materials, which would not influence the Government so much.

This might be handled by the Government undertaking to purchase the equipment bonds put out by the railroads, allowing the railroads themselves to make the purchase of the equipment and giving the Government some control over the equipment until the debt is paid off. This would avoid the creation of an agency which the Government would have to have if it owned the equipment. While the scheme is necessarily a large one and would require much more careful consideration than I have been able to give it, I do believe it would be helpful not only to the railroads but to the general situation, and I am sure the railroads will be glad to use the equipment on any fair basis. It is certain to help the Indiana situation to have this number of new cars on the railroads. As it is now, our cars get away from us and are used for other purposes than hauling coal, so whether the new cars find their way to the coal fields or not their presence will certainly benefit the general situation.

Samuel Pickens, solicitor for the Pittsburgh, Cincinnati, Chicago & St. Louis Railroad Co., on September 29, wrote me the following letter:

MY DEAR MR. BLAND: I have read your speech and your freight-car bill, which I thank you for sending me with your letter of the 27th instant.

I believe that your bill, should it become a law, will afford considerable relief in the present tremendous transportation emergency. That relief is needed, every person who has given any consideration to the question will surely admit.

Edward Hungerford, advertising manager of the Wells, Fargo Co., who recently had an interesting article in the Nation's Business on "Drafting the box car," wrote me on October 1, from 51 Broadway, New York, as follows:

DEAR MR. BLAND: I was very much interested in reading your speech as delivered in the House on September 8. I am very much in sympathy with your stand and your bill.

Not only do our railroads need new equipment to meet the vast increased burdens that are being placed upon their shoulders but there is a phase of it that only a few of us outside of the transportation operating circles only understand. I refer to the rapid deterioration of the present equipment. It is not a serious problem now, but is apt to become so before the winter is advanced. Engine failures are constant and frequent as well as the breaking down of the cars themselves.

If I were a member of your distinguished House, I should beg to offer an amendment to H. R. 5919, which would also provide for the immediate building of new locomotives—their need is hardly less than that of the cars. And perhaps I should also ask for an appropriation for terminals and warehouses.

This is far too big a question for me to discuss fully in a letter. * * *.

Now, as to the third requisite for an increased and permanent production of coal, we must have the miner. He is here in Washington City, through his accredited representatives, demanding more wages. Considering the fact that, on account of the shortage of cars, the mines average one-half time and that living is so enormously high no one will seriously contend that the coal miner is not entitled to a larger wage, and if you do not make it possible for him to get a better wage, he will leave the mining industry and seek employment in one of the occupations that is open for him to-day at a higher wage. Under the conscription act there was no exemption made in his case, and under the clause of the act authorizing the President for the national welfare to exempt classes of men, there has been no action taken by the Executive. Our miner boys are being pulled out of the mines and sent to the trenches. England did this with the Welsh miners and was forced to ship them back from the front and put them in the mines again so they could have coal. In some particulars we seem to learn very little from the experience of others. During the consideration of the conscription act I introduced an amendment exempting coal miners from the draft, but those in charge of the bill had no instructions from those higher up to let such an amendment be made, and so without hesitation it was overwhelmingly voted down.

I am informed that P. H. Penna, secretary of the Indiana Coal Operators, in conversation with Dr. Garfield the other day, said, in substance, that a coal famine was sure to overtake us by January 1. Dr. Garfield asked him what could be done to prevent it. Mr. Penna said that he feared it was too late to prevent it—too much harm had already been done and that this famine was in fact upon us now.

Now, gentlemen, I have given you the facts as I get them. I am not an alarmist, and I do not want to too severely criticize anyone connected with the present administration. They have a hard task to perform and some of those in charge have been selected without any regard to their qualifications. In my opinion some of them have been selected largely because of political or personal friendships only. They are, no doubt, doing the best they can, but we must learn something from our experiences, and must not permit this intolerable condition of freight-car and coal shortage to continue to exist and daily grow worse until our matchless industrial strength is paralyzed. What I have said is not said in a spirit of narrow party criticism, because I think that those of you who have watched my very brief and uneventful career in Congress know that I have to the fullest extent devoted my time and energy to helping the present administration to try to solve the many perplexing problems that confront them in connection with this terrible war, and I am saying what I say here to-day only for the purpose of helping to remedy what to my mind is a very dangerous situation.

War Revenue.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. AARON S. KREIDER,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. KREIDER. Mr. Speaker, I shall vote for the pending measure. Although at this time an estimate to determine even approximately the amount of revenue it will provide is impossible, there is no doubt that the State I have the honor in part to represent in this body will be heavily taxed and that it will contribute an amount perhaps larger than that to come from any other Commonwealth. In this connection I shall discuss briefly the mobilization of the vast resources of Pennsylvania—the work for the war there.

Six months ago, in recognition of the obvious necessity for Nation-wide coordination of State energies and resources to permit of the most vigorous prosecution of war by the Federal Government, the committee of public safety for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, including more than 300 representative civilians, was appointed by the governor.

The committee began its appointed labors under a plan which concentrates activities into 5 divisions comprising 17 separate working departments, all under compact, central executive control, the entire work of rendering effective State aid to the Nation's war effort being financed by a legislative appropriation of $2,000,000. Coincident with the financing of the work, supervision of all expenditures was vested in a commission composed of the five highest elective officers of the Commonwealth.

In the brief period which has elapsed since its creation the committee has completed its organization throughout the 67 counties of the State. County units duplicate, so far as is possible in their structure, all of the divisions and departments of the State body, so that complete coordination of effort is possible, and has been attained in every line of activity so far undertaken.

Comprising as it does the five major divisions of administration, which includes departments of finance, publicity, legislation, and allied bodies; relief, including departments of sanitation, medicine, and Red Cross and civic relief; equipment and supply, with departments of food supply, materials, plants, and motors and motor trucks; service, with departments of civilian service and labor, military service, naval service, and guards, police, and inspection; and division of transportation, with departments of railroads, electric railways and motors, and highways and waterways, the committee has a working range covering practically every field of useful endeavor.

Being the only body possessing State authority to mobilize and conserve all resources essential to the promotion of the war, the committee has obtained the willingly granted right to assimilate operations of established organizations and institutions, and, as necessity demanded, these have been incorporated almost wholly or in part into the general work. Activities of official State departments essential to the efficiency of the committee's program have also been placed at its command, so that it stands as the one organization having equipment and capacity for carrying out its great work.

Thus the committee has succeeded in effecting a concentration of effort not paralleled at any other time in Pennsylvania's history and probably unexcelled by any other State mobilization of potential resources.

The work of the committee of public safety is outlined in the following article by Mr. L. W. Strayer, a widely known journalist stationed at the National Capital, and published in the Pittsburgh Dispatch September 30, 1917:

Without tumult or shouting but with remarkable results the tremendous energies of Pennsylvania, the greatest industrial Commonwealth in the Union, are being conserved, mobilized, and developed for the promotion of the war. Through a concentration of effort that is without parallel in the State's history, Pennsylvania is preparing to place at the disposal of the Government all of its potential resources that may be required in this country and abroad. In this great and vital work is embraced every effort, from the direction of hundreds of millions of money and the creation of armies to making two potatoes grow where one grew before.

Pennsylvania is no slacker State. The pride of the people awakens at the names of Robert Morris, Jay Cooke, and other financiers of the Nation's wars, as it does to a reference to Independence Hall, Betsy Ross's home, Washington's Crossing, Valley Forge, Gettysburg, the three of its cities that sheltered the National Government, and the other historic facts that illumine the pages of its lustrous record. Now the State will give its best in men and money, and give it freely. Nobody is prepared to make even a guess as to the huge amount of money Pennsylvania will pour into the National Treasury under the new war-revenue act. The State's wealth at the beginning of the world war was estimated roughly at approximately $16,000,000,000, and a suggestion of what it may contribute to the war fund is presented by the fact that for the year 1916 it paid in income taxes and from other sources of internal revenue an amount larger than the amount of such taxes paid by all of the Southern States and almost as large as that paid by all of the States west of the Mississippi River. The Keystone State subscribed for $313,000,000 of the liberty bond issue and stands ready to subscribe for its entire quota of the coming bond issue, whatever the amount may be.

The coordination of Pennsylvania's energies and resources is being directed by the committee of public safety, consisting of more than 300 representative civilians, appointed by the governor under an act of the legislature. The committee has been pronounced by a man who ought to know—Herbert C. Hoover—a model of economy and efficiency. Soon after undertaking its work it established in Philadelphia and Pittsburgh and in each of the 65 outside counties a local organization, composed of manufacturers, mining operators, business men, professional men, wage earners, and farmers. The membership of these county units compose Pennsylvania's civilian army of active workers, a body of more than 15,000 men that is being continually augmented. Through these workers the committee, from its headquarters in Philadelphia and its branches throughout the State, is in direct communication with every industry, organization, institution, and profession in Pennsylvania whose capacities, operations, or personnel in any way can be applied to the service of the State or Nation in time of war.

The magnitude of its labors can be judged by the fact that it has indexed data relating to the organization, capacity, and activities of every iron and steel plant that can manufacture a munition of war or other material the Government can use for war purposes, every mill that can turn out khaki or any other article included in the equipment of a soldier or a sailor, every factory that manufactures anything that enters into shipbuilding, and every branch of industry having any relation to the production, conservation, and distribution of food products.

Pennsylvania is famous for its vast industries and its mines. Its agricultural interests are comparatively unknown beyond its borders. It is a State of small farms, the average number of acres to a farm being about 84. But the number of farms exceeds 225,000, nearly 100,000 more than that of Nebraska, nearly 50,000 more than that of Kansas, and three times greater than the number of farms in South Dakota. In its labors to increase the food production the committee deals directly with each of these farmers. In 1916 Pennsylvania produced about 26,000,000 bushels of wheat. This year the wheat crop is expected to exceed 35,000,000 bushels. The corn crop, which last year was about 56,000,000 bushels, this year will exceed 75,000,000 bushels. There will be a proportionate increase in the rye crop, and in many counties the potato crop has been more than doubled. When the committee was organized the value of the live stock in Pennsylvania was estimated at about $179,000,000. By January 1 it is estimated that it will reach $200,000,000. Remarkable results have been accomplished in the increase of dairy products and poultry.

The committee's activities also include the establishment of community and roadside markets throughout the State; community storage houses where farmers may store potatoes and other products to prevent abnormally high prices; the organization of a county motor-truck service, and an inventory of all pleasure cars, with a registry of the drivers, who may be called upon in an emergency; the establishment of labor bureaus to facilitate employment, deal with the problems arising from the employment of alien labor, and for purposes of mediation and conciliation; the organization of the electric railroads as a war auxiliary to the steam roads, and plans for improved transportation facilities, including better highways and the utilization of waterways; and the organization of the women of Pennsylvania for active service in the conservation and distribution of food supplies.

A problem that confronted the committee was the extension of its work to the large foreign population in the mining and industrial districts. It is said that in one county nearly 30 languages and dialects are spoken. Through this element of the population the organization has been highly successful. For example, if the Government at Washington requests a list of physicians, dentists, or pharmacists willing to serve in the war who speak French, Hungarian, Italian, Roumanian, Croatian, Russian, or almost any other language, the committee can supply such a list, with complete information relative to the equipment they possess and the amount of it that can be placed at the disposal of the War Department. The committee has the names of thousands of these men, who have volunteered to serve the Army when necessary.

A feature of the work of food conservation is a food-demonstration train, which is going through the State, from which experts are demonstrating approved methods of conserving foods. One car is devoted to the drying and canning of fruits and vegetables in the home. Another has a demonstration of bread making with the use of such wheat substitutes as rye and corn flours, potatoes, etc. A third car presents a series of graphic illustrations of the significance of food conservation and its need as a war measure. This train everywhere has aroused the interest of the people.

The man who is directing the work of the Committee of Public Safety is Lewis S. Sadler, of Carlisle, whose title is executive manager. Mr. Sadler was selected for this post after a canvass that included the directing head of every great corporation and every other man who has a record of success in the financial and industrial life of Pennsylvania. The results brought about by the committee are due to his resourcefulness and administrative ability. Mr. Sadler gave up his large business interests in central Pennsylvania, went to the headquarters of the committee in the Finance Building, Philadelphia, took off his coat and plunged into the work of the war in Pennsylvania. He has been at his desk from 8 o'clock in the morning until a late hour at night ever since. With all of his associates, he is giving his time and labor to the Government as a patriotic duty and without compensation. The committee pays no salaries and its officials pay their own expenses.

I also incorporate as part of my remarks an address delivered by Hon. Frank B. McClain, lieutenant governor of Pennsylvania, at the Pennsylvania Food Congress, in Philadelphia, September 29, 1917. As a representative of the State government Lieut. Gov. McClain, in cooperation with the Committee of Public Safety, has rendered an important service to the Nation in the conservation and development of Pennsylvania's resources. Lieut. Gov. McClain said:

This gathering and the purpose which has brought it about suggests to me that—

A battleship's a wonder and an army's mighty grand,
And warrin's a profession, only heroes understand;
There's somethin' sort o'thrillin' in a flag that's wavin' high;
And it makes you want to holler when the boys go marchin' by.
But when the shoutin's over and fightin's done, somehow
We find we're still dependin' on "the man behind the plow."

I heartily concur in the plaudits that are given "the boys that wear the khaki," "the man behind the gun"; but there is another fellow, I repeat, whose helpin' to fight this war; in fact, he's the whole concern's foundation. Therefore—

Remember when you hear drums and martial trumpets cheer
That upon some little farm the work is done
In a simple, hum-drum way, day succeeding toilsome day,
That supports the man that "marches with the gun."

I am not a farmer myself, but the business of dealer in live stock for farmers' uses, which I have followed for 35 years, has brought me into intimate, intelligent contact with farm production, and my observation has been that effective work on the farm requires possession of the soil instinct, requires a combination of brains and brawn, an expenditure of intelligent thought, coupled with nonunionized hours of labor and ability to withstand backache.

Everybody has advice to give the farmer. Pick up any newspaper and read the suggestion of the "kid scribblers," and some gray-haired, ones, too, as to how and why the farmer should save the country. Most of those who write the stuff, I'll wager, don't know whether alfalfa grows on trees or is dug out of the ground like potatoes. And then we have the bankers, and school-teachers, and merchants, and preachers, and doctors, and lawyers, a large proportion of whom wouldn't know at which end of the plow to hitch the horse, and the "roof-garden" agriculturists, who wouldn't know a tobacco leaf from a lettuce leaf, holding meetings and passing resolutions urging the farmer to "get busy," produce more, and keep down the cost of living. But, in spite of this "windy wordiness," the farmer smiles and smiles, keeps on his simple, humdrum way, knowing that if his advisers had their way or he followed their plan his lot would be bankruptcy and the Nation would starve to death.

The consumer cries out, "Plant, plant, plant more" and "Produce bigger crops of everything," and in the next breath denounces the farmer as a robber when the farmer charges a price for his products that will only yield him a fair return for his expenditure of energy and money. The tools used in farming cost twice what they did a few years ago. Wages on the farm have more than doubled in the past five years, and hard to get at that. The boarding of farm help has become an impressive item of expense. The call to the colors aggravates the farm-labor situation, because there is more glamor to the farm boy in being "the man behind the gun" than in being "the man behind the plow."

Any scheme for increased production must take in live stock and meat making, and those who are crying "plant everything in wheat and corn" do not take into account that if you cut down pastures you'll reduce meat supply and dairy supplies. In years gone by we have had more than enough meat for home use and had a liberal surplus for export purposes, but in recent years population has increased rapidly. The big western ranges, where meat was made on cheap grass feed, have been broken up into small, or comparatively small, farms. The selling price of cattle grew lower than the cost of production and the big cattle companies "cashed in" and "passed out." We didn't have to wait until the war came to witness the result. More than a year before the war began the problem of an increased population and a decreased available supply confronted us. Within the last two years that condition of affairs has been made more acute by reason of practically the whole world drawing on the United States for meat, and a still greater acuteness of the meat situation will ensue. A meat famine as well as a milk famine will face us if the grain acreage is much increased at the expense of the pastures.

Even at the present high prices of beef, the highest on record in the history of this Nation, stock raising and meat making, particularly beef making, is not a "rose-bordered path to wealth"; is not a business enterprise that can be classed among the big dividend payers, and anybody who doubts this statement can "get into the game" and satisfy himself; "the door" is open.

Equal in importance with the supply of wheat and corn is the meat industry; the raising, the fattening, transportation, and the slaughtering of meat-making animals is one of the greatest elements of American enterprise, industry, and economy, and is one of the branches of modern agriculture in which we have taught lessons to the world. It spans the country and crosses the oceans. It commands the attention of statesmen and challenges financiers. In volumes of dollars and cents, it represents more than any other single item in American production or American commerce. Coupled with wheat and corn, it is the greatest and most important element of American export, and the cattle and hogs and sheep grower and feeder, associated with the slaughterer, finds his occupation the most necessary in the land, with the exception of, but equal to, the wheat producer and the baker.

Referring particularly to the live-cattle industry, let me call to your attention, as a matter of information to some of you, perhaps, that at the five great cattle markets of the country, namely, Chicago, Kansas City, Omaha, St. Louis, and St. Joseph, the receipts of cattle of all kinds for the year 1917 were 6,224,000 head, up to and including Wednesday, September 26. The receipts covering the same period in 1916 were 5,173,000 head. Thus indicating an increase in cattle receipts of 1,051,000 head. The receipts of hogs at the five markets mentioned, for the period in 1917 to which I refer, were 12,720,000 head, as compared with 11,128,000 head in 1916, indicating a decrease in hogs of 1,418,000 head. The receipts of sheep at the same markets for the quoted period of 1917 were 6,384,000 head, as compared with 7,266,000 head, a decrease of 882,000 head. The receipts at the five markets which I have named are fairly indicative, in fact, absolutely indicative, of the live-stock situation in a nation-wide way covering cattle, hogs, and sheep.

Therefore, as compared with 1916, we seem to be this year "long" on cattle and "short" on hogs and sheep; but though the number of head of cattle is one-fifth in excess of the number marketed up to this time last year, yet the pounds of beef represented are no more than we had in 1916, because the average weight of the cattle marketed this year for beef purposes, and as well for feeding purposes (stockers and feeders we call them in the trade), is 20 per cent less than in 1916. And this has been brought about by the great demand at home and abroad for American beef, which demand has made necessary the taking of cattle for beef purposes in less mature condition than in the past.

On the subject of beef making in Pennsylvania I can speak with some first-hand knowledge. As president of the Lancaster Live Stock Exchange, and statistician for the same, I keep weekly records of receipts of cattle and average weights of cattle at the Union Stock Yards, Lancaster, which point is the great distributing place for stockers and feeders to about 20 counties in eastern, southeastern, and central Pennsylvania. Farmers in eastern Pennsylvania have not taken this summer and fall, thus far, 70 per cent of the cattle for winter feeding that they took in 1916 during the same period. What they may do between this and January 1 will depend largely upon the price at which the new corn crop sells after the same has been husked and housed.

My opinion is that if corn sells for $1.50 per bushel and upwards not more than 80 per cent of the number of head of cattle will be wintered this year in eastern Pennsylvania, as compared with the number fed in the same territory last winter. With the weights of feeders now being taken by farmers, only 80 per cent of what they were last year, the result will be about 64 per cent as much beef made in pounds as was made in these counties last winter and marketed in March, April, May, and June of this year. If corn should sell at $1 per bushel, or thereabouts, the number of cattle fed will equal the number fed last winter; but even at that, for the reasons which I have just recited, namely, the feeders weighing only 80 per cent as much as last fall, the maximum crop of beef produced in this important and really agricultural section of our Commonwealth will be but 80 per cent of the amount produced during the winter of 1916–17.

So far as pork production is concerned, the price of the same furnishes sufficient incentive to farmers to make all they can. Everybody who can afford to buy a shoat is making pork, and no propaganda is necessary to stimulate production in this direction. In so far as making mutton is concerned, eastern Pennsylvania farms, in the main, are not adapted to the grazing or feeding of sheep. So far as the grazing of sheep is concerned, the same can not be profitably done on land costing or worth from $150 to $200 per acre. There are parts of Pennsylvania in which sheep raising might be remuneratively engaged in, but the difficulty is to get the raw material; and then, again, sheep require more attention than any other class of live stock, labor is high, and our highly-commendable compulsory education system makes it impossible to enlist children in the rôle of shepherds.

Taken on the whole, meat production—and in the term meat production I contemplate beef, mutton, and pork—will, in Pennsylvania, during the winter of 1917–18, be less than it was in 1916–17. And if the same condition of affairs prevails in a country-wide way, I expect within the next six months to see porterhouse steak and canvasback duck with the same price set after them on restaurant menu cards.

In winning this war bread foods and meat foods, we are told, are as essential as guns and bullets. At no time in the history of our Nation has any sister Commonwealth exceeded Pennsylvania in its contribution of men and money to uphold our national honor and maintain the dignity and glory of the Stars and Stripes. The history of Pennsylvania in this respect will be repeated in the present crisis, but more than that, Pennsylvania will contribute its full quota of the foods necessary to feed her home people and then some to help "the man behind the gun." One of Pennsylvania's greatest, if not its greatest asset, in common with the Nation, are the men who follow the pastoral art of husbandry; men who begin their daily task with the first streak of dawn and keep at it until the stars speckle the night sky. Our beef crop, our pork crop, or corn crop, our wheat crop, our potato crop, in spite of the fact that Pennsylvania is known almost exclusively as an industrial State, will be no mean contribution to the demonstration now being made that not the hand that wields the saber, not the hand that pulls the trigger, but the hand that feeds the nations is the hand that will rule the world.

Statement of the Mexican Consul General.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JEFF: McLEMORE,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 4, 1917.

Mr. McLEMORE. Mr. Speaker, the Mexican consul general at New York, Mr. Juan T. Burns, has given a statement to the Associated Press, which has been freely published throughout the country, stating that Mexicans were being illegally drafted in Texas for service in the National Army. In reply to the statement of Consul General Burns, I am in receipt of a telegram from the Webb County Exemption Board, at Laredo, Tex., which reads as follows:

This board protests against and brands as a lie this morning's statement in press of Mexican Consul General Burns, of New York, regarding the action of the exemption boards in Texas concerning Mexican citizens. We ask you to take vigorous action against him.

Mr. Speaker, those who comprise the Webb County Exemption Board are high-class men and as good citizens as there are in the State, and this answer to the charge of the Mexican consul general at New York is direct and to the point, and will be accepted as bona fide wherever they are known.

Belgium—the Gethsemane of Liberty and the Martyr of Freedom.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. EDWARD T. TAYLOR,

OF COLORADO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, October 2, 1917.

Mr. TAYLOR of Colorado. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I am herewith inserting a brief address of welcome delivered by Hon. Alva Adams on the occasion of the reception tendered by the city of Pueblo, Colo., to the Belgian Commission.

Gov. Adams has been three times elected governor of Colorado, and our State has been proud of him for 40 years. He is the ideal, typical, patriotic western American, and his remarks on that occasion are, in my judgment, the most appropriate of any of the hundreds of splendid speeches that were delivered in honor of the Belgian Commission.

This eloquent address beautifully expresses the sentiment of all civilized humanity. It will become not only an oratorical but a historical gem, of which both nations will be proud for all time; and I am delighted on behalf of the State of Colorado to insert it in the RECORD, where it may be appropriately preserved as a tribute coming from the Centennial State:

VISIT OF THE BELGIAN COMMISSION, JULY 19, 1917.

At the reception given by the city of Pueblo, Colo., to Baron Moncheur, Lieut. Gen. Leclercq, and the Belgian commission, the following address of welcome was delivered by Alva Adams:

"As partners in the cause of humanity and liberty, Pueblo extends its love and greeting to our distinguished friends and allies.

"Not since the last visit of Lafayette has America been stirred as during the visits of official commissions from England, France, Russia, and Belgium. They are allies in the greatest adventure that has ever faced the race. Sincere as our greeting to Britain and France, there is a deeper note in our welcome to Belgium. We love most those who have suffered most. Fate has made Belgium the Gethsemane of liberty, a martyr to freedom. In the pathway of the Vandals, she has been the victim of ruthless, brutal conquest. Upon her head a crown of thorns—upon her liberties the oppressor's heel.

"The German eagle became a vulture when it crossed the Rhine. Its talons were sunk deep in the vitals of Belgium. Yet from among the ruins and desolation of her land Belgium arose and faced the best equipped, the mightiest army of the age. It was her valor, sacrifice, and devotion that helped stay the satanic invasion. History will record that it was the ranks of Belgian heroism that saved Europe, if not the world, from the sway of the modern Attila. What a colossal debt civilization—liberty—owes to the devoted land. They held the road to Paris. To open the gate there was no bribe they could not have commanded. Since Christ and Satan stood upon the mountain there has been no temptation so great. Belgium never wavered; King Albert held true. Gold could not buy, power could not coerce, threats could not frighten, suffering could not dismay. In her own bosom she received the poisoned spears that liberty might live. As the 300 at Thermopylæ, as the 300 under Gideon, as the 300 at Lookout Mountain won undying fame, so will little Belgium become immortal and shine forever upon liberty's crimson page of valor and sacrifice. It is not the first time that Belgium has been the stage upon which ambition has met its Waterloo.

"It has often been the battle ground of kings. It has always been heroic Belgium. Sometimes bloody Belgium, oppressed Belgium, but when this conflict ends it is to be redeemed Belgium—free Belgium. As we speak, the new chancellor at Berlin is giving voice to his policy. Will he extend an olive branch or will he reaffirm the doctrine of frightfulness. Whatever his message, the conscience of the world can accept no vindication of Belgium save in the defeat of Germany. When I use the term 'Germany'—I mean the Hohenzollern dynasty—Prussian militarism. It is against them America fights, not the German people. The political mystery of the age is the loyalty of the German race to their kingly house, when freedom can only come to them from the wreck and ruin of their autocratic, despotic, reigning dynasty. Man can forget much, forgive much, but there are degrees of depravity and cruelty that even the gods of the nations can neither forget nor forgive. For the willful making of orphans—for their abuse—for the murder of the weak and innocent, for the ravishment of women, there can be no sanctuary. Before the bayonet, helpless men and women have been driven into bondage and forced to grind corn for their oppressors. Deportation of the noncombatant and the innocent, enforced labor, is slavery in any country and abhorrent to liberty everywhere. In the treatment of Belgium a new chapter of infamy has been written in the black book of national dishonor.

"In Armenia, Germany can lay to the Turk the massacres and atrocities that make angels weep and civilization faint. In Belgium the Kaiser has been the sole Caliban; he had no partner. The torch, the sword, and dynamite of German hate have been alone responsible. Upon these awful deeds of blood lust and Vandalism one brand alone can be placed. As Billy Sunday expressed it, 'Turn hell upside down and upon its bottom will be found the stamp, "Made in Germany."' It is the shame of the twentieth century that one of its great empires, this boasted ally of the Deity, has made brutality its policy and frightfulness its favorite weapon. They give well poisoning a standing as an agency of war.

"It was the grief and sorrow of Belgium that smote the rock of American generosity and compassion in the Red Cross campaign. It was the ruthless methods of Prussian aggression that drew our country into the ranks of the allies. This Republic, with its ideals, can have no fellowship with the power that destroys hospitals and hospital ships and makes the Red Cross symbol the target for their guns. Against these atrocities we raise the standard of revolt. As champions of Christianity, humanity, and democracy we must pledge our fortunes, our lives, and our sacred honor to overthrow the ambition-mad King whose deeds rob Herod of the infamy of nineteen centuries and tears from Genghis Khan the title of 'The Scourge of God.'

"In the three years' conflict upon land and sea is found the proof of every charge—the justification of every reason given by President Wilson for his declaration of war. We are now elbow to elbow to all the force of justice and freedom. In full measure we give men, gold, and food. These inspired by noble ideals are the trinity of victory. Go back to your unhappy land—carry to your waiting brothers the assurance that under our flag you found only friends and allies. America was slow to wrath, but now that our hand has been put to the plow we will not turn back until the furrow is turned and the victory won. Let it come soon or late, the first question of every ally at the peace conference will be, What of Belgium? Carry back to your heroic King and your splendid people that message written by President Wilson, 'It is our solemn determination that on the inevitable day of victory Belgium shall be restored to the place she has so richly won among the self-respecting and respected nations of earth.' That is the pledge of our Chief—that faith will be kept. Wherever you have gone you have seen the gathering of the clans of liberty. The air vibrates, the earth trembles with the voice and tread of a million young Americans as they march into camp. At Camp Gunter, an hour ago, you saw the first steps in the making of an army. You saw the young men coming from farm, shop, and mine.

"You saw the ununiformed battalion in their first maneuvers and other battalions that were trained and equipped. The transition from the duties of peace to the ways of war is rapid. Yesterday it was the citizen, to-day the soldier, to-morrow it is the hero upon the battle field, where the bugle call of liberty leads men to fight and to die. In the young American there is the making of a splendid soldier—the traits that make the captain.

"Fit to stand by Cæsar
And give direction."

"From every section there sweeps toward Atlantic ports the units of a mighty army. It is the rising tide of a great people who would have all men free as they themselves are free. It is the challenge of the Republic for a free world, for a world democratic.

"Emerson wrote, 'God is tired of kings.' The people are also weary of carrying dynasties upon their backs. Under the Divine impulse the nations of the free are arising in their might. No Alexander, no Cæsar, no Napoleon shall again aspire to world dominion. It is the Armageddon between autocracy and liberty. Under the Kaiser only vassals fight. Against him the allies of justice, liberty, and humanity. There can be no compromise. Either God or Lucifer are to reign. Justice, not the sword, must be made the master of human destiny. In this contest America gives her treasure, she gives her sons that Belgium may be vindicated and that liberty may not perish from the earth.

The Militia.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. WILLIAM GORDON,
OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 4, 1917.

Mr. GORDON. Mr. Speaker, at pages 6836 to 6840 of the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD, September 10, 1917, the address of Charles E. Hughes delivered at the annual meeting of the American Bar Association is printed. In that address Mr. Hughes said: "The militia, within the meaning of these provisions of the Constitution, is distinct from the Army of the United States." "Remember always," said Daniel Webster, "that the great principle of the Constitution on that subject is that the militia is the militia of the States and not of the General Government; and thus being the militia of the States there is no part of the Constitution worded with greater care and with more scrupulous jealousy than that which grants and limits the power of Congress over it." Mr. Hughes then continues:

"In order to execute the laws of the Union to suppress insurrection and to repel invasion it would be necessary to employ regular troops or to employ the militia; and the power given to Congress with respect to the militia was manifestly to make a large standing Army unnecessary. But as the service of the Organized Militia can only be required by the National Government for the limited purposes specified in the Constitution it follows (as Attorney General Wickersham advised President Taft) that the Organized Militia as such can not be employed for offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States."

By his own admission and by citing Daniel Webster and the opinions of Attorney General Wickersham, Mr. Hughes effectually disproves and discredits the very point he attempts to establish, to wit:

"That by drafting the militia, or any part of it, these men can be divested of the protection which the Constitution of the United States throws around them by limiting the use which the Federal Government may make of the militia to suppressing insurrection, repelling invasion, and executing the laws of the United States."

The term "militia" as used in the Constitution of the United States includes all able-bodied male citizens capable of bearing arms, and these have been further defined by the statutes of the United States, enacted since the adoption of the Constitution, as all "male citizens capable of bearing arms between the ages of 18 and 45 years."

After the War of 1812 with England had been in progress for two and a half years an attempt was made in Congress to pass a bill authorizing the President to draft by lot from those between 18 and 45 years 100,000 men, with whom it was proposed to invade Canada, the enemy's territory. This bill was defeated in the House by Daniel Webster upon the precise point that Congress had no such power over the militia as to authorize it to empower the President to draft them into the Regular Army and send them out of the country.

While Roosevelt was President and thought he wanted more troops for the Philippines than the Regular Army afforded, he induced Congress to pass a law which provided that when the Organized Militia or National Guard had been called into the Federal service for either of the three purposes specified in the Constitution, the President might then send them out of the country; but when this statute was submitted to Attorney General Wickersham, in the opinion which Mr. Hughes cites, it was declared by the Attorney General to be beyond the power of Congress to enlarge its power or that of the President over the militia by legislation, and this attempt to do so was adjudged to be null and void.

Mr. Hughes, in approving this opinion of Attorney General Wickersham, concedes that no member of the National Guard now in the Federal service can be sent to France or any other foreign country unless he volunteers for that service; and if he will read the argument of Daniel Webster, delivered in the House of Representatives on December 9, 1814, he will be convinced that the same rule applies to all drafted men; and if he will read all of paragraph 12, section 8 of Article I of the Constitution of the United States, the first five words of which he quotes, he will observe that the balance of the paragraph reads as follows: "But no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years."

This limitation upon the power to raise and support armies clearly establishes the intent and purpose of the framers of the Constitution to limit the power to raise and maintain a standing army to voluntary enlistment, because if the unlimited power to draft or conscript was intended to be conferred it would have been a useless and puerile thing to limit the use of money for that purpose. Conscripted armies may be paid, but they are not required to be, and if it had been intended to confer the extraordinary power to draft the bodies of citizens and send them out of the country in direct conflict with the limitation upon the use of the militia imposed by subsequent paragraphs of the same section and article, certainly some restriction or limitation would have been imposed to restrain the unlimited use of such power.

The only time in our history that Congress has authorized the President to draft citizens into the military service prior to the present emergency was during the Civil War, and that draft act specifically recited in its title that it was resorted to for the purpose of "suppressing insurrection and rebellion," which is one of the express purposes for which the Federal Government is authorized to use the militia.

Although the above-quoted words are omitted from the present draft law, the language of the act was quite generally followed in other particulars, one of the exceptions being that the bill as presented by the War Department proposed to emulate the example of Napoleon Bonaparte and conscript the bodies of those between 19 and 25 years of age, exempting all others of military age.

In further support of the proposition that under the Constitution of the United States no troops outside of the Regular Army may lawfully be sent out of the country unless and until they volunteer for foreign service, and that the Regular Army may only be recruited by voluntary enlistment, I append hereto a petition to the Congress of the United States by Hannis Taylor, late ambassador of the United States to Spain.

A PETITION TO THE SENATE AND HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES OF THE UNITED STATES OF AMERICA IN CONGRESS ASSEMBLED.

[Presented by Hannis Taylor in behalf of himself and as next friend of the half million and more of American youths now under military duress, because conscripted under sec. 8, Art. I of the Constitution, which provides that "the Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," which provision, as construed by the Supreme Court, forbids the sending of the militia, so called, forth beyond the territorial limits of the United States.]

AN APPEAL TO THE CONGRESS TO PREVENT THE SENDING OF THE CONSCRIPTED NATIONAL MILITIA TO EUROPEAN BATTLE FIELDS IN OPEN DEFIANCE OF THE CONSTITUTION OF THE UNITED STATES.

Your petitioner, Hannis Taylor, a citizen of the United States and a resident of the District of Columbia, in behalf of himself, and as the next friend of the half million or more American youths now under military duress, because conscripted under section 8, Article I of the Constitution, represents that he hereby asserts the constitutional right of petition solemnly guaranteed to him by the first article of amendment to the National Constitution, which right, as an attribute of national citizenship, entitles him to petition Congress for redress in regard to any matter of "great moment and general concern." Your petitioner avers that no matter of greater moment or more general concern was ever presented to the Congress of the United States than that involved in the threatened transportation to European battle fields of hundreds of thousands of conscripted American youths. First, because no such thing was ever before attempted in our entire history as a Nation. In asserting that fact in his Flag Day address of June 14, President Wilson said: "We are about to bid thousands, hundreds of thousands, it may be millions, of our men, the young, the strong, the capable men of the Nation, to go forth and die beneath it [the flag] on fields of blood far away. * * * American armies were never before sent across the seas." Second, because the Congress, in enacting the legislation under which said conscription has taken place, has not only not authorized, directly or indirectly, the transportation of such conscripted youths "across the seas," but it has manifested no consciousness whatever that any such unprecedented and fateful act would be attempted by any one. Third, because the transportion of the militia, National or State, beyond our territorial limits is an act sternly forbidden by the Constitution of the United States.

EXEMPTION AS DEFINED BY THE FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

Your petitioner further represents that the Federal Convention of 1787, after long and stormy debate, so clearly and positively fixed the exemption of the militia, National and State, from military service beyond our territorial limits that it was never questioned during the century and a quarter that preceded the year 1912. In all our wars preceding that date the exemption was always frankly recognized not only by jurists but by all writers on our military system. In his recent work entitled Our Military History (1916), Gen. Leonard Wood says that we have been compelled to fight our wars with volunteers "because the militia was not available for service outside of the United States." He then adds that we had so to conduct the Mexican War, "where the militia could not be used because of the constitutional limitation upon its employment outside the United States." See to the same effect "Military Policy of the United States," by Upton (1904), and "The Military Unpreparedness of the United States" (1915), by Huidekoper. Strange indeed it is that at this late day any man calling himself a jurist should dare, even in a moment of hysterical excitement, to deny the existence of an exemption recognized from the beginning of our national life not only by all lawyers and statesmen but by the military experts.

EXEMPTION AFFIRMED BY ATTORNEY GENERAL WICKERSHAM IN 1912.

Your petitioner further represents that the inconvenience of the constitutional exemption in question arising out of the territorial expansion incident to the Spanish-American War, prompted certain persons more ingenious than loyal to the Constitution to attempt, by the act of January 21, 1903, as amended by the act of March 27, 1908, to circumvent and destroy such exemption by providing that "the militia, so called, shall continue to serve during the term so specified, either within or without the territory of the United States."

By that stupid device such evil-minded persons attempted to make Congress confer upon the President the power to rob the militia of its constitutional exemption from service abroad, in defiance of the elementary principle that the legislative department of the Government can not confer upon the Executive a power it is expressly forbidden to exercise itself. When that stupid device was submitted by President Taft to Attorney General Wickersham, a learned lawyer whose mind was then unclouded by prejudice and passion, he trampled upon it in an elaborate official opinion delivered under his oath of office and dated February 17, 1912, in which he said:

> The Constitution, which enumerates the exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into the service of the United States, affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union. * * * This has always been the English doctrine, and in some instances acts of Parliament have expressly forbidden the use of the militia outside of the Kingdom. Our ancestors, who framed and adopted our Constitution and early laws, got their ideas of a militia, its nature, and purposes from this, and must be taken to have intended substantially the same military body. * * * If authority is needed for the conclusion here reached, the following may suffice: In Ordronaux, Constitutional Legislation, page 501, it is said:
> "The Constitution distinctly enumerates the three exclusive purposes for which the militia may be called into the service of the United States. These purposes are: First, to execute the laws of the Union; second, to suppress insurrection; and, third, to repel invasions.
> "These three occasions, representing necessities of a strictly domestic character, plainly indicate that the services required of the militia can be rendered only upon the soil of the United States or of its Territories. * * * In the history of this provision of the Constitution there is nothing indicating that it was even contemplated that such troops should be employed for purposes of offensive warfare outside the limits of the United States. And it is but just to infer that the enumeration of the specific occasions on which alone the militia can be called into the service of the General Government was intended as a distinct limitation upon their employment." * * *
> And in Von Holtz, Constitutional Law, page 170, it is said, "the militia can not be taken out of the country." * * *
> It is true that the act of January 21, 1903, as amended by the act of March 27, 1908 (35 Stat., 399), provides:
>
> "That whenever the President calls forth the Organized Militia of any State, Territory, or of the District of Columbia to be employed in the service of the United States he may specify in his call the period for which such service is required, and the militia so called shall continue to serve during the term so specified, either within or without the territory of the United States, unless sooner relieved by order of the President."
> But this must be read in view of the constitutional power of Congress to call forth the militia only to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union. Congress can not by its own enactment enlarge the power conferred upon it by the Constitution; and if this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified, it would be unconstitutional. * * *
>
> I think that the constitutional provision here considered not only affords no warrant for the use of the militia by the General Government, except to suppress insurrection, repel invasions, or to execute the laws of the Union, but, by its careful enumeration of the three occasions or purposes for which the militia may be used, it forbids such use for any other purpose; and your question is answered in the negative.
>
> Respectfully,
>
> GEORGE W. WICKERSHAM.
> To the SECRETARY OF WAR.

After citing in that opinion the decisions of the Supreme Court of the United States (Houston v. Moore, 5 Wheat., 1, and Martin v. Mott, 12 Wheat., 19, 27) as irrevocably settling the exemption of the militia from service abroad, the Attorney General exposed, with striking emphasis, the emptiness of the stupid contention that, although the Congress is expressly forbidden to authorize the sending of the militia, National or State, abroad, it may authorize the President to do so. Speaking of the act before him which attempted to authorize the President to use the militia "either within or without the territory of the United States," he said: "If this provision were construed to authorize Congress to use the Organized Militia for any other than the three purposes specified, it would be unconstitutional." Thus, in advance, he put the stamp of nullity upon any clause or phrase in the conscription act of May 18, 1917, which may be so construed as to express such an unconstitutional purpose.

EXEMPTION AFFIRMED BY PRESIDENT WILSON IN 1916.

Your petitioner further represents that after the foregoing opinion of Attorney General Wickersham had become the law of the Department of Justice, and as such binding in this vital matter upon President Wilson, he affirmed it, with great emphasis, in four speeches delivered in January and February, 1916, when he was called upon to explain why he could do no more for the development of the State militia, now euphoniously called the National Guard.

In an address delivered at New York, January 27, 1916, he said: "I believe that it is the duty of Congress to do very much more for the National Guard than it has ever done heretofore.

"I believe that that great arm of our national defense should be built up and encouraged to the utmost; but you know, gentlemen, that under the Constitution of the United States the National Guard is under the direction of more than twoscore States; that it is not permitted to the National Government directly to have a voice in its development and organization; and that only upon occasions of actual invasion has the President of the United States the right to ask those men to leave their respective States."

In an address delivered at Cleveland, Ohio, January 29, 1916, he said: "The President of the United States has not the right to call on these men—the National Guard—except in the case of actual invasion, and, therefore, no matter how skillful they are, no matter how ready they are, they are not the instruments for immediate national use."

In an address delivered at Milwaukee January 31, 1916, he said: "The National Guard, fine as it, is not subject to the orders of the President of the United States. It is subject to the orders of the governors of the several States, and the Constitution itself says that the President has no right to withdraw them from their States even, except in the case of actual invasion of the soil of the United States."

In an address delivered at Topeka, Kans., February 2, 1916, he said: "The Constitution of the United States puts them—the National Guard—under the direct command and control of the governors of the States, not of the President of the United States, and the national authority has no right to call upon them for any service outside their States unless the territory of the Nation is actually invaded."

Here we have conclusive documentary evidence of the fact that long before the conscription act of May 18, 1917, was passed President Wilson had complete knowledge of this entire subject, as expounded by Attorney General Wickersham in his official opinion of February 17, 1912, now binding on the President as the law of the Department of Justice. No one knows quite so well as President Wilson that the sending of our National Militia abroad by the Executive will constitute a flagrantly unconstitutional act, and as such an impeachable high crime and misdemeanor.

NATIONAL MILITIA CREATED BY FEDERAL CONVENTION OF 1787.

Your petitioner further represents that when the convention of 1787 met those who may be called Nationalists, with Washington at their head, contending that the State Militia had proven to be "inefficient under the Confederation," demanded the creation of a new militia system, entirely apart from the State systems, which should be under the exclusive control of the new Federal Government. (See Madison papers, p. 730 and p. clxxxii, Gilpin ed.) That proposal was so bitterly opposed by the State rights faction that a deadlock arose, which was broken at last by a compromise arranged by a grand committee of the States. (Elliot, v. 445.) The State rights faction was told that the ancient systems of State Militia might continue to exist, subject to the following limitations now embodied in section 8, Article I: "The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for organizing, arming, and disciplining the—State—militia and for governing such part of them as may be employed in the service of the United States, reserving to the States, respectively, the appointment of the officers, and the authority of training the militia according to the discipline prescribed by Congress." In return for that concession the State rights faction agreed to the creation of a new National or Federal Militia—entirely distinct from the State systems—subject, however, to the three severe limitations now embodied in section 8, Article I: "The Congress shall have power * * * to provide for calling forth the—national—militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

Every student of English constitutional history knows that the last limitation, "and repel invasions," was simply a transplanting into the new American Constitution of the exemption of the English militia from service abroad, which had been a vital part of the English constitution for a thousand years prior to our severance from the mother country. In order to make it possible to take the English militia over the Channel into France during the present war, it became necessary to change the English Constitution in that respect.

Mr. Dicey, one of the most eminent modern commentators on the English Constitution, said in his edition of 1908: "The militia is the constitutional force existing under the law of the land for the defense of the country. * * * Embodiment indeed converts the militia for the time being into a regular army, though an army which can not be required to serve abroad." (Law of the Constitution, pp. 287–288.) And so, even if it could be claimed that our National Militia, called forth by conscription, constitutes a regular army, it is an army which can not be required to serve abroad.

ONLY TWO CONSCRIPTION LAWS EVER ENACTED BY CONGRESS.

Your petitioner further represents that it is a notable fact that the National Militia as such, as a national force entirely distinct from the militia of the States, has only been called forth on two occasions and on each by conscription. The first conscription act was approved March 3, 1863; the second, on May 18, 1917. As the first was enacted during the Civil War, it declares with great emphasis in the preamble that it was enacted under section 8, Article I, of the Constitution, which provides that "the Congress shall have power to provide for calling forth the militia to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." The words of the preamble are these: "Whereas there now exist in the United States an insurrection and rebellion against the authority thereof, and it is, under the Constitution of the United States, the duty of the Government to suppress insurrection and rebellion, * * * and whereas, for these high purposes a military force is indispensable," etc. After the lapse of half a century the National Militia, as such, was called out a second time by the act of May 18, 1917, which is simply a reproduction, in every material particular, of the original act of March 3, 1863. In order to put that vital fact beyond all question your petitioner has had the two acts printed in parallel columns in a pamphlet inclosed with this petition.

Here the fact must be kept steadily in view that the conscription act of May 18, 1917, under which the National Militia is now being drafted, is not an original measure; as appears upon its face it is simply an extension or supplement to carry into effect the national defense act of June 3, 1916. By section 57 of that act the National Militia is thus defined:

Composition of the militia.—The militia of the United States shall consist of all able-bodied male citizens of the United States and all other able-bodied males who have or shall have declared their intention to become citizens of the United States, who shall be more than 18 years of age and, except as hereinafter provided, not more than 45 years of age, and said militia shall be divided into three classes, the National Guard, the Naval Militia, and the Unorganized Militia.

The primary and avowed purpose of the conscription act of May 18, 1917, is to organize "the Unorganized Militia" of the United States by extending its provisions to "all male citizens or male persons not alien enemies * * * between the ages of 21 and 30 years." Thus the fact is fixed with mathematical certainty that the act of May 18, 1917, was passed in order to call out the National Militia, as such, "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions," first, because it is really little more than a copy of the first conscription act of March 3, 1863; second, because its avowed purpose is to organize the "Unorganized Militia" of the United States by extending its provisions to "all male citizens or male persons not alien enemies * * * between the ages of 21 and 30 years. Of all the shallow pretences devised with the view of confusing this very simple subject the most pitiful is that which attempts to deny that the conscription act of May 18, 1917, was passed under that part of section 8, Article I, which authorizes Congress to call out the National Militia to "execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions."

DESPERATE EFFORT TO GIVE RESPECTABILITY TO A RIDICULOUS CONTENTION.

Your petitioner further represents that the history of our Constitution, taken as a whole, is made up of a series of efforts to evade it whenever its provisions become inconvenient to a particular class at a particular moment.

But never has the struggle to find a loophole been so desperate as that involved in the present attempt to invent a pretext for denying the immunity of the militia, National and State, from service abroad; first, because such immunity was a thousand years old before our severance from the mother country took place; second, because the language in which it was embedded in our Federal Constitution is too plain for cavil or question; third, because the immunity was expressly affirmed by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1827; fourth, because, after an exhaustive review of the whole subject, it was reaffirmed by Attorney General Wickersham in 1912 in an opinion accepted by President Taft as final; fifth, because it was again solemnly reaffirmed by President Wilson in four speeches delivered in 1916. And yet, as some kind of a pretext is indispensable to those who are now proposing to send the National Militia, conscripted under the act of May 18, 1917, to European battle fields, in open defiance of the Constitution, a ridiculous claim is being made in certain quarters that such act was really passed under that part of section 8, Article I, which authorizes Congress "to raise and support [volunteer] armies, but no appropriation of money to that use shall be for a longer term than two years" [the English mutiny act by which the volunteer army of Great Britain can be dissolved by Parliament].

That provision made, as the records of the Federal Convention show, for the exclusive purpose of authorizing the raising of our Regular or standing Army, through the volunteer system, has no more connection with the subject matter before us than an extract from the Talmud or Pentateuch. That fact is made certain, not only by the records of the convention but by a century and a quarter of congressional legislation affirming that construction. In speaking of the provision in question, Upton (Military Policy of the United States, p. 79) says: "Here was laid the foundation of the volunteer system, which attained its fullest development during our long Civil War. The 'levies,' known later as 'volunteers,' were authorized under the plenary power of Congress to 'raise and support armies,' and the power of appointing these officers was given the President, to whom it obviously belonged, as the 'levies' were wholly distinct from the militia or State troops." But far more important is the fact that the ranks of the Regular Army, which can only be composed of volunteers, can not be filled up by conscription. When a proposal to swell the ranks of the Regular or Volunteer Army in that way was embodied in the conscription act offered in Congress in 1814 Daniel Webster so trampled it under foot in a masterful speech that it was never afterwards revived in any form. No one should for a moment lose sight of the fact that the constitutionality of a Federal conscription act can not be defended for a moment unless such act is based upon that clause of the Constitution which authorizes Congress to call forth the National Militia "to execute the laws of the Union, suppress insurrections, and repel invasions." There is but one precedent to support conscription in our entire history, and that is the conscription act of March 3, 1863, which declares in express terms in its preamble that Congress enacted it to suppress "an insurrection and rebellion." Your petitioner, who earnestly maintains the constitutionality of the conscription act of May 18, 1917, sternly protests against a theory which, if sound, destroys its constitutionality.

In order to influence the Federal judiciary and to give some sort of respectability or plausibility to a ridiculous contention—refuted by the records of the Federal Convention, by a century and a quarter of congressional legislation, trampled under foot by Daniel Webster in 1814, and repudiated by a great military authority like Upton in 1904—ex-Justice Hughes was induced to appear before the American Bar Association, where he professed to believe that the conscription act of May 18, 1917, was enacted under that clause of the Constitution which relates exclusively to the raising of Regular Armies by the volunteer system. The sole and practical purpose of his discourse was to prove by that device that the conscripted National Militia can be sent to the battle fields of Europe in open defiance of their long-settled constitutional exemption from service abroad.

Was there ever such a dreadful spectacle? There stood an ex-justice of the Supreme Court as the prosecutor of half a million of American youths, under military duress and on trial for their lives, with no one to defend them. The idea was that in that star-chamber proceeding the mere ipse dixit of a great legal functionary would deprive our sons of the protection guaranteed by a thousand years of English and American constitutional law. The undertaking was too great for any one man. It would have been too great for Lord Bacon or Chief Justice Marshall. The solemn guaranties of the American Constitution can not be destroyed in that way.

Nor florid prose nor honeyed lines of rime
Can blazon evil deeds or consecrate a crime.

A CENSORED PRESS DISLOYAL TO THE PEOPLE.

Your petitioner further represents that the cruel and remorseless conspiracy against the lives of half a million of defenseless American youths, which opened with ex-Justice Hughes's prosecuting speech, is being carried on by a censored and disloyal press, that spread it broadcast throughout the land under a compact that no one was to be permitted to reply to it. Your petitioner says "compact," because when he applied to nearly a hundred and fifty American newspapers for leave to expose its atrocious fallacies and misrepresentations, without a single exception the door was brutally closed in his face. A very distinguished editor who refused him the right to be heard in the Capital of the Nation said with perfect frankness, "No matter if he is correct, a resolve has been reached to send the National Militia abroad in any event, even in defiance of the Constitution!" That is the clean-cut and fateful issue that now confronts the American Congress and the American people in this land, once known as the land of liberty and fair play. Upon its solution the life of this Republic depends.

THE MOST INDEFENSIBLE AND DEADLY ASSAULT EVER MADE ON THE CONSTITUTION.

After 40 years of patient study of our constitutional history, petitioner solemnly avers that, in his humble judgment, the attempt to destory the express and explicit exemption of the militia, National and State, from service abroad is the most indefensible and deadly assault ever made on the Constitution; indefensible because it has been solemnly affirmed not only by the Supreme Court of the United States but by the Executive power, in an opinion now the law of the Department of Justice; deadly because if the militia, a body of troops strictly for home defense, can be transported to European battle fields in this war, it can be so transported in all the European wars that are yet to come. In that way the Monroe doctrine, based on the solemn declaration of the fathers that we must not "entangle ourselves in the broils of Europe," will be completely overthrown without one word of authorization, either from the American electorate or from the Congress of the United States. If such a revolution can be wrought solely by the fiat of the Executive, without a word of authorization, either from the American people or the American Congress, then surely our constitutional democracy, based on the threefold division of power, is as an end.

PETITIONER EARNESTLY IN FAVOR OF VIGOROUS PROSECUTION OF THE WAR BY ALL CONSTITUTIONAL MEANS.

As your petitioner earnestly advocated the embargo of all German ships in our ports before war was declared, and as he is now and has ever been aggressively in favor of the prosecution of the war by all constitutional and sane means, he implores the Congress to suppress, so far as it can, the present riot of illegality by which the initial resolve of the American people to prosecute the war with all their might is being rapidly undermined. The American people are deeply imbued with what the great historian Grote calls "constitutional morality," meaning thereby a deep-seated love of liberty under law which refuses to submit, under any circumstances, to flagrant breaches of the Constitution, such as the unlawful transportation of a half million of the National Militia to European battle fields would involve.

Such a project of illegality is too stupendous to be undertaken by practical men in a land of liberty under law. The shock of it will not only impel the people to draw their purse strings—a matter far more important to the allies than the presence of unwilling and undisciplined troops—but it will certainly excite grave popular commotion in our midst the moment these young men, unlawfully transported, begin to die far from home.

AN APPEAL TO CONGRESS FOR AFFIRMATIVE ACTION.

In consideration of the premises and of the fateful consequences sure to result from them your petitioner, with the profoundest humility and respect, represents to the Congress that it can no longer close its eyes to the gravest responsibility, perhaps, that ever devolved upon it. The Congress can not fold its hands and permit half a million of American youths to be silently transported over the sea under an unconstitutional and void Executive order, upon the theory that the Congress knows nothing about it, because it has said absolutely nothing on the subject. The Congress can not thus abdicate its high functions as the representative of the American people and the guardian of the Republic in this matter of supreme national concern. The Congress should not permit our conscripted National Militia to be forced to seek the protection of the courts.

Therefore your petitioner humbly prays: First, that the two Houses of Congress appoint a joint committee, to be composed of the ablest jurists in Congress, who shall be directed to consider and report whether or no—admitting the constitutionality of the conscription act of May 18, 1917—there is any doubt or question whatever of the exemption of the National Militia conscripted under it from service abroad, as declared by the Supreme Court of the United States in 1827, by Attorney General Wickersham in 1912, and by President Wilson in 1916. Your petitioner prays that he be permitted to appear before such joint committee in order to demonstrate that the opinion recently pronounced by ex-Justice Hughes against such exemption is foundationless in every particular. Second, that if the Congress shall ascertain that such exemption is a valid and subsisting constitutional right it will employ every part of the constitutional machinery at its command, including the power of impeachment, against any and every magistrate who shall dare to violate it. Third, that if the Congress shall ascertain that such constitutional exemption does not exist, that it will pass a joint resolution expressly authorizing the Executive to transport such militia to European battle fields, so that the electorate at the next election may be able to express their approval or disapproval thereof. Fourth, that said joint committee be directed to ascertain and report whether or no there is now or has been a conspiracy existing between the leading newspapers of the United States, including some owned by foreigners in this country, to the end that false and foundationless statements should be circulated as to the nonexistence of the ancient and undoubted constitutional exemption in question, under a compact or agreement that no one should be permitted to controvert or explain to the people the falsity of such statements.

For this your petitioner does ever pray.

Very respectfully, your obedient servant,

HANNIS TAYLOR.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I respectfully submit for the information of Members of the House and others interested in the welfare of our soldiers and sailors now in camp awaiting further orders for service the following correspondence relating to the appeals of certain enlisted men for a reduction of car fare in certain cases:

AUGUST 25, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War, Washington, D. C.

DEAR MR. SECRETARY: It has been suggested to me that some of the boys in the various camps could save money in car fare, and would to that extent be made happier, if instead of paying individual railroad fares a combination rate could be effected where they move on their own account in large numbers, as from a cantonment or navy yard to neighboring cities or places of amusement.

I do not desire to argue this proposition, but submit it to you hoping it may have your best consideration.

Very truly, yours,

J. HAMPTON MOORE.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, September 17, 1917.

Hon. J. H. MOORE,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. MOORE: Reference being made to your letter of the 25th ultimo, which was acknowledged in letter from this office, dated the 28th ultimo (copy inclosed), you are informed that, subsequent to the 28th ultimo, replies have been received from the principal passenger associations of the United States, as follows:

New England Passenger Association:

"It is understood the reference is to fares paid by the individual man and the tariffs of the carriers in this territory will permit the use of a party fare for 10 or more passengers, irrespective of their status as citizens or soldiers."

Trunk Line Association:

"Party fares on the basis of 2¼ cents per mile, applicable for 10 or more persons traveling together on one ticket, are generally in effect between points in trunk-line territory and therefore these fares under the conditions stated will be available for soldiers traveling on their own account."

Central Passenger Association:

"The so-called party fares quoted by roads of the Central Passenger Association and carriers operating in its territory are regularly established through filings with the Interstate Commerce Commission and provide for a per capita rate of 2¼ cents per mile for 10 or more people traveling together on a single ticket; hence as contemplated by the suggestion advanced by Member of the Congress, the Hon. Mr. MOORE, to the Secretary of War, these special fares would be available to parties of enlisted men or officers traveling on own account, not, however, subject to the discount allowed the United States Government on Army transportation requests."

Transcontinental Passenger Association, Southern Passenger Association, and Western Passenger Association:

"In reply to your favor of August 28, File 531.1–T–General, I beg to say that commutation fares are in effect between principal cities in the West and adjacent suburbs and towns, but there are no party fares in effect generally between cantonments and neighboring cities and places of amusement. It is my understanding, however, that the carriers have individually provided for stub trains and other service between cantonment and concentration camps and neighboring cities and towns and have established reasonable fares in connection therewith.

"However, I am canvassing the situation and shall be pleased to give you a definite report thereon later."

The foregoing indicates that it will be practicable for parties of 10 or more to travel between camps and near-by towns, with the exception of the territory west of the Mississippi River, in which territory there appear to be no party rates in effect at the present time.

Very respectfully,

(Signed) NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. MOSES P. KINKAID,

OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 4, 1917.

On the bill (S. 2156) to authorize exploration for and disposition of potassium.

Mr. KINKAID. Mr. Speaker, the operation of the war results in our finding out a great deal about ourselves. We discover that in some respects we have been asleep to our country's resources and industrial conditions. While we are long on some things, we now realize we are short on others.

Dependency always has a weakening effect, whether it be with individuals or nations; self-reliance is strengthening for either. Heretofore we have depended principally on Germany for the potash we consume, a mineral essential to our agricultural industry in particular, and now of great importance in our preparation for war. Germany turns out an abundance of potash, but under present conditions we can no longer buy the product of the enemy country. Thus the economic and commercial exigency produced by the war situation results in a great advantage to Germany over the United States. Our potash resources, whatever they may be, are undeveloped, and there is no other country now from which we can buy.

The purpose of the bill under consideration is to promote the development of our potash resources to the end that we supply at least our home demand and emancipate ourselves from dependency on Germany. It confers authority on the Secretary of the Interior to grant permits to citizens, associations, and corporations to prospect for potash on public lands, except the lands in and near Searles Lake, San Bernardino County, Cal. The area of land allowed to be prospected by a permittee shall not exceed 2,560 acres, which means five sections of land. On proving the existence of the mineral in paying quantities the permittee is granted a patent to not more than one-fourth of the area discovered. The other three-fourths may then be leased by the Government. On the other hand, the potash contained in Searles Lake, covering about 39,000 acres, and in lands adjacent thereto may be mined by the Government itself or leased for a royalty of not less than 2 per cent of the gross product and a rental, in addition, of 25 cents an acre for the first year, 50 cents an acre the third, fourth, and fifth years, and not less than $1 an acre a year thereafter, provided these cash payments shall go to reduce the royalty.

Leases may be granted, also, for the operating of deposits on small areas of public lands in Sweetwater County, Wyo., which lands contain coal also, but the coal is reserved for the United States. Each lease granted shall contain the provisions deemed necessary for the protection of the United States and the prevention of monopoly, and for the safeguarding of the public welfare. The moneys received from royalties shall be added to the reclamation fund, but, after the use thereof in constructive reclamation work and on return to the fund of any such moneys, 50 per cent thereof shall be paid by the Secretary of the Treasury to the State within which the boundaries of the leased lands are located, to be expended on public roads or schools. The last section of the act directs the Secretary of the Interior to incorporate in every lease a provision reserving to the President the right to regulate the price of all minerals extracted and sold from the leased premises, such prices to yield fair and reasonable returns to the lessees, but to secure to the consumer the lowest fair or just price.

I am heartily in favor of the bill and think it should be enacted without unnecessary delay. I am sure that a quotation from the Bulletin of Geological Survey published September 10 of this year will prove both interesting and instructive to the Congress and to the public generally. I quote paragraphs from pages 78 and 79:

Potash occurs principally in the rocks and soils of the earth, where it is very widely distributed. From 10 to 15 per cent of certain minerals, some of them, such as feldspar, very common, consists of insoluble potash. Potash in soluble form constitutes a small percentage of the salts in certain waters and brines. It occurs as chloride or possibly sulphate in ordinary sea water, in smaller proportions in the waters of most streams and lakes, and in larger proportions in many natural brines. It is also a constituent of most natural salt or saline deposits, usually a small percentage, but not uncommonly it forms 1 per cent of the whole.

The greater part of the potash consumed in this country is used as fertilizer. Of the various elements essential to plant growth potassium is one of the few that are likely to become exhausted or deficient in cultivated soils. Used under proper conditions, it stimulates plant growth, and for certain crops a special application of it is now regarded as almost essential, a fact illustrated by the present agricultural demand for it even at abnormally high prices.

But for the purpose of brevity let me say that the bulletin further states that the need of potash in certain manufacturing industries is pressing. It is used in the making of liquid soap, so great an improvement in a sanitary way on cake soap; also for laundry soaps and the higher grades of toilet soaps. It is used in the manufacture of certain explosives and also extensively in the making of matches since the passage of the nonpoisonous-match act; also in the manufacture of glass, in tanning, dyeing, electroplating, photography, and metallurgy, and in miscellaneous medicines and chemicals prepared in various forms.

In connection with this effort to develop our potash resources we need only remember the remarkable impetus given the exploration for tin ore, the opening up of mines, and the manufacture of articles of merchandise by the application of the policy of protection as a vindication of the wisdom of this plan to encourage and to safeguard the production of potash. Until we realized the economic folly of such a course we had been satisfied to import our tin, just as we have been satisfied to bring our potash from Germany. As a result of the beneficent policy consistently carried out, our production of tin now not only meets our wants but affords a surplus to augment our balance of trade with other nations.

The present prospects for the development of potash far exceed the promise of the development of tin adequate to supply the United States when the initial steps toward the development of tin were taken. So far the discoveries of potash in this country have been large in proportion to the efforts put forth to this end, and this is very encouraging to the promise of future discoveries. Until recently the resources of Nebraska have been regarded as exclusively agricultural and all hope of finding mineral, even coal, had been given up. But now Nebraska comes to the front in the production of potash, and in 1916 the State contributed one-third of the entire output of the United States. The potash is found in the brine contained in small lakes scattered through the sand hills in the northwestern part of the State.

Five potash plants have been established in Nebraska, all located on the Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railway, between Alliance on the west and Hyannis on the east. The report of the Bureau of Geological Survey are not optimistic as to the amounts which these Nebraska lakes will produce, and naturally the committee reporting the bill has adopted the same view, but the extent of the sands, either in width or depth, has not been accurately ascertained. However, the confidence evinced in the expenditure of money now being made upon the manufacturing and refining plants constitutes a strong earnest of the belief that the deposits are considerable enough to bring good returns. I have been reliably informed that the cost of each of these plants is $125,000. This means an initial expenditure of more than $600,000 in the five plants, yet the outlay is small compared with the production of the plants for one year.

I here quote from the same bulletin published by the Geological Survey, page 85:

> The first large production of domestic potash has come from the alkali lakes of western Nebraska. Potash-rich salts and brines are contained in a number of alkali lakes and ponds which are scattered over the sand-hill region of western-central Nebraska, especially in Cherry, Sheridan, Box Butte, Morrill, and Garden Counties. The Chicago, Burlington & Quincy Railroad passes through Alliance, Nebr., which is just west of the sand hills.
>
> These ponds range from less than an acre to 2 square miles in size, although the quantity of water in them varies greatly with the seasons. The deeper ponds are comparatively fresh, but many of the shallow ones are strongly brackish or briny. The ponds lie in small inclosed basins, whose lack of external drainage outlet is supposed to be due to the irregular topography formed by shifting sands. Between some of them and adjacent basins and valleys there are low divides, so that a slight rise of their waters would cause them to overflow, though probably in many of them overflow has seldom occurred, as is shown by the accumulation of salts. The soluble salts are mainly collected in the lowest parts of the basins.
>
> The alkali that is concentrated in these ponds was doubtless leached from the adjacent soil. A complete analysis of the saline residue of these deposits shows that they resemble the leachings of wood ashes, which may have been in large part the source of much of this alkali, for the adjoining sand hills were once covered with a generous growth of grass and brush, and the region has been repeatedly burned over. It is not necessary, however, to assume burning in order to account for the release of the potash from the organic matter here, as the potash may have been released by ordinary decomposition. The concentrated leachings from these sources may have formed these deposits, but other views as to their origin are also held, and, indeed, it seems strange that so much potash derived from vegetation should accumulate in water-soluble form only in this part of the country, for similar conditions at many other places have not produced the same result.
> At the close of 1916 five projects for producing potash from the brines of the western Nebraska lakes were reported to be well under way, all of them along the Burlington Railroad east of Alliance. They are the Potash Products Co., plant at Hoffland; the Hord Alkali Products Co., plant at Lakeside; the Palmer Alkali Co., plant at Lakeside; the American Potash Co., plant at Antioch; the Nebraska Potash Works Co., plant at Antioch. Hoffland is 11 miles, Antioch 15 miles, and Lakeside 24 miles east of Alliance.

The potash in the so-called alkali from these lakes in western Nebraska was first exploited by the Potash Products Co. of Omaha, Nebr. The credit for the investigation and exploitation of these deposits is undoubtedly due to Messrs. J. H. Show and Carl Modisett, who began to study them as early as 1911 and had made plans to utilize the salts commercially before the beginning of the present abnormal demand for potash. It was not, however, until after the middle of 1915 that the company actually started commercial operation. At the close of 1916 this company was advertising that 10,000 tons of high-grade potash had been shipped from their plant in the preceding 12 months and that the product had an average content of 28 per cent of water-soluble potash and 3 per cent of chlorine.

Jesse Lake, probably one of the largest of these lakes and the one that contained the most alkali, is the source of the brine worked by the Potash Products Co. The lake is about 3 miles north of Hoffland and the brine is pumped directly from the lake to the plant at the railroad. There the water is evaporated and the salts are dried for shipment without refining. The product shipped is therefore essentially of the composition of the original saline content of the lake liquor.

The lake is shallow and covers about 240 acres, varying somewhat in size and depth as well as in concentration of its water with the seasonable evaporation and precipitation. Its bottom is composed of a dark greenish mud, beneath which is the sand charged with brine much like that at the surface. The sand is said to be 20 feet thick in places.

According to the testimony of Government experts and reports of the Geological Survey, the output of potash in the whole United States from all sources in 1916 was but one-tenth of the amount of our annual consumption, yet these Nebraska lakes produced one-third of this output. The consumption annually of this country is reliably estimated at 237,000 tons. To this demand Nebraska supplied something like 8,000 tons in 1916. Even on the very conservative estimate made by Government experts it would require 30 years at this rate of production to exhaust the Nebraska lakes. And it will not be remarkable if it is found that the contents of the lakes are several times as great as these estimates.

The lakes being scattered widely apart over the counties of Cherry, Sheridan, Box Butte, Morrill, and Garden Counties, the number of plants for treating potash will likely be somewhat increased, so that the annual production will be augumented. But counting that only 250,000 tons could be recovered from the Nebraska lakes, an amount small in proportion to the consumption in the United States during the next 50 years, the output will add very materially to the wealth produced by the State, for at the present price it will amount to $120,000,000.

Coronado dreamed of an abundance of gold in what is now Nebraska, and it would not have been surprising to find gold washed down from the mountains of Wyoming in the Platte River, but now, in these lakes, poison to man and beast, we discover mineral wealth surpassing any placer mine ever worked. And I take pride in the fact that the initiative for this great industry, so important now to our national welfare, was taken by the Nebraskans I. H. Show and Carl Modisett, graduates of our splendid State University, who, together with R. Stevens, and perhaps others, organized the Potash Products Co. at Omaha, who developed the first plant at Hoffland, making and devising also the machinery for refining the potash.

I may be regarded as too optimistic concerning the future production of potash in the United States, but I am bold to predict that ere long this country will produce all the potash it can consume, one way or another. It will be found not only in the brine of the Nebraska lakes and in the salt-incrusted basin of the dry Searles Lake of California, but to a limited extent in the great Salt Lake, Utah, and more still in the Salduro salt marsh of that State, traversed by the Western Pacific Railway, between Salt Lake City on the east and Wendover on the west. According to the report of the Secretary of the Interior on this very bill, phosphate rock is present in large and valuable quantities in the public lands of Idaho, Wyoming, Utah, and Montana, and exists in Florida.

Therefore the Secretary has withdrawn from entry of these public lands 2,400 acres, and doubtless will, from time to time, as investigation may warrant it, withdraw more of the public lands for the same reason.

Government experts estimate that Searles Lake alone can be made to produce sufficient potash for the consumption of the United States for 50 or 60 years, and I deem it a conservative guess to make that practically we have enough potash in sight to supply our wants for a century, coupled with the prospect that in the meanwhile a never-ending source of a sufficient supply or a superior substitute will have been provided.

Potash can be manufactured from culp, kelp, and also from wood ashes and even from wool washings and from waste products in distilleries. No doubt American genius, under the incentive of necessity and high prices, will devise and discover other means of producing it. Our own natural resources will be developed and utilized rather than allowed to lie dormant, while we purchase from other countries what we ourselves should produce. It is not a sufficient reason that it may be cheaper for a time to buy of other countries, because the price of labor is lower. The very potash exigency now presented by this war shows the unwisdom of our having depended on Germany for the potash we consume. This great object lesson proves how unwise we have been, economically and commercially, how very derelict in not being duly prepared for the emergency of war.

In a large part of the United States, principally in the South, the use of potash is nearly indispensable to the growing of successful crops. No well-informed person will lose sight of the fact that it has not been solely the gigantic guns, the submarines, the equipment of Germany along military lines that has made the country so formidable in this war, but the highly developed stage of its agriculture, which has been one of the potent factors in sustaining its position, surrounded as it has been by the forces of the allies and cut off from the transportation of foodstuffs.

Except for Germany's own self-sufficiency in production famine must have resulted. It is scientific agriculture, in which the utilization of potash for fertilizing has been a factor, that has much to do with Germany's power of defense and resistance. Our Nation has awakened to the realization of the real meaning of the food values of the soil, and that on the greatest of the arts of peace, the wise tilling of that soil, depends not only our national prosperity in time of peace but our national safety in time of war. Never before have all the inhabitants of the United States faced the possible necessity of intensive farming. Never before has it seemed so necessary to exact from the bounteous earth so much. So great has been the area of our fruitful valleys and our fertile prairies and so abundant the yield of our lands that reach from ocean to ocean that we have been prodigals. And now, when we behold the needs to which we have been blind and seek for potash with which to preserve fertility, the desert places, where the alkali-frosted soil has killed all vegetation, disclose its existence. Thus we find whatever we need in this great country, and we are justified in having an abiding faith in our own limitless resources and in the genius of our people, ever able to respond to any demand upon them.

The Jew in Roumania.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917.

Mr. SIEGEL. Mr. Speaker, the condition of the Jew in Roumania, which is beyond description, is most fully described in the book Jewish Life in Modern Times, by Israel Cohen, and, commencing at page 151, he says:

The plight of the quarter of a million Jews in Roumania is in several respects even worse than that of their brethren in Russia and affords a striking example of the duplicity of a modern State. Settled in the country for more than fifteen hundred years—long before the advent of the Roman convicts who were introduced by Trajan to populate the fertile land of the Dacians—the Jews are treated as outlaws and subjected to a mass of harassing and humiliating restrictions despite the solemn treaty obligation entered into by Roumania in 1878. The Berlin treaty, by article 44, made it a prime condition of the independence of Roumania that difference of religious belief should not preclude anyone from the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public offices and honors, or the exercise of various professions and industries. In other words, the signatory powers demanded the complete civil and political emancipation of the Jews in Roumania. Their action was due to the merciless persecution of the Jews, which had become a European scandal. The Jews were treated as aliens incapable of naturalization; they were denied all freedom of economic activity; and they were driven from the villages into the towns, where they were exposed to riots and massacres, where their homes were plundered and their synagogues polluted and demolished. The powers therefore wished to secure respect for the elements of humanity in return for the sovereign independence which Roumania sought. The treaty of Berlin also required the bestowal of civil and political equality upon the Jews in Bulgaria, Serbia, and Turkey, an act which these countries readily conceded. But the Roumanian Government protested that the immediate emancipation of its Jewish subjects would be a peril to the State and proposed an alternative to article 44. This alternative had such apparent resemblance to the original article that the powers in their innocence accepted it, for it declared explicitly: "Difference in religious beliefs and confessions does not constitute in Roumania an obstacle to the obtainment of civil and political rights, nor to the exercise of these rights," and it was followed by the reassuring stipulation: "A foreigner, without distinction of religion, and whether a subject or not of a foreign Government, can become naturalized under the following conditions." The principal conditions were that the foreigner should address to the Government an application for naturalization and reside for the next 10 years in the country to prove he was of service to it, and that naturalization could only be granted by law—that is, by act of Parliament—and individually. As the principle of civil and religious equality was practically retained in this revised article, the powers, after the dispersal of the Berlin congress, agreed to accept it in lieu of article 44, on condition that it was made part of the constitution. To this Roumania, with a pretense of magnanimity, submitted, and Lord Salisbury expressed the hope that it would bring matters "into exact conformity with the spirit of the treaty of Berlin." Little did the powers dream that their confidence would be shamefully abused and that Roumania would cunningly extricate itself from its solemn contract.

To prove that it did not violate the principle of religious equality and at the same time to keep its Jewish subjects in bondage the Roumanian Government brazenly declared all the Jews in the country to be foreigners, whose status could only be improved by the laws pertaining to the naturalization of foreigners. In vain was it pointed out that the Jews had been settled in the country uninterruptedly for more than 15 centuries and had shed their blood in its defense. The Government insisted upon regarding its native Jewish subjects as aliens, though they were under the protection of no other state, and more than one statesman boasted of the trick that had been played upon the diplomatists of Europe. A pretense was made of emancipating the Jews by naturalizing in a body the 883 Jewish soldiers who had fought in the war against Turkey, but most of them had not survived to enjoy the honor. After this impressive display of generosity the Government in 1880 naturalized another 57 native Jews, but since then a steadily diminishing number has been admitted to the rights of citizenship, the total within the last 35 years hardly exceeding 200. Every year the Government submits the names of a list of Jews to each chamber, but takes care that only a small proportion shall be passed by both chambers, whose joint ratification is necessary for complete naturalization. But the Jews are not even treated as ordinary foreigners, who can invoke the protection of their home government. They are legally described as "persons under Roumanian protection," but this protection has manifested itself in a series of oppressive laws, mostly enacted during the last 30 years, which are designed to force them to emigrate or to reduce them to starvation. Virtually therefore they are outlaws. The only exception consists of a part of the Jews who lived in the Dobrudja before it was ceded by Turkey to Roumania after the Russo-Turkish War in compensation for Roumania's cession of Bessarabia to Russia. The Jews in the Dobrudja who, before April 11, 1878, were Ottoman subjects, were promised the rights of Roumanian citizenship by the rescript ratifying the annexation; but these rights were not granted by law until April 9, 1909, and they were confined only to those Jews who could prove by documentary evidence that they had formerly been Ottoman subjects.

The native Jews in Roumania are not allowed to own land or even to till it as hired laborers. They have been expelled from the rural districts and driven into the town where most of the avenues to an honest living are closed to them. They are excluded from the civil service and from the medical, legal, and teaching professions. They may not form more than a fourth of the workmen or staff in any factory applying for the Government benefits, without which industry in Roumania can not flourish, while Jewish factories are wholly denied such benefits. Their economic plight is aggravated by their forced idleness one-third of the year, for Jewish shops, factories, and workshops, apart from observing the Jewish Sabbaths and festivals on 65 days of the year, must also close on Sundays and about a dozen church festivals. Jewish merchants who have to visit a rural district on business are placed under police supervision to prevent them from coming into contact with the villagers, who might be enlightened as to the true cause of their permanent distress—absentee landlordism and Government indifference. The road to education is also barred. Jews are excluded from the secondary schools and universities, and even those who contrive to be admitted to university examinations are usually "ploughes" by anti-Semitic professors, who show a surprising lenience to Christian students. Jewish students of medicine who obtain their doctorate diplomas at foreign universities are not allowed to practice in their native country, which is notoriously short of qualified doctors. Jewish children are not admitted into the public free schools until accommodation has been found for all Christian children, and then only after the payment of exorbitant fees. And yet the Government interferes in the management of the private schools which the Jewish communities must needs establish, frequently disapproving of the appointment of Jewish teachers and foisting upon them Christian teachers.

Denied all rights of citizenship, the Jews, with their reduced earning capacity, must nevertheless discharge its duties; they must pay taxes and—and foreigners as they are declared to be—they must serve in the Army, although they can not rise to the rank even of a mere corporal. But more degrading than all these disabilities is the gruesome ceremonial of the oath which they are compelled to take when engaged in litigation with Christians. This sacramentum more Judaico, which has been in force since 1844, is marked by the fanaticism of the Middle Ages, to which it owes its origin, and is utterly repulsive to human reason. The Jewish litigant is wrapped in a shroud, placed in a coffin, and laid out in the synagogue, where the rabbi, in the presence of a mixed congregation of indignant Jews and scoffing officials, utters a curse threatening all manner of loathsome diseases against the living corpse and his descendants should he not speak the truth, and the corpse must repeat every word of the malediction or lose his case. This barbarous ceremonial has on several occasions been declared illegal by the supreme court of justice and the court of cassation, but it is still enforced by local courts which condemn the Jew who refuses to submit to it. Not until an act of Parliament abolishes it will this abominable stain be removed from Roumania's code of persecution.

The hostility of the Government has a contagious and demoralizing effect upon all classes and sections of the population—judges and bishops, politicians and professors, students and peasants. A judge in a Jassy law court publicly stigmatized the Jews as vagabonds in a case affecting a respectable Jewish merchant of 30 years' standing; and Bishop Nifon of the Lower Danube, in a pastoral screed printed in the Bucharest press, accused them of trying to seduce the common people from their ancestral religion. The peasants who are naturally well disposed toward the Jews, and of whom 74 per cent are illiterate, are impregnated with anti-Semitism by the village teachers, who read to them choice extracts from bigoted newspapers at their evening gatherings. The peasants have frequently protested against the banishment of the Jews from the villages, but the Government is merciless, sparing neither reservists nor even the sick, who can be driven from their homes at 24 hours' notice. Nor does it matter whether the Government is composed of conservatives or liberals, for they are both agreed in this policy of oppression and in defying the treaty to which their country owes its independence. The result of this policy, which aims at reducing the Jews to economic ruin, has been a constant migration to lands of liberty, primarily to England and America. From 1899 to 1907, according to the Moniteur Officiel, some 55,000 refugees left for the United States alone. The high tide in this flow of emigration was reached in 1902, when the American Secretary of State, John Hay, fearing that economic troubles might arise from the sudden influx, addressed a note to the powers signatory to the treaty of Berlin, urging them to make the Roumanian Government comply with its pledge. The British Government seconded the note, but the other powers were restrained by political interests from enforcing the lesson of humanity they had vainly tried to administer a quarter of a century before, and Roumania was thus left unchecked in its career of persecution. The only effect of America's well-meant intervention was that the Roumanian Government stopped issuing passports to Jews so that the complaints about their invading other countries might cease, and hundreds who had already sold up their homes and eagerly looked forward to reaching a peaceful haven in a few days were doomed to remain in their cruel fatherland. All subsequent attempts to bring moral suasion to bear upon the Government, whether from within or without, have proved equally futile. The most recent occasion has been in connection with the cession of the new Dobrudja by Bulgaria to Roumania as part of the Balkan War settlement, a territorial change that naturally aroused the fear that the free Jewish citizens of Silisbria and Baltshik would be reduced to the bondage of their fellow Jews in the rest of Roumania.

The Roumanian minister in London published an assurance in the Jewish Chronicle that the Jews who came under Roumanian rule would enjoy the same civil and religious equality as before, but the bill for the administration of the new Dobrudja, which has been drafted by the Roumanian Government, offers Bulgaria's former subjects only a modified sort of equality. The new citizens of Roumania will be able to acquire only a limited amount of land, and only in the annexed territory, and they will be deprived of parliamentary representation, which they had enjoyed for more than 30 years under Bulgarian rule, and likewise of local self-government.

The Jews of the new Dobrudja, however, may consider their lot as fortunate in comparison with that of their brethren in the older part of the Kingdom, for these have no prospect whatsoever of the removal of their disabilities. The 15,000 Jewish soldiers who took part in Roumania's bloodless campaign against Bulgaria were promised enfranchisement by ministers of the late Government, but there is no indication that this promise will ever be realized, and hence hundreds of disappointed Jewish reservists, with their families, have left the country in disgust. It had, indeed, been hoped that the provisions of the treaty of Berlin, which insure the equal rights of religious or national minorities, would be reaffirmed in connection with the recognition of the territorial changes consequent upon the Balkan War. But the powers, as announced in the House of Commons, are not agreed upon the question of reaffirmation, even though this was to be applied only to the newly annexed territories; nor could one have expected them to agree, for how can Russia read Roumania a lesson in tolerance?

On June 28, 1917, I addressed a letter to the President, reading as follows:

WASHINGTON, D. C., June 28, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. PRESIDENT: As repeatedly stated by you, we have entered the present war because "we are one of the champions of the rights of mankind."

Firm in that belief, I feel that now is the proper time, when the Roumanian mission is about to reach Washington, to respectfully call your attention and earnest consideration to the note sent on August 11, 1902, by Secretary John Hay (copy of which I inclose), showing the continued violation of the Berlin treaty of 1878 by Roumania in its treatment of the Jews.

Prolific has Roumania been in its promises to grant them the rights guaranteed by the Berlin treaty, but barren has indeed been its performances in that respect.

As one of our allies, that country now seeks our aid and in the name of justice and humanity you have the undoubted right to demand that Roumania give to the Jews those equal rights which were supposedly assured to them by the Berlin treaty.

Approximately 300,000 Jews have been deprived of all rights in Roumania, with the exception of the payment of taxes and service in its armies, both of which are obligatory.

You have it within your power to obtain immediate action, and your statement to the mission that you believe that the time has come for Roumania to grant those rights now would, I feel, strike a responsive cord.

May I therefore appeal to you to favorably receive this request and to successfully strike for mankind, now that the opportunity to do so has arrived?

With kindest regards,

Very sincerely, yours,

_____.

HON. WOODROW WILSON,
White House, Washington, D. C.

On June 29, 1917, I received the following answer:

THE WHITE HOUSE,
Washington, June 29, 1917.

MY DEAR MR. SIEGEL: I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of June 28, and to say that I have called it to the attention of the President. He is sincerely obliged to you for it.

Sincerely, yours,

J. TUMULTY,
Secretary to the President.

HON. ISAAC SIEGEL,
House of Representatives.

DEPARTMENT OF STATE,
Washington, August 11, 1902.

SIR: In the course of an instruction recently sent to the minister accredited to the Government of Roumania in regard to the basis of a negotiation begun with that Government looking to a convention of naturalization between the United States and Roumania, certain considerations were set forth for the minister's guidance concerning the character of emigration from that country, the causes which constrain it, and the consequences so far as they adversely affect the United States.

It has seemed to the President appropriate that these considerations, relating as they do to obligations entered into by the signatories of the treaty of Berlin, July 13, 1878, should be brought to the attention of the governments concerned and commended to their consideration, in the hope that, if they are so fortunate as to meet the approval of the several powers, such measures as to them may seem wise may be taken to persuade the Government of Roumania to reconsider the subject of the grievances in question.

The United States welcomes now, as it has welcomed from the foundation of its Government, the voluntary immigration of all aliens coming hither under conditions fitting them to become merged in the body politic of this land. Our laws provide the means for them to become incorporated indistinguishably in the mass of citizens and prescribe their absolute equality with the native born, guaranteeing to them equal rights at home and equal protection abroad. The conditions are few, looking to their coming as free agents, so circumstanced physically and morally as to supply the healthful and intelligent material of free citizenhood. The pauper, the criminal, the contagiously or incurably diseased are excluded from the benefits of immigration only when they are likely to become a source of danger or a burden upon the community. The voluntary character of their coming is essential; hence we shut out all immigration assisted or constrained by foreign agencies.

The purpose of our generous treatment of the alien immigrant is to benefit us and him alike, not to afford to another State a field upon which to cast its own objectionable elements. The alien, coming hither voluntarily and prepared to take upon himself the preparatory, and, in due course, the definite obligations of citizenship, retains thereafter, in domestic and international relations, the initial character of free agency, in the full enjoyment of which it is incumbent upon his adoptive State to protect him.

The foregoing considerations, whilst pertinent to the examination of the purpose and scope of a naturalization treaty, have a larger aim. It behooves the State to scrutinize most jealously the character of the immigrant from a foreign land, and, if it be obnoxious or objectionable, to examine the causes which render it so. Should those causes originate in the act of another sovereign State to the detriment of its neighbors, it is the prerogative of an injured State to point out the evil and to make remonstrance; for with nations, as with individuals, the social law holds good that the right of each is bounded by the right of the neighbor.

The condition of a large class of the inhabitants of Roumania has for many years been a source of grave concern to the United States. I refer to the Roumanian Jews, numbering some 400,000. Long ago, while the Danubian principalities labored under oppressive conditions, which only war and a general action of the European powers sufficed to end, the persecution of the indigenous Jews under Turkish rule called forth in 1872 the strong remonstrances of the United States.

The treaty of Berlin was hailed as a cure for the wrong, in view of the express provisions of its forty-fourth article, prescribing that "in Roumania the difference of religious creeds and confessions shall not be arrayed against any one person as a ground for exclusion or incapacity in matters relating to the enjoyment of civil and political rights, admission to public employments, functions, and honors, or the exercise of the various professions and industries in any locality whatsoever," and stipulating freedom in the exercise of all forms of worship to Roumanian dependents and foreigners alike, guaranteeing that all foreigners in Roumania shall be treated, without distinction of creed, on a footing of perfect equality.

With a lapse of time these just prescriptions have been rendered nugatory in great part, as regards the native Jew, by the legislation and municipal regulations of Roumania. Starting from the arbitrary and controvertible premise that the native Jews of Roumania, domiciled there for centuries, are "aliens not subject to foreign protection," the ability of the Jew to earn even the scanty means of existence that suffice for a frugal race has been constricted by degrees until nearly every opportunity to win a livelihood is denied and until the helpless poverty of the Jew has constrained an exodus of such proportions as to cause general concern.

The political disabilities of the Jews in Roumania, their exclusion from the public service and the learned professions, the limitations of their civil rights, and the imposition upon them of exceptional taxes, involving, as they do, wrongs repugnant to the moral sense of liberal modern peoples, are not so directly in point for my present purpose as the public acts which attack the inherent right of man as a bread winner in the ways of agriculture and trade. The Jews are prohibited from owning land or even from cultivating it as common laborers. They are debarred from residing in rural districts. Many branches of petty trade and manual production are closed to them in the overcrowded cities, where they are forced to dwell and engage, against fearful odds, in the desperate struggle for existence. Even as ordinary artisans or hired laborers they may only find employment in the proportion of one "unprotected alien" to two "Roumanians" under any one employer.

In short, by the cumulative effect of successive restrictions, the Jews of Roumania have become reduced to a state of wretched misery. Shut out from nearly every avenue of self-support which is open to the poor of other lands, and ground down by poverty, as the natural result of their discriminatory treatment, they are rendered incapable of lifting themselves from the enforced degradation they endure. Even were the fields of education, of civil employment, and of commerce open to them as to "Roumanian citizens" their penury would prevent their rising by individual effort.

Human beings so circumstanced have virtually no alternatives but submissive suffering or flight to some land less unfavorable to them. Removal under such conditions is not, and can not be, the healthy, intelligent emigration of a free and self-reliant being; it must be in most cases the mere transplantation of an artificially produced diseased growth to a new place. Granting that in better and more heathful surroundings the morbid conditions will eventually change for good, such emigration is necessarily for a time a burden to the community upon which the fugitives may be cast. Self-reliance and the knowledge and ability that evolve the power of self-support must be developed and at the same time avenues of employment must be opened in quarters where competition is already keen and opportunities scarce.

The teachings of history and the experience of our own Nation show that the Jews possess in a high degree the mental and moral qualifications of conscientious citizenhood. No class of imigrants is more welcome to our shores when coming equipped in mind and body for entrance upon the struggle for bread and inspired with the high purpose to give the best service of heart and brain to the land they adopt of their own free will. But when they come as outcasts, made doubly paupers by physical and moral oppression in their native land, and thrown upon the long-suffering generosity of a more favorable community their migration lacks the essential conditions which make alien immigration either acceptable or beneficial. So well is this appreciated on the Continent that, even in the countries where anti-Semitism has no foothold, it is difficult for these fleeing Jews to obtain any lodgment. America is their only goal.

The United States offers asylum to the oppressed of all lands, but its sympathy with them in nowise impairs its just liberty and right to weigh the acts of the oppressor in the light of their effects upon this country and to judge accordingly.

Putting together the fact now painfully brought home to this Government during the past few years that many of the inhabitants of Roumania are being forced, by artificially adverse discriminations, to quit their native country; that the hospitable asylum offered by this country is almost the only refuge left to them; that they come hither unfitted by the conditions of their exile to take part in the new life of this land under circumstances either profitable to themselves or beneficial to the community; and that they are not objects of charity from the outset and for a long time—the right of remonstrance against the acts of the Roumanian Government is clearly established in favor of this Government. Whether consciously and of purpose or not, these helpless people, burdened and spurned by their native land, are forced by the sovereign power of Roumania upon the charity of the United States.

This Government can not be a tacit party to such an international wrong. It is constrained to protest against the treatment to which the Jews of Roumania are subjected, not alone because it has unimpeachable ground to remonstrate against the resultant injury to itself, but in the name of humanity. The United States may not authoritatively appeal to the stipulations of the treaty of Berlin, to which it was not and can not become a signatory, but it does earnestly appeal to the principles contained therein, because they are the principles of international law and eternal justice, advocating the broad toleration which that solemn compact enjoins, and standing ready to lend its moral support to the fulfilment thereof by its consignatories, for the act of Roumania itself has effectively joined the United States to them as an interested party in this regard.

You will take an early occasion to read this instruction to the minister of foreign affairs, and should he request it, leave with him a copy.

I have the honor to be your obedient servant,

(Signed) JOHN HAY.

These facts tell the story regarding the terrible conditions in Roumania, and I sincerely hope that when this world war is over that the peace commissioners will take into consideration that having entered into the war for the freedom of mankind and the freedom of the seas that a treaty will be put into effect which will fully effectuate our intentions and maintain the peace of the world, and at the same time give real religious, civil, and economical liberties to all men everywhere, including Roumania.

A War Congress.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE B. FRANCIS,

OF NEW YORK,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, October 5, 1917.

Mr. FRANCIS. Mr. Speaker, the special session of the Sixty-fifth Congress is now about to close. We have finally passed the deficiency bill and the much-discussed war-revenue bill. We have virtually done all things requested by the President, irrespective of party, for the security of the Nation. We have created a war machine to cross the seas and strike at the enemy, and have marshaled the resources of the country to sustain it. In six months we have enacted laws which have revolutionized our economic and social life. In this task Republicans and Democrats have worked harmoniously together in a patriotic spirit, and Congress has given to it hours of conscientious study. No fairer and more temperate review of what Congress has done has come to my attention than that contained in an editorial of the New York Evening Post of September 17, 1917, which I insert at length:

A WAR CONGRESS.

If the House realizes its ambition to clear its docket and adjourn by the end of the month, a purpose in which the administration is reported heartily to concur, it will leave behind it a record of achievement for which it will be difficult to find a parallel in any one session of our congressional history. To speak of it as an epoch-making session is commonplace. Just one of its acts, the declaration of war against Germany, would make it that. What the record shows, however, is a mass of legislation, springing out of that momentous first step, which for bulk and comprehensiveness, for the great issues involved and the enormous figures dealt with, for its drastic innovations and its effects on the multifarious phases of the national life, stands without a rival. The historian of the war Congress of 1917 will examine that record in a more dispassionate spirit than those who have watched the grinding of the legislative machinery from day to day in the face of a tremendous emergency. Free from such daily agitations and panics, surer of his perspective, and much more qualified to test the expenditure of energy by results, this future chronicler of congressional activity will render a fairer verdict than one would have thought likely a few weeks ago. We say a few weeks ago, because already there are signs that public opinion is revising its attitude toward what the most impatient ones were used to describe as a "misrepresentative" Congress.

A summary, not altogether complete, of the legislation that will have been enacted in the seven months that will elapse before adjournment of the House bears directly on the charge that Congress paltered and delayed while the Nation's need cried out for action. On April 2 the President read his war message to Congress, and on April 6 the joint resolution had been passed by both Houses. On April 5 the War Department's selective-draft bill was introduced in both Houses; it became law on May 18. Nearly a month before that, on April 24, the first bond bill, embodying the provisions for the first liberty loan, became law. On May 12 the President signed the Army appropriation bill. On May 15 the bill for increasing the naval and marine forces went to the President. By June 13 Congress had passed the war-budget bill. Two days later it passed the espionage bill. Among other measures that have become law or will become law before adjournment are the embargo bill, the priority shipping bill, food legislation, shipping legislation, the new $11,000,000,000 bond bill, the war-revenue bill, and the soldiers' and sailors' insurance bill. It is true that in war time we can not apply the speed standards of normal times. In peace every one of these measures might have furnished sufficient fuel for an entire session. We had a right to expect much greater expedition in time of emergency. Nevertheless, there is a middle point between legislative delay and the rushing through of vital measures without examination and without debate, even in time of war.

The three measures on which Congress spent much more time than an impatient country thought necessary have been the war-revenue bill, the espionage bill, and food legislation. In dealing with revenue Congress will have given something like six months to legislation which in the British House of Commons has been enacted in a little more than half the time. Responsibility for this is not entirely with Congress, however. Partly the delay was due to the preliminary work in the Treasury Department, though there in turn we must take into account the ever-shifting estimates made necessary by the expansion of our war program. We have been legislating for revenue for the first year of a war, while England has had the experience of three years to go by. The long fight over the espionage bill does not count against Congress at all, but against the administration, with its unwise insistence upon a censorship in which Congress had the country behind it. It was the foolish and tedious guerrilla warfare against the President's food conservation measures that counted most heavily in the public mind and will so count in the impartial historian's review. In its attempt to make the food bill an omnibus for all sorts of extraneous measures, and especially in the injection of the prohibition issue, which it was apparent from the first was bound to fail, Congress was guilty of obstruction. To be sure, there is the argument that little harm was done, inasmuch as Mr. Hoover went serenely about his business while Congress pinned riders to the food bill and took them off again. That, however, is a plea in extenuation and not a defense.

It is not necessary to insist that the proceedings of the last six and a half months in Congress have been characterized by the highest wisdom and the deepest conscientiousness in order to refute the counter-impression of a sluggish and unpatriotic Congress, which had to be shamed or prodded toward its duty. The simple fact is that whatever the country has thought necessary for the prosecution of the war it has obtained from Congress. Whatever Mr. Wilson asked for—with the exception of the censor—he got, with some delay, perhaps, but without detriment to the country's mustering for the war. The angry ones who not long ago were accusing Congress of refusing to back up our men now training for the trenches in France may be asked to specify in what respect the country has suffered. We have created an immense Army; we have brought the Navy to a strength in personnel exceeding that of Great Britain at the beginning of the war; we have given all the money demanded for men, guns, ships, aeroplanes, and economic mobilization. It used to be a favorite taunt against the voluble Congressmen that Germany was deriving aid and comfort from their activities. Germany's present state of mind with regard to our war effort supplies a sufficient answer.

This is a record of achievement of which any legislature may be proud, and it is to the everlasting credit of the Republican Party that in the hour of the Nation's peril it rose to the President's support without a thought of party or politics. In common with the Republican membership of the House I have supported the program of the administration. I have both spoken and voted for the bills it requested, with the exception of the bill for the censorship, which I opposed.

While this task was being performed a striking development was taking place in the United States. There was at the opening of the session and before the war a respectable and intelligent body of citizens who favored peace. They were by no means insignificant in number. I do not refer to the noisy, traitorous few who spoke through a seditious press, but to those who loved peace truly, feared war, and thought it possible further to avoid it. In the past six months it has been my observation that these citizens have come wholly around to a firm and cordial support of the President. Many causes have brought this to pass. First and foremost was the fact that they were patriotic Americans, and they were prepared to accept the decision of the country, because they were loyal. Second, they have been finally convinced by the crowding revelations of the criminal deceit of the enemy that it must be defeated, and that its iniquitous international immorality must be stamped out if our conceptions of common truth, honesty, and fair dealing are to prevail. And, finally, the traitors at home who have worked for defeat, dissension, and disaster under the spurious cry of peace have thrown them heart and soul into the camp of the patriots. They have indignantly refused to be associated in any cause with such discreditable neighbors. The Nation stands to-day solidified in patriotic purpose and strength, and woe to those who will not believe it.

With the close of this session the ground is cleared for a further constructive advance. With the coming of the long session two months hence, I believe we shall see a steady progress of effective legislation which will continue till we bring about a successful termination of the war. In this the Republican Party will maintain, I believe, its fullest loyal cooperation, and show itself worthy of the confidence of those who trust it.

War-Revenue Bill—Financing the World's War.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. HORATIO C. CLAYPOOL,

OF OHIO,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Monday, October 1, 1917,

On conference report on the bill (H. R. 4280) to provide revenue to defray war expenses, and for other purposes.

Mr. CLAYPOOL. Mr. Speaker, this bill coming to us as it does to-day after having been thoroughly discussed by this House some months ago and then having been analyzed by the Senate day after day for some weeks surely should be recognized as a finished product. Yes; in addition to the effort placed upon it by practically the full membership of the Congress as herein mentioned, expert conferees from the two Houses have been giving it very careful consideration for some days and hand us their unanimous report, and are asking our indorsement of their labors.

In my opinion, every process of change the bill has passed through since its first inception has improved it. And this is no criticism of the bill as it first came from the hands of the Ways and Means Committee, for since then unforeseen changes in the affairs of our Government have made more revenue absolutely necessary, and I want to compliment those formulating the bill in its last stages in looking to the proper sources for the stupendous amount necessary to finance the war for the next few months.

I mean no flattery to Congress when I say this is the best revenue bill passed by any Congress in the last half century. Why do I say this? Simply because it is the only revenue bill passed in all that period that did not in its last analysis make the consumer, who as a class is the poorest able to pay, actually and in fact, pay almost the entire expenses of running this great Government of ours. This bill is, in its present form, and in fact in all the forms it has taken since it first appeared in Congress, an exception to that rule, and those growing rich from the misfortunes of a world war (I say misfortune, for every war is a misfortune) are called upon by this bill to divide their war profits and turn over to the Government a reasonable per cent thereof, amounting to about one billion, for the purpose of defraying war expenses. Can any one complain at this? Certainly not. The war gave them the opportunity to make the money; why not divide it in this way? Besides, who can make payment so easily as those growing rich out of the war? For, mind you, we are only taking a part of the profits. If the great manufacturing companies make no profit we take nothing. So it is impossible for this feature of the bill to distress them.

The next great item of revenue raised by this bill is the income-tax feature. A proper amount for a comfortable living for each individual and family is first exempted, against which there is no assessment. Beyond that there is a gradual increase of rate of taxation. What method of taxation could be more just. Who can so well afford to pay the expenses of this great war, or at least a fair portion thereof, as those with incomes beyond a good living? By this tax on incomes we hope and expect to add to the war revenue almost a billion more.

So, Mr Speaker, it may be readily seen that the greater amount of this war revenue must be paid by the wealthy and those well to do. The laboring class will be asked to pay only a comparatively small per cent. And in this particular this bill differs from every other revenue bill passed by Congress in the last 50 years.

But there is one other feature of the bill which appeals to us in the strongest terms, and one which, in the earlier discussion of this bill bid fair to create a division. Happily that disposition has entirely disappeared. I refer to the notion held at the beginning by some that practically the whole of the war revenue should be raised by bond issue, and I wish to say here and now, if this bill in its present form has any fault it is that it does not presume to collect a large enough proportion of the war expense, and still leaves too much to be raised by issuing bonds. Many of us hoped to raise about one-half of the necessary amount by this bill, but that the requirements have recently grown to such gigantic proportions we can now see the possible danger of embarrassing business and thus interfering with future collections.

The impression I am desirous of making is that we should, as nearly as is practical, pay as we go. I am aware that the amount called for forbids our doing so, but let us approach it as nearly as can be done with safety, and thus pay our own expenses and not pass them on to future generations.

So we are gratified that the present bill and the one passed by Congress some months ago provide jointly for the collection of more than $4,000,000,000, a very large proportion of which will be collected from the wealthy, who are certainly the best able to pay.

And yet, Mr. Speaker, it is not a pleasure to collect this immense sum off the American people, or any portion of them. I say we are pleased with the amount provided for in the bill because it must be collected either by taxation now, or by issuing bonds to be paid by taxation in the future, and by those who do not owe the debt and had nothing to do with the war, and while we hope future generations may inherit its blessings yet the debt is not theirs.

And when we found ourselves compelled to provide for something like twenty-one billion, we were forced to use both taxation and issue of bonds. And it is easily understood that the greater the amount herein provided for the less will be the necessary amount of bond issue. There is, perhaps, no feature of our present legislation regarding which we differ more than upon the relative amounts to be raised on the one hand by this revenue bill and on the other hand by bond issue. The one presupposes the payment of the expenses of the present war, as nearly as is possible and expedient, by the present generation, while those favoring a less amount under this bill and a consequent greater amount of bonds to run for a great number of years believe in passing the indebtedness on to future generations. As a reason for so desiring to do this they say we are fighting for a principle, and future generations will be the recipients of much good resulting from our efforts in the present world war. But we who believe in paying as we go as nearly as can be practically done, while admitting we are fighting for a principle, and truly hope our children and grandchildren will inherit a truer democracy because of our investment, of our sacrifices of men and money, yet we know from observations of history that every age, every generation, in fact, has its own obligations, which are sufficiently burdensome without assuming those of the generation that preceded it.

Besides, this war is ours, not theirs. We declared it. We are conscripting our young men and asking them no questions as to their willingness to sacrifice life and limb on the European battle fields. We simply pass a statute saying they must go and they obey. Now, since we do not hesitate to conscript these young men and ask them to place upon the altar of their country all they possess on earth, why should we hesitate for a moment to conscript the wealth of this great country of ours, and say to them, as we can say truthfully, but a few months ago many of the wealthy institutions of our land were bombarding Congress with letters and telegrams asking—yes; some of them demanding—that we vote to conscript young men, even of the age of 19 and 20 years, and many of them are still displeased because we refused to include those younger than 21. But, listening to their entreaties, Congress passed the conscript law, and the flower of American young manhood is cheerfully obeying the order to get ready for the long journey to a land from which many of them will never return.

This being true, why should wealth protest against being conscripted, much less should we hesitate to conscript wealth. Why should the magazines and metropolitan newspapers that shouted the loudest for conscripting the boys now send us a message nearly every day declaring if they were forced to pay their own postage it means their death sentence?

But another reason occurs to me why a large portion of the expenses of the present war should be paid as we go: These young men conscripted and on their way are called on to do all the fighting for America. Now, when they return—and we hope they all will return—they will join in the usual business of life and become taxpayers. In all fairness, should these young men who have done the fighting and risked their lives, and who are fortunate enough to return, be asked to pay their portion of the war expenses, besides doing the fighting? The young man who hesitates to start to Europe as a soldier is called a "slacker" by some of these same individuals who now make entreaties against being taxed. Of course, those who shout "slacker" have no intention of going to the war themselves, nor even sending anyone nearer akin than their wife's relations; but that does not prevent their attempting to appear patriotic by urging the other fellow to go, and growing indignant if the young man is not in a hurry about it. Some people's notion of patriotism is appalling when we note the difference as they apply it to the other fellow and then to themselves. They use a very different quality of patriotism when applying to the two different individuals.

But, Mr. Speaker, we still have confidence in the American people. We believe the young men of to-day are as brave and as patriotic as were their fathers of 50 years ago. We believe they will acquit themselves in a manner that will reflect new military glory on us as a Nation. And, while we believe this to be true of our young men, many of whom have already answered the call and are now busy training for the final struggle, and who are so cheerfully making the greatest sacrifice possible to be offered by the human race, let us still have confidence in those who for well-defined reasons can not go to the trenches, and who must therefore renew their energies in an endeavor to give a proper account of their labors in supporting their more fortunate brothers who have passed muster and are on their way to fight the battles of our country.

Mr. Speaker, all classes of men have a duty to perform in winning this war. Pardon me, but I must insist that the first duty is up to the soldier boy who must fill the ranks. But these boys must be fed and clothed. The farmer has a task worthy the best men of a great Nation. And we have confidence he will faithfully perform the duty assigned to him. The coal miner must keep the machines running, that the soldier may be clothed, fed, and armed. Up to date he has never failed to perform his part. The great corporations and capitalists are being called on by this bill with their money to finance the war. Let them be as faithful as the young men and the laborers of this country, and every doubt of our winning will at once disappear.

An International Confederation of the Democracies.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. GEORGE HOLDEN TINKHAM,

OF MASSACHUSETTS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, October 5, 1917.

Mr. TINKHAM. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to extend remarks in the RECORD I want to submit the following comments, reviews, and opinions on the proposal for an international confederation of democracies under a constitution, by David Lubin, delegate of the United States to the International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy:

AN INTERNATIONAL CONFEDERATION OF THE DEMOCRACIES UNDER A CONSTITUTION.

INTRODUCTORY NOTE.

This document contains an outline of a plan for an "international confederation of the democracies under a constitution." It is prefaced by some comments, reviews, and opinions on the same, received in response to a few requests.

It is issued in the belief that the basis for the reconstruction which must obviously follow the conclusion of the war is a problem which should be studied and discussed widely at the present time, so that public opinion may crystallize on the subject and be prepared to deal with it intelligently when the time for action comes.

It may be that as a result of this publication further comments and opinions may come to hand, in which case they may be published, perhaps with some further observations to which the comments may give rise. The communications should be addressed to David Lubin, International Institute of Agriculture, Rome, Italy.

THE COMMENTS, REVIEWS, AND OPINIONS.

(From His Excellency Paolo Boselli, prime minister of Italy.)

ROME, April 30, 1917.

I have read your paper published in the Nuova Antologia of 1st instant, and I admired the noble aims which you propose and the civilized and humanitarian inspiration which has suggested to you this proposal for a confederation of the democracies.

In Italy, which is the home of civil and of international law, and which is essentially a democratic country, the ideas which you set forth will certainly awaken an echo of sympathy, and I, for my part, express the wish for the realization of all things that may tend to raise humanity through the pacific collaboration of the nations.

[From His Excellency Wang-Kouang-Ky, minister of China to Italy.]

ROME, April 10, 1917.

I have received, through Mr. Wang-Tseng-Sze, delegate of our country to the International Institute of Agriculture, your article on the foundation of an international confederation of democracies, and after reading it I have noted with very great satisfaction that your idea coincides exactly with the conception of the "Great Community of Humanity" of our Confucius (551–479 B. C.).

Your appreciation of the fact that China has always been a democracy in the making especially deserves my admiration. It is a fact that, in spite of its thousand-year-old monarchy, China has always been a democratic country. The Emperor Jiao (2357 B. C.) had a son, Tangtsou, but he transmitted his throne to the citizen Soeung (2255 B. C.) because the nation had more confidence in him than in the Emperor's son. For the same reason the Emperor Soeung transmitted the throne to the citizen Yu (2205 B. C.) rather than to his own son. It was only because Tchi (2197 B. C.), son of the Emperor Yu, enjoyed the entire confidence of the people that he was able to succeed his father on the throne.

Thus the principles regulating the imperial succession allow us to judge of the manner in which the country was administered at that period, and everything proves the development of democratic ideas in ancient China.

It is true that, according to the ancient maxim, "sovereign power emanates from heaven," and therefore princes were required to venerate the Divinity and to obey it. Now, in a proclamation addressed by the Emperor Tan (1783 B. C.) to his people it is said that the sight and hearing of the Divinity are those of the people; that is to say, that apart from the will of the people there is no divine will. The Divinity is therefore considered as the heavenly representative of the people. All this is written in the great classic works, demonstrating in a clear and simple fashion the development of democratic ideas in China. Other instances of this are too numerous for me to mention.

It is precisely because these ideas have taken such deep root in the spirit of the Chinese people that the revolution of Wou-Tchang (1911) rapidly led to the abdication of the Manchu dynasty, while the formation of a monarchical party (1915) led to the last revolution (1916) reestablishing and consolidating the Republic.

You have not been in China, my dear Mr. Lubin, but you judge it so well that I am truly enchanted. I have forwarded your paper to Peking to many eminent personages, and I await their replies, reserving to myself the pleasure of communicating them to you as soon as they come to hand.

As to the means of realizing your proposal, I shall be happy to do all in my power to help you to attain the noble aim you have in view.

[From His Excellency Baron de Giers, ambassador of Russia to Italy.]

ROME, 10/23 April, 1917.

I have read with great interest and profound attention the paper which you kindly handed to me and which contains in outline a proposal for an international confederation having for its purpose to insure permanent peace under the régime of a constitution; and after reading the paper I forwarded it to the minister of foreign affairs at Petrograd, accompanied by a letter of recommendation.

As you have expressed the wish to know my opinion on the subject you treat of I must tell you that in my opinion no one can deny the utility of establishing a state of affairs which would exclude in the future the possibility of armed conflicts between the nations. The horrors of the present war and the calamities which it has unchained throughout the world are such that if prior to 1914 only a few choice spirits dreamt of an ideal of universal peace, at present the crushing majority of the civilized world desires but one thing—to avoid in future the possibility of such carnage.

It is evident that it is not at the present moment that arrangements aiming at establishing permanent peace can be made. It was the central empires who wished for this war in order to attain their selfish ends; the entente powers have gathered together their forces and are now beginning to deal the decisive blows which will insure victory in the near future. The sole aim that they can pursue at this time is that of attaining this victory at all costs and in the shortest time possible. When they shall have placed their aggressors in a position in which they can no longer harm, the time will be here to proceed to the establishment of a condition of things apt to render impossible the return of unjustifiable aggressions.

Please accept, my dear Mr. Lubin, the assurance of my sincere sympathy with the noble ideal of which you are the eloquent apostle.

ROME, April 27, 1917.

I read with great interest the encomiums on your thoughtful essay on an "International Confederation of the Democracies under a Constitution," especially the paper by the Chinese minister, whose historic references make us young countries all feel our swaddling clothes.

As I told you, the principles which you have set forth as the basis of your plan appeal to me greatly. You have a great and—as I venture to unite with you in thinking—a fundamental idea in your views of assembling the forces of democracy among all the peoples. I look to the coordination of these forces and their organization in one direction to accomplish what you have in mind.

I am unable to judge so well as to the methods by which you propose to put these principles into effective operation. When details begin, begin also divisions. Your high intention, however, is so apparent that I feel sure that your plan will give rise to earnest discussion, and out of this will doubtless come good.

[From His Excellency Sir Rennell Rodd, British ambassador to Italy.]

ROME, April 30, 1917.

I have to thank you for sending me your exposition, in the Socratic method, of a scheme for an international confederation of democracies. It is the elaboration of an idea which I believe is gradually, if vaguely, forming itself in men's minds to-day, and you have carried it further by submitting a scheme for a constitution of federated democracies.

The more such a proposal can be ventilated and discussed the better. The reception generally accorded to President Wilson's views as to ultimate safeguards of future peace indicates that if a practical scheme of application can be found it will meet with general favor.

One of the difficulties which seems to present itself is that any scheme for international confederation seems to connate a certain sacrifice of national individuality and individual interest, and that in spite of the development of communications, of commercial intercourse, and of more intimate knowledge of each other among the peoples of the world a tendency has been observable in recent years to emphasize rather than to weaken the spirit of nationality. A reluctance may therefore be anticipated on the part of some national units to renounce any avenue of individual development. The democratic spirit seems, however, to be the one common ground upon which nations may meet, and it has certainly hitherto tended to international sympathies and diminished international antagonisms.

It seems possible that if the broad lines of common action to prevent aggression, patent or latent, could be laid down and accepted, many further beneficent developments might follow by a gradual process of evolution and the recognition of the advantageous results of such common action.

In any case, the ideal which you have in view is worthy of all men's sympathy and serious study.

[From His Excellency Señor Eusebio Leao, minister of Portugal to Italy.]

ROME, April 30, 1917.

I have read your paper "An International Confederation," aiming at securing permanent peace under the régime of a constitution.

I think the principle underlying your proposal very worthy of being taken into consideration. It is fully in harmony with the ideas of nationality, of justice, of humanity, which, according to the declarations made by so many eminent statesmen, including your President, are the aim of those who in this terrible war are struggling against the abuse of force.

I do not wish to take up the time required for all the lengthy considerations which your proposal deserves, but I wish all the same to assure you that it has my entire sympathy and that I shall bring it to the attention of my Government.

[From His Excellency Luigi Luzzatti, minister of state, former premier of Italy.]

ROME, April 30, 1917.

You ask for my thought on the serious problem raised in your paper "An International Confederation of the Democracies under a Constitution."

The splendid ideals which from Leibnitz to Bernardin de Saint Pierre, from Rousseau to Kant seemed in past centuries to be Utopias, and in general the programs of universal peace and of the union of all peoples which have always until now preceded great wars, begin to-day, through this catastrophe of universal conflicts which is desolating the world, to appear possible of realization.

When, in harmony with the great program formulated for civilization and history by the President of the United States, all oppressed peoples shall be liberated, when aggressive military autocracies shall once for all be deprived of the power to make the right of might prevail against the might of right, then mankind, ameliorated and purified by suffering, and taught by the atrocities of the present war, will as a result of the spirit of good arising out of evil, and in its own best interests, turn its thoughts to the need of union.

The method of treaties for peace and of international understandings has proven itself ineffectual. It is necessary that for recognized essentials there be a world parliament and a world government.

The nations allied in the great cause of civilization are already striving toward this end. The first attempts have been made by their parliaments at electing representatives to come to mutual understandings of fundamental matters. Delegates of the French and British Parliaments (both of the lower and the upper house) have already met, and recently the delegates of the French and Italian Parliaments gathered in Rome. Now the representatives of the three great nations, France, England, and Italy, are about to meet in Paris, and these gatherings are already known as the "Interallied Parliament." The Russian Duma has promised its adherence, and undoubtedly in the near future, at a great meeting to be held in Paris or London or Rome, a deputation of the House and Senate of the United States will also be invited to attend.

Thus gradually, after the conclusion of a victorious peace, the States which have fought for the liberation of oppressed nationalities will agree to prepare the constitutional statute for mankind, freed from all forms of political and religious despotism.

While the autonomy and sovereignty of the several States will be respected they will spontaneously delegate to a common parliament and to a common executive those supreme questions which affect the peace and happiness of the whole human family.

Thus will be realized the dream of Joseph Mazzini, the great prophet of oppressed peoples. His austere soul from the heaven where it dwells will rejoice at the realization of his great conception.

You who have laid the foundations for the international parliament of agriculture are worthy to agitate this great problem of an international political constitution.

[From His Excellency Lucas Ayarragaray, minister of Argentina to Italy.]

ROME, May 1, 1917.

I have read with interest the basis which you lay down in your proposal for the organization of an "international confederation" for the maintenance of permanent peace between the nations under the régime of a world constitution.

As you wish to know my opinion on the same, I will set forth my personal views. Placing myself on this footing, I take pleasure in discussing with you, in whom I recognize a man of tenacious opinions and altruistic mind, as befits an apostle of a humanitarian doctrine, with certain ideological views, of which with indomitable will you have made yourself the exponent before representative personages in Europe and in America.

Perhaps, amidst the terrible misfortunes and piratical depredations, unchained by this the greatest war in history, you may at first sight seem rash when you come forward with a proposal for insuring permanent peace and when you suggest that there be organized for this purpose in an international confederation and under the ægis of a permanent constitution those legal arbitraments which would make it possible in future to solve without an appeal to arms the clash of interests and opinions which may arise between nations. But, then, is your proposal really in fundamental discord with the natural disposition of man, and more especially with prevailing conditions? Will not antagonisms and concrete grounds of dissent continue to exist between the nations which in the present state of civilization can find no other solution than that of war?

It seems to me that never before have aspirations and tendencies germinated so vigorously in all countries and all social spheres of this old continent as those which are now impelling the peoples as a whole to devise modes of procedure, forms of organization, and juridical and social instruments which will make it possible for mankind at the close of the present titanic struggle to suppress, or at least to lessen, the danger of the tragic repetition of armed conflicts.

A similar desire, under similar circumstances, has in times past found expression in the classic ideologies which in all ages have inspired doctrinaire minds. Now, however, an essential difference may be noted. The present desire for an enduring peace is not only felt by schools of jurists, politicians, and reformers; the significant fact is that it is now stirring to their depths the European masses, resolutely determined to kill war once and for all.

From this point of view it may be said that you, Mr. Lubin, are condensing into primary form the aspirations and general tendency of the peoples of this continent.

This war is the final bankruptcy of war. The utilitarians of violence, the promoters of brutality in international relations, those who believe that the decline of one nation and the rise of another can not work itself out through peaceful competition, but that recourse must be had to terror and violence raised to their extreme limits, now contemplate the downfall of their policy, and to-day they stand arraigned before the bar of humanity and of history.

Let us even suppose that in the worst hypothesis the scales were to turn in their favor. What then? However great might be the indemnities (always problematic) which they might extort from their impoverished victims; however important the favors and privileges which they might exact from ruined countries; however harsh the terms of peace and the treaties of commerce; however extensive we may imagine the annexations of territory in zones already devastated by shell fire, by conflagrations, by trenches, and by systematic destruction; even then, if we add up all these assets and multiply them over and over again, they will never be able to compensate the victors for the monstrous sacrifices they would have made; for the ruins, the deaths of combatants and civilians, the fabulous costs of war, the economic, artistic, and moral values irreparably lost. In short, no conquest can compensate the victor for his losses.

In spite of the tragic downfall of the attempts at international harmony embodied in The Hague Convention, in spite of the outrages on treaty faith and on international law, which, as familiar ideas, were thought to have become part of the political civilization of the nations, I am convinced that at the close of this war not only a European but a world conscience will have developed. This will give practical effect to proposals such as yours, tending to consolidate the interests and aims, not of all nations—that would be chimerical in the present stage of world development—but of a considerable group of nations who by affinity of race, of political institutions, of historical antecedents, and as a result of homogeneity of interests and feelings, will be able to form a defensive league which will ward off the danger of unjustifiable aggressions by selfish powers inclined to disturb the peace of the world.

This is the first time in history that a war begun between groups of belligerents bound by their respective alliances has transformed itself by the expansive force of spontaneous logic, first, into a continental war and then into a world war. As a result we seem to be witnessing to-day a general conjunction of grievances which are causing the nations one after another to arm, and as a result of which they organize and form into groups, including even those peoples who seemed farthest removed by race and tradition from western civilization. For my part, I rejoice to see that groups are already forming around the general principles of right, moved thereto by interests which, to their own surprise, turn out to be common to all.

All this clearly offers evidence of the virtual realization of a future confederation of the nations, which is precisely what your proposal aims at.

So notable a phenomenon, new in the annals of history, compels thought. It makes me conceive the hope that as it was possible to secure a semiworld agreement for the organization of war, it may be possible to secure a semiworld agreement for the organization of peace.

All great steps in human progress and the most fundamental transformations known to history have been conceived and brought forth amidst struggle and sorrow. The present times are characterized by the conditions tragically essential to such periods of fertility and creative energy. The whole world as we know it may, like a new Atlantis, sink before our eyes beneath the angry flood of revolution, whence a new world may emerge, with more of harmony and less of conflict.

I am not affected by the pessimism of the moment, for I am convinced that humanity will come forth renewed from the trial by sword and fire to which it is being subjected, and that the last survivals of feudalism and autocracy, which have persisted down to our day, like anomalous survivals of a past geologic age, even in certain civilized sections of the globe, are destined to disappear. The Middle Ages did not close with the fall of Constantinople; they still drag on; but I hope that this year or next, on the conclusion of the struggle, these anachronous systems of government and of diplomacy will, in their turn be replaced by the new conceptions and forms which are already being forged on the anvil of war.

For, in my opinion, this war is not only killing off officers and men; it is also killing obsolete and decadent ideas, institutions, and modes of home and foreign policy. It would seem as if all the nations, and within the nations all social classes, are being led by a community of grief and sacrifice to seek in solidarity the basis for an enduring peace.

I consider that in future, and as a result of the community of interests which the present conflict has revealed, any war between great civilized powers would always tend to become a semiworld struggle. Consequently, before the nations would engage in the fight they would anxiously seek to justify before the conscience of humanity the grave causes and unavoidable grounds for their action, in an effort to secure the moral support and explicit sanction of that tribunal.

Before the close of 1914—that is to say, only a few months after the outbreak of war—I expressed in a paper published in Buenos Aires the opinion that the political, economic, commercial, financial, and moral solidarity of the world would not allow of any nation remaining neutral in the conflict in which Europe was then engaging, for the disturbances of all kinds to which that struggle would give rise could not be limited exclusively to the then belligerents. This forecast has been more than justified by events. I insist upon this point because I believe that the economic and moral interests of the world are so complex that in future war will cease to be the exclusive and individual act of one nation.

With the Russian revolution and with the entry of the United States into the war side by side with the European Continent, a new force, the force of a new idea has come to invigorate and transform the nature of the conflict; it has become the conflict of democracy and of the liberal spirit against a spirit hostile thereto.

If the observations which I submit are well grounded, then I must conclude that present circumstances, and more especially those of the near future, will be exceptionally favorable for initiating the realization of the proposals and ideas which you set forth with so much fervor.

Democracies are lacking in the patience, the restraint, the perseverance, the personal unity, and the unity of action which are the natural characteristics of an absolute monarchy, and which enable it to prepare over a period of 10, 20, or 50 years, and in the silence of dynastic councils, sheltered by the majesty of its power, an aggression and a war. Democracies are essentially pacific.

And now the question arises, Will your hopes be realized? Will the pacific aspirations of to-day assume concrete shape to-morrow, or will they dissipate like generous dreams into the spheres where poets weave their fancies and chimeras open their wings to the sun? It is 2,000 years since Virgil prophesized a future without war and a world in which mankind would live under the protection of concord and justice. Scarifying war, he spoke of the "Horrida insana bella; lacrimabile bellum." From that remote date to our own day violence and oppression, aggression and brute force have been the normal conditions prevailing between the nations, and concord and peace have been but an unstable equilibrium, a passing episode in human history.

Will the progress of ideas, refinement of feeling, a right understanding of real interests, and, perhaps, a new conception of happiness and of the destiny of man, modify in the future the old wolfish instincts?

We must not rely on the efficacy of a sentimental propaganda; the gospel of love has failed; we must replace it by the gospel of self-interest and by the conviction of the utilitarian value of peace. The day when cruel experience will have taught peoples and governments that peace is more profitable than war, and also that it is more advantageous to trade with and preserve the life of a competitor and a customer than to oppress or destroy him, on that day we shall have realized the dream of an enduring peace. But the more reasonable ideas are, the slower their progress, and it may be that we are yet far removed from the realization of this ideal.

I believe that slavery survived, spite of all the condemnations pronounced against it by divine Christian morality, until the slave owner and his like appreciated the fact that free labor is more productive and implies a higher economic return than slave labor. But how many thousands of years had to pass before this conviction was assimilated by the human mind! The proof of this is given by the fact that slavery endured down to our own day, and that until our own time the slave was considered to be, as in the age of Tacitus, "Vile sanguinis," and it was admitted, as laid down by Cato in his maxims for farm management, that it was advisable to sell an infirm ox and an aged slave.

ROME, April 28, 1917.

I have taken pleasure in forwarding without delay to the Danish Government your paper on an international confederation, drawing its special attention to the importance of the subject.

For my part I wish to add that I have read with the greatest interest your proposal which, I sincerely believe, will promote the cooperation of the democratic forces of the world for the purpose of insuring an enduring peace.

The proposal seems to me an expansion of the ideas on which the International Institute of Agriculture is based, and the success which has so far attended the labors of that institute gives reason to hope that the paper will be carefully examined by the several governments.

[From Hon. Oscar S. Straus, former United States Secretary of Commerce and Labor.]

NEW YORK, April 13, 1917.

I have pleasure in acknowledging the receipt of your letter of the 15th of March, inclosing copy of your proposal "An International Confederation of the Democracies under a Constitution." I have read your admirable presentation of the main issues of the present war—the maintenance of free government as distinguished from autocracy. I agree with you, of far more importance than commerce or territory is the safeguarding of democracy in the Old World no less than in the New. Now that Russia has thrown off her shackles and established a Government of and for the people, and now that our country has thrown in her fortunes with the allies, there is every hope not only for victory but for the union of the democratic nations into a league to safeguard the future for ourselves and for our posterity.

Mr. M. Raynaud (member of the French House of Deputies): "The proposal is not only inspired by the generous ideals dear to democracies, but with the method of a utilitarianism admirably grasped and vividly set forth in the form of a dialogue, it lays down the essential planks of an international constitution destined to bring about the future reign of peace. The practical character of this initiative withdraws the conception of an enduring world peace from the domain of the vague and the academic, and I am convinced that when the time comes my country will rally to it with all its heart."

Mr. H. G. Wells (author, England): "I agree warmly with the spirit underlying the dialogue. * * * The point you make (a constitution instead of a treaty) is admirable."

Senator Vermorel (France): "I am very grateful to Mr. Dop for suggesting that you should send me this proposal, which is most interesting. I hope that the establishment of an international confederation will mark the end of the war and will prevent all future conflagrations. The plan which you suggest seems to me adequate for the ends in view. I especially appreciate your proposal for customs duty reprisals on transgressors."

Mrs. Channing-Stetson (author, America): "Since August, 1914, it has seemed plain to many of us that there was no visible hope anywhere except in a confederation of the liberal nations which could keep the peace of the world. * * * What you have outlined is what a number of us in America have been saying, in a less detailed way, ever since the great war broke out."

Mr. Joseph Reinach (member of the French House of Deputies): "I adhere with all my heart to your proposal for a confederation of free democracies."

Marchese Giuseppe Roi (member of the Italian House of Deputies): "I have read with keen interest the dialogue you sent me. I trust that the proposal will influence the future peace conference toward the great moral international progress which so many of us have at heart."

Prof. Italo Giglioli (Pisa University, Italy): "I quite agree with the chief points and proposals of your paper. Disarmament without previous federation would be madness on the part of each single nation. * * * It is not disarmament that must be dealt with in a direct manner. It is the mind of governments that must be changed. * * * What is most original in your plan is the 'normal average armament,' with the very ingenious and simple tariff-check system to prevent the abnormal growth of armament in any single nation, whether within or without the confederation. * * * I hope your paper will be soon printed and widely spread in all languages and in all countries. Now is the right moment for sowing your good seed."

Sir Charles Macara (England): "There is a great deal in the paper with which I am in accord. * * * What has been accomplished in federating the countries of the world with a view to dealing with the great problems of the supply of food and clothing, convinces me that * * * much may be accomplished in the direction you indicate when once the war is ended. * * * Your views regarding an alliance of the nations of the world, so that their energies may be devoted to the development, and not the destruction, of the resources of the world, have my entire sympathy."

Commissioner Dragoni (secretary general, International Institute of Agriculture, Rome): "Your proposal would, in substance, tend to solve the gravest problem which confronts us in securing the future peace of the world; it would provide the means of insuring that this peace be permanent with nothing to fear from the capricious action of some nation which might wish to provoke, perhaps at no distant date, another war even more terrible than the present one."

M. Compère-Morel (member of the French House of Deputies): "No man worthy of the name can fail to do all in his power within his own environment to attain this purpose, the realization of which will save future generations from the horrors of war and will prepare a better humanity in which each individual will find the maximum of moral and material satisfaction in the general welfare."

Miss Rose E. Cleveland (America): "I hope your paper will provoke thorough discussion. You lay down the fundamental principles on which the great peace should be conceived. * * * You have set up broad lines which are spacious enough to include details and provide for exigencies."

Lord Bryce (England): "Thank you for your interesting article, which you have thrown ingeniously into the form of a dialogue. The several points of view are well put and the argument logically presented. I agree with 'Smith' as to the evil and with 'White' as to the most hopeful lines along which to find a remedy."

Prof. Achille Loria (Turin University, Italy): "I need hardly say that I sympathize entirely with your conclusions and your wishes. * * * I think that the confederation you propose should be strengthened by the deposit of real and inviolable guaranties, and that its action should be limited to the prevention of war."

Mr. Israel Zangwill (author, England): "I have read your proposal with much interest. I think you go to the root of the matter in accentuating the impossibility and incongruity of alliances between autocracies and democracies. We must build the new world from the spirit outward."

Senator Lucien Cornet (France): "The present war is preparing a new era. It will not only bring about the triumph of right over tyranny, but also that of democracy over autocracy. The democracies will then be ready to come together to form the United States of the World * * * and lay down the principle of permanent peace between the nations. * * * The blood of our heroes has not been shed in vain, for it will thus serve to conquer despotism and to kill war."

Hon. Prof. Ettore Ciccotti (member of the Italian House of Deputies): "The proposal is well thought out, even in the details. * * * The need especially for the smaller States to confederate for mutual support and to prevent future aggressions is greater than all the difficulties which beset the path. * * * My opinion is largely one of consent to and sympathy with the proposal."

AN INTERNATIONAL CONFEDERATION OF THE DEMOCRACIES UNDER A CONSTITUTION.

Some nine years ago I attended an international peace conference held in London. At one of the sessions I was introduced to Mr. and Mrs. Edward Mead, prominent peace advocates of Boston. It was in the early days of the International Institute of Agriculture, and I wished them to see in the institute and in the idea it stood for the nucleus of an international economic parliament, the germ whence a future world peace confederation might arise.

During the intervals of the session we talked over these matters, and in the evening we met again. My friends suggested that I should accompany them on a visit to the noted pacifist, Mr. William Stead, to which I gladly assented. This led to an exchange of views on the means likely to insure an enduring world peace.

I will now endeavor to set forth the substance of this and of similar conversations and correspondence which I have had from time to time, and I will do so in the form of a dialogue. I believe this form will best lend itself to the presentation I wish to make. With this explanation as a preliminary, I will begin my paper by introducing the speakers: Smith, an advocate of disarmament; Jones, an opponent; and White, a critic.

THE DIALOGUE.

JONES. Am I to understand, Mr. Smith, that you believed disarmament would bring about permanent peace?

SMITH. Yes; disarmament and the peace tribunal.

JONES. How would you have brought this disarmament about? What would have been the mode of procedure?

SMITH. It was largely a matter of education. We peace advocates of the United States, for instance, had a strong propaganda under way for the disarmament of the United States to begin with. Peace advocates were doing the same kind of work in other countries, and so, in course of time, there would have been a sufficient number of nations won over to form a preponderating world force in favor of an international treaty for world disarmament.

JONES. Primarily, though, you started by an endeavor to disarm this country. Could you get that done?

SMITH. We were very hopeful. In fact, up to the beginning of the present European war we had made considerable headway in that direction.

JONES. Yes; I know you had. But is it not possible that in proportion as this propaganda was making greater headway here than in other countries you were, to that extent, weakening the United States and strengthening those other countries?

SMITH. There could be but one answer to that question, an affirmative, had it not been so patent that the rest of the world was as anxiously seeking peace as was the United States, for witness the eagerness of the nations to hurry their adherence to The Hague Peace Tribunal.

JONES. Yes; the adherence was prompt enough. But that answers nothing, for right upon the heels of this adherence were they not arming and drilling on a greater scale than ever before in the history of the world? Does it not therefore follow that this disarmament propaganda was impracticable, in fact mischievous?

SMITH. What plan would you, then, propose?

JONES. I have no plan; I do not think that any scheme for permanent international peace is practicable.

A CONFEDERATION OF THE DEMOCRACIES.

WHITE. I am inclined to believe that such a conclusion is too dogmatic. We see that there is progressive development in human affairs, so why should there not be progress on the lines of international peace relations?

JONES. Am I to understand, then, that you favor the disarmament program of Mr. Smith?

WHITE. By no means; I believe with you that the disarmament program is impracticable and mischievous. It seems to me that its main defect consists in mistaking an effect for a cause. It takes armament to be a cause instead of taking it as an effect. I think that the first practical step should be the formation by the democracies of the world of an international confederation, a confederation for the maintenance of permanent international peace.

SMITH. This seems to me like straining at a gnat and swallowing a camel. Would it not be more practicable to attain the end in view by disarmament rather than by attempting the formation of an international confederation?

WHITE. Well, let us see; at first glance it would seem that armaments are the cause of war and that disarmament, by removing the cause, would result in peace. But is this the case? Is not armament an effect rather than a cause, an effect of a state of mind? But what mind, whose mind? Clearly the mind of governments; for have not governments minds? Do not these minds run through the whole gamut of political qualities? Do not the forms of government vary from a pure democracy, when the mind of the government is formed and directed by the collective will of the people, down to the extremes of autocracy when its mind is the will of the individual at the head of the State?

In a democracy the government is formed and directed by the people; in an autocracy the autocrat claims to be sovereign. And what is an autocratic sovereign? The dictionary tells us that a sovereign is one who exercises supreme authority, absolute control. He is the supreme power in the State; the original, absolute, and universal power by which all persons and things in a State are controlled and determined. He exercises supreme jurisdiction and power; he claims to be subject to none.

THE STAND OF AUTOCRACY.

JONES. Subject to none? Do you mean to say that there are no qualifications; that he exercises supreme authority, absolute control; that he is subject to no one? Are these not the qualities which we attribute to God?

WHITE. Yes; and more; for while God is all powerful for good, this autocratic sovereign is, besides, all powerful for evil. This assumption of omnipotence is graphically imaged in the Bible when it ironically places in the mouth of such a sovereign the words: "I will exalt my throne above the stars of God. I will ascend above the heights of the clouds; I will be like the Most High." Now, what concerted effort for disarmament can there be between powers of this kind and democracies? Are they not essentially incongruous and incompatible? Can such fundamentally incongruous forces be lastingly welded under treaties for disarmament?

SMITH. Why not, pray?

WHITE. Well, let us see; let us first take up the stand of autocracy. Here are a few quotations from well-known authors which I have noted down. Apply them to past and present-day experiences, then judge whether there be ground for my statement.

The first is from Hegel: "Not only must the State be obeyed, it must be venerated as a god." "Success insured by might is the measure of right."

Treitschke says: "Weak nations have no right to existence, and must be absorbed by powerful nations." "The essence of a State is power. Nothing exists or can exist which is superior to the State."

Again, Adolphus Lassen declares: "The State can do no wrong." "The observance of treaties is not a matter of duty but of advantage."

And Von Bernhardi says: "'Love God above all things, and thy neighbor as thyself.' This law can claim no significance for the relations of one country to another." "There never have been and never will be, universal rights of men."

Houston Chamberlain says: "Militarism is the indispensable instrument of German culture; it builds its brightest hopes of supremacy on the extermination of others."

And Nietsche says: "Morality is a symptom of decadence." "War is as necessary to the State as slavery is to society." "Might is the source of right." "There is no right other than that of theft, usurpation, and violence."

How radically different the words of Scripture:

"Woe unto them that decree unrighteous decrees, and that write grievousness which they have prescribed."

"Thus saith the Lord. Keep ye judgment and do justice."

"And the word of righteousness shall be peace; and the effect of righteousness quietness and assurance forever."

THE STAND OF DEMOCRACY.

Now let us take up the stand of democracy. The President aptly sets forth this stand in his speech of January 23 to the Senate, when he says:

"Inviolable security of life, of worship, and of industrial and social development should be guaranteed to all peoples."

"The equality of nations upon which peace must be founded if it is to last must be an equality of rights; the guaranties exchanged must neither recognize nor imply a difference between big nations and small, between those that are powerful and those that are weak."

"Governments derive all their just powers from the consent of the governed."

We thus see that conciliatory efforts for permanent peace through disarmament between such incongruous and incompatible factors as democracies and autocracies must not alone be futile but highly dangerous to democracies. It seems that a clearly marked dividing line must be drawn between these two factors, between democracies on the one hand and autocracies on the other. The day for measuring strength, the day for lining up forces has come, and the first practical step toward permanent international peace will be taken whenever the democracies shall make a united effort toward that end.

JONES. What you have just said, Mr. White, reminds me of the following Scripture text:

"And before Him shall be gathered all nations; and He shall separate them one from another as a shepherd divideth his sheep from the goats."

"And He shall set the sheep on the right hand, but the goats on the left."

WHITE. Yes, that is it; the democracies on the one hand and the autocracies on the other.

SMITH. But what should be the mode of procedure? Have you a plan?

WHITE. No; at present nothing more definite than what has been brought out by our discussion, a confederation of the democracies. I would, however, suggest that we continue, and see whether the logic of the case does not point to such a confederation as the most practical means of securing and maintaining permanent international peace.

SMITH. I believe we should all be pleased to have you proceed.

AN INTERNATIONAL CONSTITUTION.

WHITE. As I see it now, I would say that the first thing to be done will be to issue, at the close of the present war, a call for an international convention of the democracies for the purpose of drawing up a constitution for an international confederation. This constitution should be on simple and elemental lines, with limited powers, all for the purpose of maintaining permanent international peace. When the constitution thus drawn up shall have been ratified by the nations concerned, delegates would be designated who would proceed to the place of meeting to begin their labors as an international body.

JONES. What would be the powers and functions of the delegates?

WHITE. Their powers would be specified and limited by the constitution. Their functions could be of threefold character: legislative, executive, and judicial.

SMITH. Why an international constitution? Do you not mean a treaty?

WHITE. No. I do not mean a treaty; I mean a constitution; for a constitution would provide for a permanent international body for international action. Moreover, a constitution voted on by the people and ratified by the government of an adhering nation would be more binding than a treaty.

JONES. Are we to understand that this international confederation would stand for disarmament?

WHITE. No; not for disarmament. On the contrary, there would be a normal average armament which the adhering nations would be required to keep up and, under certain conditions, this normal would be increased.

JONES. What would this increase be for? Would it be for purposes of defense against members of the confederation?

WHITE. As a rule, no. The increase would be for protection against militantly aggressive nations outside of the confederation.

JONES. But supposing the nations outside the confederation were much more powerful than the confederated?

WHITE. In that event it would indicate that the time had not yet come for the proposed confederation.

THE BURDENS AND BENEFITS.

JONES. Supposing we grant that a sufficient number of nations are ready to adhere; among them, on the one hand, Great Britain with her navy, and the United States with its military resources and financial strength, and on the other hand countries less efficient from a military standpoint, countries such as the South American Republics and China. Would not the burdens and the benefits of such a confederation be unequally distributed?

WHITE. As just stated by you; yes. But the case need not stand thus. Each of the adhering nations could contribute a just and adequate quota to the total military strength of the confederation, partly in money, partly in territorial strategic advantages, partly in man power, and partly in actual and potential military and industrial resources. In this manner there could be a systematic, adequate, and just contribution by all the nations concerned.

Let us take China, for instance. Of late years we have heard much talk of the "yellow peril"; seemingly a formidable cry, but one which deserves qualification. From remote times China has selected the units forming her governing body on qualifications of learning. This has rendered China by temper and inclination one of the world's great apostles of peace. In fact, China has always been, as it were, a democracy in the making. But the fact should not be overlooked that China possesses the elements that go to make military strength of a high order, potential strength which is now dormant, but which could be awakened and brought into play. She is strong in man power, perhaps stronger than any other nation. This man power alone should be sufficient contribution by China for her share of the military strength of the confederation.

JONES. I am inclined to agree with what has just been said; indeed, it occurs to me that an additional consideration may be added. The present war has made plain that military unpreparedness is a costly luxury, doubling, trebling, and quadrupling what the cost of scientific preparedness would be during times of peace. The proposed confederation, as I understand it, is intended to provide a continuous, systematic, scientific, and efficient mode of adequate military preparation. Such preparation would entail very much less expenditure in money and effort on the part of each of the units of the confederation than heretofore, and yet would be much more effective for the purposes of any combat which might arise than would be possible otherwise.

AUTOCRACIES COMPELLED TO TOE THE MARK.

SMITH. Would there be any disadvantage in not being a member?

WHITE. Yes; for the confederation would standardize the character and degree of armament. It would determine a normal ratio of armament for each nation, whether in the confederation or not. When that normal would be exceeded the offending country would be subject to certain penalties to be imposed by the confederation. These penalties would be of a restrictive and coercive nature, mainly in the form of special duties on imports from the offending country, special harbor dues, special taxes on persons and property, etc.

The funds thus obtained would be employed to increase the armament of the confederation up to a fixed relative standard. In other words, offending nations outside of the confederation would thus be made to contribute to the cost of such forced increase.

JONES. Would autocracies be permitted to join the confederation?

WHITE. Yes; indeed, their adherence should be welcomed. For by having its people vote for and its government ratify the international constitution, by joining the confederation, an autocracy would thereby cease to be an autocracy, in so far as its relations to the other adhering states were concerned.

SMITH. By what means could adherents be made to comply with the provisions of the constitution?

WHITE. Well, that could be done by requiring each of the adhering nations, on joining, to deposit in the treasury of the confederation a guaranty for good faith, said guaranty to be in the shape of a negotiable bond for a given amount, which would vary according to the rank of the nation. Charges of failure to comply with the provisions of the constitution would be brought before the juridical body of the confederation, which would decide on the equities of the case, and determine the amount of the penalty to be deducted from the bonds held on deposit. Said bonds would then be sold in the open market and would begin to bear interest from the day on which the verdict would be rendered.

JONES. But would such countries as the United States, France, or Great Britain consent to deposit bonds as a guaranty of their good faith? Would not their mere ratification be sufficient?

WHITE. It appears to me that nations of the standing just named would rather insist upon the deposit of bonds in order to have them serve as a guaranty to insure the good faith of other adherents.

JONES. But supposing trouble arose, and there was a refusal on the part of some adherents to pay, what means would there be for enforcing payment?

WHITE. The bonds, in the first place, could be of such a nature, so secured by collateral, as to insure their interest and principal, thus rendering them negotiable the world over, at any time, whether before, during, or after a war. Their negotiable character would render them the guaranty that they are intended to be.

INTERNATIONAL DEPARTMENTS.

SMITH. But why should the labors of such a confederation be confined to armaments? Why could it not also have under its administrative board departments like those of a national government? In addition to armaments, foreign affairs, war, and the navy, which have already been outlined as within the sphere of the labors of the confederation, why could there not also be international departments of the treasury, of the post office, of agriculture, of commerce, of labor, of transports? Would there not be room for departments like these to deal with the international phases of production and distribution?

WHITE. I think there would be. For instance, the reduced outlay on armament, rendered possible under the confederation, might permit the formation of a federal or international reserve bank under the department of the treasury of the confederation. In this case each of the adherents could periodically deposit in this bank a sum equivalent to a given proportion of the excess amount of its former military and war expenditure. The funds of this bank could then be used for moving crops, for obviating panics, for regulating international exchanges, for constructing international canals, and for other purposes of international public utility.

The International Institute of Agriculture and the International Postal Union are already here, ready to serve the purposes of the confederation, perhaps with added powers and increased duties. Similarly, departments could be formed to deal with the international phases of commerce and of labor, when reciprocal commercial and industrial treaty measures could be placed in their hands, while the department of transports could be intrusted with the international phases of ocean carriage.

However, it might be more advantageous to have the confederation start its work in a very simple and elementary form, so that its routine duties might be more readily mastered. As the work would proceed onward, the capacity for additional service and the benefits to be derived therefrom would become so apparent as to justify expansion until in time its labors would attain a higher and wider efficiency.

WAIT A MOMENT.

JONES. So, then, with a waive of the hand, as it were, we separate the celestial sheep from the plutonic goats; we line up democracy for mortal combat with autocracy, democracy united under an international constitution, united not merely by the devices of war but also by the polite arts of law. This united democracy is to set up a normal standard of armament and to give notice to all the world to line up to this normal under penalties for disobedience, penalties so irksome and costly as to cause autocracy to shrink, shrivel, and perish from off the face of the earth.

But wait! Have we not forgotten something? We talk of sovereignty as the attribute of autocracy, but is it not also claimed as the attribute of democracy? Will imperial England ratify a constitution for a confederation of nations? Will she permit the delegates to the legislative body of the confederation to have the final say as to the strength and disposition of her navy? Shall the powerful American Republic be swayed by the delegates of Cuba, of Montenegro, of Peru, of Portugal? A glorious ambition, surely; but, from a practical approach it is, alas, but a poetical will-o'-the-wisp, a mirage in the desert.

WHITE. It appears to me, Mr. Jones, that you have overlooked the fact that democracies are really autonomous political bodies rather than sovereignties. In a democracy sovereignty is supposed to reside in the people, whereas in an autocracy it is vested in the head of the government; and this makes all the difference in the world.

As for the danger that the delegations of the many minor countries might sway those of the major countries, I think this could be obviated, for the legislative functions of the confederation could be vested in two houses—a house of representatives with a plural vote proportionate to the importance of the country, and a Senate with a fixed vote for each autonomous power.

A LOGICAL OUTCOME.

JONES. And now that all arguments against the proposal have seemingly been overcome, we are presumably ready to put it into operation. The millennium is here; we are at the outer gate; there is nothing to be done but to knock and enter. But wait a moment, a long moment; yes, wait an age, perhaps several ages before the good time will be here. "A place to stand upon, a rest for a fulcrum, a lever long enough," said Archimedes, "and I will lift the earth." And it is just as difficult to move the world of ideas along at a bound as it would be to find a lever long enough to move the earth.

Ideas are shot forth by the hundred, by the thousand, by the million, and yet this staid, old, stupid world refuses to change its course. It prefers to keep the slow, even tenor of its ways, as a respectable world should, rather than to jump forward on the spur of the moment toward a prescribed goal, no matter how earnestly it may be argued, coerced, or coaxed to do so.

There is Christianity, for instance, with its beneficent character, its incessant exhortations, its superhuman efforts, and yet its 2,000 years of striving still fall short of the goal, for we are still waiting for the kingdom on earth as it is in Heaven. Surely all this should teach us to be most modest in putting forth ambitious schemes for the uplifting of the world.

SMITH. Is there not undue stress in your criticism of Mr. White's statement? You tell us that in spite of the millions of ideas that are shot forth, "this staid, old, stupid world refuses to change its course." Is this the case? I think not; for, as we see, development is a weaver employing ideas as warp and woof in weaving the cloth of progress. Now, then, instead of volunteering his presentation as a full-fledged plan, it seems to me that Mr. White's proposal for a confederation of the democracies is rather along the line of a logical outcome, a corollary of our discussion. It would therefore follow that our time may be well spent in continuing our inquiry.

JONES. Well, I must confess that Mr. White's proposed confederation seems reasonable and even logical as an academic proposition; it might read well in essay form. This, however, is one thing; but its adoption by the nations is quite another. The world has been jogging along these thousands of years without any such confederation, and do we soberly suppose that it would all of a sudden be willing to have forced upon it the thousand and one new and untried problems and precedents to which the adoption of this proposal would be sure to give rise?

THE DIFFERENCE BETWEEN 1914 AND 1917.

SMITH. It seems to me that if your question had been asked in the first half of 1914 the answer would have been a decided "no"; the nations would not have been willing to have these new problems and precedents forced upon them. But can nations give this same answer now in 1917? I think not, for during this interval has not the world had a most emphatic object lesson?

We talk of the danger of anarchists; we employ skilled detectives to hunt them from hiding place to hiding place, and when ferreted out we forthwith clap them into jail. But what of those archanarchists, the nations, who, armed to the teeth, and through their claim of sovereignty acknowledging no law but their own will, are such an infinitely greater menace to the peace, the welfare, the security of the people of the whole world?

As I have told you, I was until now one among a large number of advocates of peace through disarmament. Our propaganda, as you know, was much more in evidence before the war. I confess, however, that the war has, as we see, thrown into clear relief many new and perplexing viewpoints, important enough to warrant modifications of opinion. I would therefore feel under obligations to Mr. White if he would resume the thread of the discussion.

WHITE. It has been truly pointed out that the proposals for permanent peace which seemed tenable in 1914 are not tenable in 1917. The new and startling events which have occurred demand new solutions. It is obvious to all that the world is no longer what it then was; that time has passed never to return. The problems of 1914 are no longer the problems which confront us in 1917. The world to-day has had an object lesson, as plain as a kindergarten lesson, a lesson understood not merely by the learned but also by the unlearned.

The millions of dead, the hundreds of millions who suffer and who are to suffer, the destruction of the wealth of nations totaling up to hundreds of billions of dollars, all of these and more besides are the bitter fruits, the direct results of uncontrolled, autocratic sovereignty. And all this is by no means the end, for the war is still going on. And supposing the war were to end right now, would that restore conditions as they were? Let us see.

THE FINANCIAL PROBLEM.

Much surprise was manifested when our Congress had its first billion-dollar session, and, let us bear in mind, that billion dollars was to be expended for the current and peaceful needs of the country. How will it be with the nations after the war, with nations of much more limited financial resources than those of the United States, with nations who will be compelled to provide in their budgets for a billion dollars a year for interest on their war debts before they will be able to set aside a single dollar for their current administrative needs? Will they repudiate? That would lead to trouble. Will they pile tax upon tax? That also would lead to trouble. Will the worker and the peasant rest content to have their unit of wage cut in half or less as the result of taxation and of reduced purchasing power of money?

Such forced reductions may have been accepted by the worker and the peasant of past destructive wars, of the past when worker and peasant had no books to study, no papers to read; when they lived in hovels and were considered to have no spirit and no soul; when the normal dress of man was an overall, a sheepskin coat, and wooden shoes; when the women wore a one-piece smock-dress, went barefooted, and with a kerchief on their heads. But that time has gone, and gone forever. Schools, books, newspapers, travel, and the general freedom of the twentieth century have put an end, a final end, to all that.

Who, then, can say that the mere cessation of the war will bring peace, permanent peace?

And even if sufficient power could be exerted to force a return to the old régime, how long, under such conditions, could peace be maintained? There would then be no more guarantee for peace in the future that there has been in the past.

It therefore seems to me that the formation of a confederation, something on the lines we have been discussing, would mark a new era, would, in fact, make permanent peace possible.

JONES. I am inclined to admit, Mr. White, that the facts in the case justify your generalizations, however gloomy and foreboding they may be. In fact, there is warrant for supplementing them. It is easy to foresee that the evils you speak of will not merely be confined to the theater of war; they will be explosively scattered to the four ends of the earth in the form of violent trade disturbances, panics, bankruptcies, and ruin. Now, this phase of the question is of special interest to the American people. Limiting your reply to this point for the moment I would like you to tell us, Mr. White, how those evils would be averted or brushed aside by the formation of the proposed confederation. If you can show that it would avert them, I have surely been won over.

SMITH. I concur in what has just been said by Mr. Jones.

WHITE. Very good. And now let us first consider what is the underlying basis of financial, commercial, and industrial stability. Is it not credit? Are not the terms of credit, its state of mobility, determined by confidence? And is not this confidence determined by present and forecasted conditions? At this juncture, it is to be noted, the public mind is concentrated upon the current events of the great struggle now going on. Will it not presently be concentrated upon its probable resultant effects? And if the forecast warrant the weakening of confidence, will this not tend to bring about radical and unfavorable changes in the terms and in the state of mobility of credit? And if it brings about these unfavorable changes, as it is bound to do, will this not gravely endanger the financial, commercial, and industrial stability of the whole world?

If we are to assent to all this (and how can assent be denied?) does it not follow that the first thing to be done to avert the full brunt of the evils which loom ahead is to stabilize confidence and thereby stabilize credit? And what better means for doing this can be shown than the proposed confederation? By banding the democracies together to checkmate autocratic sovereignty would not the confederation insure peace? Would it not thereby tend to restore public confidence, and thus insure the stability of credit?

JONES. It seems to me, Mr. White, that your statements are fairly tenable.

SMITH. I am inclined to agree with you, Mr. Jones, although I do not think that we should narrow the case down to the mere question of stability of credit.

THE AGE-LONG STRUGGLE.

WHITE. No, we should not; the question is one of much deeper, more far-reaching concern than the stability of credit. It is a question of the greatest importance to the political freedom of the individual and of the nation. We have to pay too great a price in this century of progress for quiet acquiescence in the destructive, reactionary effects of the dynamic activity of autocratic sovereignty. As we have seen, the cause of the present struggle, as well as of the many struggles of the past, can be unerringly traced to the operation of such sovereignty. Would it not therefore follow that if its dynamic action on the political life of the nations were neutralized, the evils inherent in such autocratic sovereignty would be removed? Would this not remove the greatest spoke in the wheel of the progress and peace of the world? And could not this be done by a militant confederation of the democracies?

And this great battle of democracy against autocracy is not new. It is as old as the history of man. It is the age-long struggle of law, of equity, of freedom, against anarchy, injustice, and slavery. It is the index finger pointing the way on the one hand and the savage, spiked club raised to strike, on the other. It stands for liberty, equality, fraternity, as against tyranny, inequality, and enmity. It stands for intelligence and light on the one hand, and for ignorance and darkness on the other. The first stands for abundance, for a blessing; the second stands for deprivation, for a curse. The first stands for humanity, the second stands for savagery. And so have these two always stood and fought, with the former seemingly the vanquished in many a fight. Yet, notwithstanding, there has been advance, and the advance has been by the former, by democracy, for so it was planned in the Divine Comedy. And presently the combat shall cease, and there shall be but one combatant left, and that combatant shall be triumphant democracy, and he shall be left free to build up the Kingdom on earth as it is in Heaven.

JONES. May that day soon come!

SMITH. Amen.

Therefore it is written: "Our Father and our King, we have no sovereign but Thee."

Food Control.

SPEECH

OF

HON. DICK T. MORGAN,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

The House had under consideration the report of the committee of conference on the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the House is about to take a final vote on H. R. 4961, commonly known as the food-control bill. It is entitled "A bill to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products."

This bill passed the House June 23, 1917. It passed the Senate July 21 following. The Senate made some important amendments to the bill. Following the usual parliamentary practice, a conference committee of the two Houses was appointed, with a view to adjusting the differences between the two Houses. The conference committee came to an agreement, and upon the report of this committee the House is now about to vote.

I discussed the provisions of this bill when it was before the House. Some of my remarks were in the nature of criticism. I offered some amendments and urged their adoption. My object was not to delay or defeat the passage of the bill. My purpose was to perfect the bill and make it a more efficient law and more helpful to the American people in the emergency with which they are now confronted. Having thus discharged my duty, I voted for the bill on its final passage in the House, and for the same reason I shall vote for the measure in the form in which it comes from the conference committee and in the form in which it will become a law.

This is a war measure. By its terms it will continue in force only for the duration of the war. It is an emergency measure. It is designed to enable us not only to win the war, but to achieve a victory in the shortest time possible.

It will be generally admitted that the provisions of this bill may work a hardship upon some people and that some people may suffer financial loss thereby. But no nation can carry on a war without sacrifice on the part of its citizens. Those who suffer financial loss give nothing compared with those who offer their lives on the altar of their country.

GOVERNMENT CONTROL.

I wish to present a brief outline of this bill, and in doing so will quote freely from its provisions.

Section 1 of the bill in full is as follows:

Be it enacted, etc., That by reason of the existence of a state of war, it is essential to the national security and defense, for the successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of the Army and Navy, to assure an adequate supply and equitable distribution, and to facilitate the movement of foods, feeds, fuel, including fuel oil and natural gas, and fertilizer and fertilizer ingredients, tools, utensils, implements, machinery, and equipment required for the actual production of foods, feeds and fuel, hereafter in this act called necessaries; to prevent, locally or generally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulations, and private controls, affecting such supply, distribution, and movement; and to establish and maintain governmental control of such necessaries during the war. For such purposes the instrumentalities, means, methods, powers, authorities, duties, obligations, and prohibitions hereinafter set forth are created, established, conferred, and prescribed. The President is authorized to make such regulations and to issue such orders as are essential effectively to carry out the provisions of this act.

HOARDING, WASTE, AND MONOPOLY UNLAWFUL.

Section 4 is directed mainly against waste, hoarding, and monopoly in foods, feeds, and fuel, and in full is as follows:

SEC. 4. That it is hereby made unlawful for any person willfully to destroy any necessaries for the purpose of enhancing the price or restricting the supply thereof; knowledge to commit waste or willfully to permit preventable deterioration of any necessaries in or in connection with their production, manufacture, or distribution; to hoard, as defined in section 6 of this act, any necessaries; to monopolize or attempt to monopolize, either locally or generally, any necessaries; to engage in any discriminatory and unfair, or any deceptive or wasteful practice or device, or to make any unjust or unreasonable rate or charge, in handling or dealing in or with any necessaries; to conspire, combine, agree, or arrange with any other person (a) to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, harvesting, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries; (b) to restrict the supply of any necessaries; (c) to restrict distribution of any necessaries; (d) to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of any necessaries in order to enhance the price thereof; or (e) to exact excessive prices for any necessaries or to aid or abet the doing of any act made unlawful by this section.

PRESIDENT MAY REQUIRE LICENSE.

Section 5 gives the President power, when he deems it essential, to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, and the section in full is as follows:

SEC. 5. That from time to time, whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act, and shall publicly so announce, no person shall, after a date fixed in the announcement, engaged in or carry on any such business specified in the announcement of importation, manufacture, storage, mining, or distribution of any necessaries as set forth in such announcement, unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. The President is authorized to issue such licenses and to prescribe regulations for the issuance of licenses and requirements for systems of accounts and auditing of accounts to be kept by licensees, submission of reports by them, with or without oath or affirmation, and the entry and inspection by the President's duly authorized agents of the places of business of licensees. Whenever the President shall find that any storage charge, commission, profit, or practice of any licensee is unjust, or unreasonable, or discriminatory and unfair, or wasteful, and shall order such licensee, within a reasonable time fixed in the order to discontinue the same, unless such order, which shall recite the facts found, is revoked or suspended, such licensee shall, within the time prescribed in the order, discontinue such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice. The President may, in lieu of any such unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, find what is a just, reasonable, nondiscriminatory, and fair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, and in any proceeding brought in any court such order of the President shall be prima facie evidence. Any person who, without a license issued pursuant to this section, or whose license shall have been revoked, knowingly engages in or carries on any business for which a license is required under this section, or willfully fails or refuses to discontinue any unjust, unreasonable, discriminatory, and unfair storage charge, commission, profit, or practice, in accordance with the requirement of an order issued under this section, or any regulation prescribed under this section, shall, upon conviction thereof, be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000 or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided, That this section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, cooperative association of farmers or gardeners, including live-stock farmers, or other persons with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other land owned, leased, or cultivated by him, nor to any retailer with respect to the retail business actually conducted by him, nor to any common carrier, nor shall anything in this section be construed to authorize the fixing or imposition of a duty or tax upon any article imported into or exported from the United States or any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia: Provided further, That for the purposes of this act a retailer shall be deemed to be a person, copartnership, firm, corporation, or association not engaging in the wholesale business whose gross sales do not exceed $100,000 per annum.

PENALTIES FOR WASTE, HOARDING, AND MONOPOLY.

Sections 6, 7, 8, and 9, in the main, relate to penalties which are prescribed against those who are guilty of wasting, hoarding, or monopolizing necessaries.

REQUISITION OF FOODS, FEEDS, AND FUELS.

The President is authorized to requisition foods, feeds, and fuels in section 10, which, in part, is as follows:

That the President is authorized from time to time to requisition foods, feeds, fuels, and other supplies necessary to the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy or any other public use connected with the common defense, and to requisition, or otherwise provide, storage facilities for such supplies; and he shall ascertain and pay a just compensation therefor.

PRESIDENT MAY PURCHASE AND SELL NECESSARIES.

Section 11 provides, in part, as follows:

That the President is authorized from time to time to purchase, to store, to provide storage facilities for, and to sell for cash, at reasonable prices, wheat, flour, meal, beans, and potatoes: Provided, That if any minimum price shall have been theretofore fixed, pursuant to the provisions of section 14 of this act, then the price paid for any such articles so purchased shall not be less than such minimum price.

PRESIDENT MAY REQUISITION FACTORIES PRODUCING NECESSARIES.

Section 12, in part, provides as follows:

That whenever the President shall find it necessary to secure an adequate supply of necessaries for the support of the Army or the maintenance of the Navy, or for any other public use connected with the common defense, he is authorized to requisition and take over, for use or operation by the Government, any factory, packing house, oil pipe line, mine, or other plant, or any part thereof, in or through which any necessaries are or may be manufactured, produced, prepared, or mined, and to operate the same.

PRESIDENT MAY PROHIBIT SPECULATION.

Section 13 in part is as follows:

SEC. 13. That whenever the President finds it essential in order to prevent undue enhancement, depression, or fluctuation of prices of, or in order to prevent injurious speculation in, or in order to prevent unjust market manipulation or unfair and misleading market quotations of the prices of necessaries, hereafter in this section called evil practices, he is authorized to prescribe such regulations governing, or may either wholly or partly prohibit, operations, practices, and transactions at, on, in, or under the rules of any exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business as he may find essential in order to prevent, correct, or remove such evil practices. Such regulations may require all persons coming within their provisions to keep such records and statements of account, and may require such persons to make such returns, verified under oath or otherwise, as will fully and correctly disclose all transactions at, in, or on, or under the rules of any such exchange, board of trade, or similar institution or place of business, including the making, execution, settlement, and fulfillment thereof.

MINIMUM PRICE OF WHEAT.

Section 14 is practically the only provision of the bill which in a direct manner encourages increased production of necessaries, and this relates to only one farm product, namely, wheat. This section in full is as follows:

SEC. 14. That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of the production of wheat and that it is essential that the producers of wheat produced within the United States, shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for wheat, in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit. The President shall thereupon fix such guaranteed price for each of the official grain standards for wheat as established under the United States grain standards act, approved August 11, 1916. The President shall from time to time establish and promulgate such regulations as he shall deem wise in connection with such guaranteed prices, and in particular governing conditions of delivery and payment, and differences in price for the several standard grades in the principal primary markets of the United States, adopting No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at the principal interior primary markets as the basis. Thereupon the Government of the United States hereby guarantees every producer of wheat produced within the United States that, upon compliance by him with the regulations prescribed, he shall receive for any wheat produced in reliance upon this guaranty within the period, not exceeding 18 months, prescribed in the notice, a price not less than the guaranteed price therefor as fixed pursuant to this section. In such regulations the President shall prescribe the terms and conditions upon which any such producer shall be entitled to the benefits of such guaranty. The guaranteed prices for the several standard grades of wheat for the crop of 1918 shall be based upon No. 1 northern spring or its equivalent at not less than $2 per bushel at the principal interior primary markets. This guaranty shall not be dependent upon the action of the President under the first part of this section, but is hereby made absolute and shall be binding until May 1, 1919. When the President finds that the importation into the United States of any wheat produced outside of the United States materially enhances or is likely materially to enhance the liabilities of the United States under guaranties of prices therefor made pursuant to this section, and ascertains what rate of duty, added to the then existing rate of duty on wheat and to the value of wheat at the time of importation, would be sufficient to bring the price thereof at which imported up to the price fixed therefor pursuant to the foregoing provisions of this section, he shall proclaim such facts, and thereafter there shall be levied, collected, and paid upon wheat when imported, in addition to the then existing rate of duty, the rate of duty so ascertained; but in no case shall any such rate of duty be fixed at an amount which will effect a reduction of the rate of duty upon wheat under any then existing tariff law of the United States. For the purpose of making any guaranteed price effective under this section, or whenever he deems it essential in order to protect the Government of the United States against material enhancement of its liabilities arising out of any guaranty under this section, the President is authorized also, in his discretion, to purchase any wheat for which a guaranteed price shall be fixed under this section, and to hold, transport, or store it, or to sell, dispose of, and deliver the same to any citizen of the United States or to any Government engaged in war with any country with which the Government of the United States is or may be at war, or to use the same as supplies for any department or agency of the Government of the United States. Any moneys received by the United States from or in connection with the sale or disposal of wheat under this section may, in the discretion of the President, be used as a revolving fund for further carrying out the purposes of this section. Any balance of such moneys not used as part of such revolving fund shall be covered into the Treasury as miscellaneous receipts.

PROHIBITION OF DISTILLED SPIRITS.

Section 15 relates to use of foods and feeds in the production of distilled spirits and malt and vinous liquors, and in full is as follows:

SEC. 15. That from and after 30 days from the date of the approval of this act no foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds shall be used in the production of distilled spirits for beverage purposes: Provided, That under such rules, regulations, and bonds as the President may prescribe such materials may be used in the production of distilled spirits exclusively for other than beverage purposes, or for the fortification of pure sweet wines as defined by the act entitled "An act to increase the revenue, and for other purposes," approved September 8, 1916. Nor shall there be imported into the United States any distilled spirits. Whenever the President shall find that limitation, regulation, or prohibition of the use of foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors for beverage purposes, or that reduction of the alcoholic content of any such malt or vinous liquor, is essential, in order to assure an adequate and continuous supply of food, or that the national security and defense will be subserved thereby, he is authorized, from time to time, to prescribe and give public notice of the extent of the limitation, regulation, prohibition, or reduction so necessitated. Whenever such notice shall have been given and shall remain unrevoked no person shall, after a reasonable time prescribed in such notice, use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or import any such liquors except under license issued by the President and in compliance with rules and regulations determined by him governing the production and importation of such liquors and the alcoholic content thereof. Any person who willfully violates the provisions of this section, or who shall use any foods, fruits, food materials, or feeds in the production of malt or vinous liquors, or who shall import any such liquors, without first obtaining a license so to do when a license is required under this section, or who shall violate any rule or regulation made under this section, shall be punished by a fine not exceeding $5,000, or by imprisonment for not more than two years, or both: Provided further, That nothing in this section shall be construed to authorize the licensing of the manufacture of vinous or malt liquors in any State, Territory, or the District of Columbia, or any civil subdivision thereof, where the manufacture of such vinous or malt liquor is prohibited.

Section 16 authorizes and directs the President to commandeer any or all distilled spirits in bond or in stock at the date of the approval of the act for redistillation, in so far as such redistillation may be necessary for the manufacture of munitions or other military and hospital supplies.

Section 17 applies to penalties for those who obstruct enforcement of the act.

Section 18 appropriates $2,500,000 to be used in carrying the act into effect in the payment of salaries, rents, and so forth.

Section 19 appropriates $150,000,000 to carry this act into effect.

PRESIDENT MAY FIX PRICE OF COAL AND COKE.

Section 25 authorizes the President to fix the price of coal and coke, and in part is as follows:

SEC. 25. That the President of the United States shall be, and he is hereby, authorized and empowered, whenever and wherever in his judgment necessary for the efficient prosecution of the war, to fix the price of coal and coke, wherever and whenever sold, either by producer or dealer, to establish rules for the regulation of and to regulate the method of production, sale, shipment, distribution, apportionment, or storage thereof among dealers and consumers, domestic or foreign; said authority and power may be exercised by him in each case through the agency of the Federal Trade Commission during the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

That if, in the opinion of the President, any such producer or dealer fails or neglects to conform to such prices or regulations, or to conduct his business efficiently under the regulations and control of the President as aforesaid, or conducts it in a manner prejudicial to the public interest, then the President is hereby authorized and empowered in every such case to requisition and take over the plant, business, and all appurtenances thereof belonging to such producer or dealer as a going concern, and to operate or cause the same to be operated in such manner and through such agency as he may direct during the period of the war or for such part of said time as in his judgment may be necessary.

That any producer or dealer whose plant, business, and appurtenances shall have been requisitioned or taken over by the President shall be paid a just compensation for the use thereof during the period that the same may be requisitioned or taken over as aforesaid, which compensation the President shall fix or cause to be fixed by the Federal Trade Commission.

In the foregoing I have quoted in full what I regard as the most important provisions of this bill.

In passing upon this bill we must keep in mind the fact that it is a war measure. Its object is to make this great Nation more efficient, capable, and powerful in waging the existing war to a successful conclusion. It is clearly within the possibilities that some of our citizenship, under the provisions of this law, will suffer inconvenience, financial loss, or other hardships. This can not be avoided. It is one of the incidents of war. Indeed, in war some are called upon to sacrifice everything for the public good, while others not only make no sacrifice but actually receive financial benefits therefrom. All we can do is to use our best judgment, seek to distribute the burdens of the war as equitably as possible, and require no one to make a needless sacrifice.

While all this is true, as Representatives in the Congress of the United States, while having in view the general welfare and the stupendous national problems with which we are confronted, we should also bear in mind the welfare of our constituents. We should consider how proposed legislation will affect them. None of us would be justified in remaining silent if, in our judgment, a proposed measure would do an injustice to our constituents or the people of our respective States.

So far as this bill seeks to cut out speculation in food products and other necessaries of life, it has my unqualified approval. It is the duty of Congress to eliminate middlemen's profits and to place the producer and consumer in as close proximity as possible. The farmers, in my opinion, have no inclination to exact exorbitant prices from the consumers. But the farmers, and justly so, do object to undue profits of the corporation, which, as middlemen, control the purchase, transportation, manufacture, distribution, and sale of their products. The farmers believe all such charges and profits should be reduced to the minimum. In this the views of the farmers are based upon sound economic principles, which are clearly in harmony with the general good.

It is the widespread belief of the farmer that for some years past he has not received his share of the value of his products. He has contended that he did not receive a fair and equitable share of the wealth he produces. In this contention the farmer is undoubtedly right. The average prices which the farmer has been receiving for his products have not been sufficient to compensate him for the capital invested, the labor performed by himself and family, the uncertainty of his business through failure of crops, and the ever-increasing expenditure in the cost of production. As a result, the agricultural wealth of the country has not grown in proportion to the growth of wealth in the towns and cities. If I had the time, I could clearly demonstrate this by official statistics. But I will assert that three-fourths of the wealth of the country is in our towns and cities, where our great manufacturing, transportation, distributing, and financial corporations center.

The point is this: The great European war has made an unusual demand for farm products. This has enhanced their prices. The farmer has been getting some of the benefits of these higher prices, but it has been shown that last year only a part of the farmers received the high prices for their wheat. The greatest rise in the price came after the majority of the farmers had sold their wheat. It has been asserted that for the 1916 wheat crop the farmers of the United States, on an average, received but $1.22 a bushel for their wheat. This in face of the fact that recently corporations, middlemen, and speculators have been getting $3 a bushel for wheat. This is one great evil at which Congress should strike. I am glad that there are some provisions in this bill which will very largely eliminate the power of the speculator to reap enormous profits from both the producer and consumer; but in taking the control of the price of wheat and other necessaries away from the corporations, middlemen, and speculators we have to place the control somewhere else. This bill places that control in the hands of the President. We must assume that the farmer will be safer in the hands of the Chief Executive of the Nation, who will have no selfish purpose to serve, than they will in the hands of private corporations which are organized and operated for gain and which certainly are not prompted by any altruistic purpose.

There are two sections of the bill of great importance to the farmers. These are sections 11 and 14. Under section 11 the President is given power to go into the wheat business. The bill appropriates $150,000,000 as capital to be used in conducting this business. Other sections of the bill give him power to license all dealers in wheat and other necessaries. Under this he can control all the dealers. It is well understood that our European allies—England, France, Italy, and Russia—will have a single purchasing agency. The President may create such instrumentalities as he shall deem necessary to carry out the act. He may have a great corporation organized to conduct this business. In other words, this bill places in the hands of the President the most comprehensive and sweeping power. He may monopolize the business and thereby dictate the prices the farmers receive, the charges and profits of corporations and middlemen of all kinds, and the prices to the consumers. In ordinary times no one would think of placing such extraordinary and supreme power in the hands of one man, however pure, great, and wise he might be. But these are not ordinary times. Our allies must be fed. Our soldiers, seamen, and marines must have food. The great masses of our citizens at home must have the necessaries of life. To all the price should be within the ability of the consumer to pay. We are going to trust the President with this power. By constitutional methods he has been exalted to the Chief Executiveship of this great Nation. Under the Constitution he is the Commander in Chief of the Army and Navy. He is at the head of both the civil and miltary power of the Republic. I do not believe the power intrusted to him will be abused. It will, in my judgment, be exercised in a loyal, patriotic, and unselfish spirit, with an eye single to the public welfare.

Section 14 of this bill is one of great interest to thousands of my constituents. In the 12 counties of my district wheat is the chief product. It may be truly said that all my constituents are vitally interested in the price of wheat, for the prosperity of my people depends largely upon the amount of wheat produced and the price paid therefor. Section 12 fixes $2 as the minimum guaranteed price for the wheat crop of 1918. The chief object of this guarantee is to stimulate the production of a large wheat crop next year by guaranteeing to producers a price that will pay them to produce the wheat. No one knows what one year will bring about. The war may close when least we expect it. We do not know what the business and financial conditions will be next year. Business conditions may be disturbed. There may be a depression in commercial and financial affairs. Hard times may be on us before we know it. A panic may demoralize everything. We can not with any certainty say what will be the price of wheat in 1918, should peace come to the warring nations of the world. In this view, farmers might hesitate to sow wheat. At least, there might be no material increase in the acreage sown. But, whatever might come, it is certain that there should be an increased yield of wheat next year. To stimulate this increased production of wheat and insure the farmers against loss Congress proposes to guarantee the farmers $2 a bushel for the 1918 crop. So far as the law is concerned, this does not limit the price to $2 per bushel. The farmers may receive a higher price if the market price is higher. Inasmuch as the market price of wheat has ranged from $2.50 to $3 per bushel in recent months, I think it would have been wise to have made the guaranteed minimum price compare favorably with the market price. This as a matter of fair compensation and justice to the farmers, but, beyond this, as the best means to accomplish the purpose we have in view. The object is to insure increased production. If we fail in that object, our legislation is fruitless. We had better fix the price too high than too low. If the guaranteed price is above the market price and even above what consumers should pay, the Government could well afford to suffer the loss, if such a thing is necessary to secure an adequate supply of bread. For upon this depends the winning of the war. We are spending vast billions of dollars for war purposes. In this respect we are surpassing all records of the past in this or any other nation. Suppose the Government loses even a large sum through its guarantee, it will have supplied one of the essentials to victory for our country.

I do not approve this bill in its entirety. I have some doubts about the wisdom of some of its provisions. I think it could be improved. With all this I shall give it my vote. In times like these we can not stand idle. We must master the situation the best we can. We must trust something to the judgment of others. We must trust the constituted authorities of the Nation. We must each bear our share of the burdens of the hour and make whatever sacrifice the circumstances and conditions demand.

There is one advantage which I think the farmers of the Nation will reap from the enactment of this law. We are establishing a system of governmental control of middlemen's profits. We are taking from corporations which have a monopoly in the purchase, sale, transportation, distribution, and manufacture of staple farm products the power to arbitrarily fix the prices which they pay to farmers and at which they sell to consumers. We have been driven to this by the exigencies of war. But we will never entirely retrace our steps. Neither the farmers nor the consumers will ever consent to go back to the old system. Stable prices will help both the farmers and the consumers. Speculators should never again be in a position to depress the price the farmers receive and enhance the price the consumers pay. Certainly those who are engaged in purchasing, selling, transporting, manufacturing, and distributing food products should receive adequate compensation. None will begrudge or deny them a reasonable profit. They are entitled to a reasonable return for the service they render, for the risks they carry, and for the capital they invest. But they ought not to be able to speculate in food products at the cost of both producers and consumers, and to the injury of the public generally. They should not have the power to exact exorbitant profits and to accumulate immense fortunes at the expense of the masses, upon whose prosperity, well-being, and happiness the strength and perpetuity of the Nation depends. Hereafter we must know where the money goes. We must know how the wealth produced on our farms is distributed. We must be able to trace our food products and determine the cost of every stage of progress from the field to the table of the consumers. Under the law we are now enacting grain dealers and food manufacturers may be compelled to do business under Federal license, subject to supervision, regulation, and control. They may be compelled to do business under a limitation of profits. All this, under the proposed law, is to be limited to the duration of the existing war. But our experience in war will teach us how to act in peace. The American people will not go backward. They will not forget the practical lessons which they have learned in the school of war. The farmers, in my judgment, may suffer some financial loss under the provisions of this bill as they shall be administered. But as an offset to these losses there will be benefits, advantages, and profits to the farmers. The intelligent and patriotic farmers will give close attention to the practical workings of this measure. It is for them to see that the good features shall be preserved and be made the permanent policy of the National Government for the extension of agriculture, for the protection of the rights of farmers, and the promotion of their prosperity, and for the advancement of the material interests and the general welfare of all classes of our population.

Food-Survey Bill.

SPEECH
HON. DICK T. MORGAN,
OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4188) to provide further for the national security and defense by stimulating agriculture and facilitating the distribution of agricultural products.

Mr. MORGAN. Mr. Speaker, the committee on conference appointed by the two Houses to harmonize the differences on this bill between the two Houses has agreed to one Senate amendment which does not meet my approval. Under the provisions of the House bill, H. R. 4188, known as the food-survey bill, $5,778,000 were appropriated, to be used by the Secretary of Agriculture in furnishing seed to farmers in restricted areas, to be selected by the Secretary of Agriculture. Under the provisions of the bill, as it passed the House, the Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to furnish these seeds to farmers on such terms and on such credit as he should determine. This was a very wise provision. The object of the provision, of course, was to increase the production of food products. This was unquestionably a practical method of increasing production. The framers of the bill evidently recognized that there were certain sections of the country in which there would be a practical failure of certain crops, and especially of wheat. They recognized that seed wheat this year would be exceedingly high, and that the cost of the seed is a very important item in the cost of production of wheat. It was known at the time this bill passed the House, as it is known to-day, that in western Oklahoma, in western Kansas, and in the western part of Nebraska, North Dakota, and South Dakota there were large areas where there was an almost complete failure of wheat.

The appropriation provided in the House bill, it is true, was not large. Indeed, it was insignificantly small. Still it was large enough to have rendered very considerable assistance in the drouth-stricken area. I had hoped that the Senate would very largely increase the appropriation. To my utter surprise and disappointment the Senate reduced the amount of the appropriation from $5,778,000 to $2,500,000, less than half the amount appropriated by the House. This, in my judgment, was a very grave mistake. But the reduction of the appropriation was not so great a blunder as the other change made. This change, which I especially criticize, is the change which requires the Secretary of Agriculture to sell wheat or other seed to farmers only on cash payment therefor. Under the terms of the bill as it passed the House the Secretary of Agriculture was authorized to give the farmers such credit as in his judgment would be wise, proper, and helpful in accomplishing the purposes of the act. I wish, therefore, with all due respect to the conferees of the two Houses, to express my strong disapproval of the provisions which reduce the appropriation by more than half, and in addition thereto takes from the Secretary of Agriculture the authority to furnish the seed to farmers on credit. I know this will be a great disappointment to the farmers in many localities, who will be compelled to borrow money at high rates of interest, on unfavorable terms, with which to purchase seed wheat. What must necessarily follow? It is this: There will be less wheat sown. It is not, therefore, solely in the interest of the farmer that I am speaking. I am speaking in the interest of the country. I am speaking for the Nation. I am advocating a policy which means a greater production of the great staple crop of wheat. Bread is the one thing above all others that this Nation needs, and that our allies in Europe need, to enable us to win this war. I believe that one of the most effective things this Government could have done to increase the production of wheat for next year would have been to have made a liberal provision to provide credit for the needy farmers of the United States in purchasing seeds. It was for this reason that I offered an amendment to the food-control bill—H. R. 4961—when it was before the House, authorizing the Federal Government to make liberal loans to the farmers at a low rate of interest to enable them to purchase seeds and secure necessary equipment to enable them to largely increase the production of food products. I regret exceedingly that my suggestions have not been followed. The inevitable result will be, there will be less wheat and corn and other staple farm products produced, and the country and the farmers alike will suffer.

Workingmen's Red Cross Celebration at Johnstown, Pa.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOHN M. ROSE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Tuesday, October 2, 1917.

Mr. MADDEN. I ask that the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] be given unanimous consent to extend his remarks in the RECORD by printing a patriotic speech made by Theodore Roosevelt at Johnstown on Sunday last and the remarks made by the gentleman from Pennsylvania [Mr. ROSE] in introducing him to the meeting.

Mr. ROSE. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include a part of the speech of the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt at the Workingmen's Red Cross celebration at Johnstown, Pa., on Sunday, September 31, and my introductory remarks:

INTRODUCTORY REMARKS BY MR. ROSE.

Let me first express my most sincere thanks for the distinguished honor which has been conferred upon me to-day. I appreciate it more than any words of mine can convey.

I rejoice to witness this general outpouring of the people of Johnstown and vicinity. You are here to take part in a demonstration primarily designed by the splendid workingmen of this district to make known, in part, the purposes and aims of the Red Cross, an organization formed to give aid and comfort to the weak and sorrowful, and which will give assistance to the brave men who have volunteered and have been called by our country and her allies to take part in the greatest war the world has ever known.

On behalf of the splendid body of workingmen of this vicinity, I desire to extend a cordial welcome to this vast concourse of people, as your presence indicates your abiding faith in the Government and its institutions and your loyalty to the brave men and women who will lay down their lives, if need be, in the titanic struggle for freedom and democracy and the utter, complete, and permanent overthrow of an autocracy now the greatest curse of the world.

This day marks the crowning event of the marvelous efforts made by our people in the interest of our country, and it will go down in history as one of the greatest and most significant days ever witnessed by the good people of the valley of the Conemaugh.

Above and beyond the purpose which brings you here, a purpose nearest and dearest to our hearts, the committee having this demonstration in charge have wisely and well arranged for the presence of the leading private citizen of the United States, if not of the world, to talk to and with us and spur us on to yet greater achievements.

Not only is he the leading private citizen of the United States, but he is easily the most fearless and convincing, and occupies a unique position among the great big men of the world.

Characteristic of this remarkable man, when the President approved a resolution of the Congress declaring that a state of war exists between the United States and the Imperial German Government, he offered his services to his country and expressed his willingness to accompany the first American troops to the bleeding soil of France.

In order that you may see and hear and know this remarkable man, of whose brilliant attainments I have named but few, I now have the pleasure of introducing to you the great, the only, the matchless, and as the Tribune so well and tersely said, the acknowledged champion of vital Americanism, the Hon. Theodore Roosevelt.

SPEECH OF THEODORE ROOSEVELT.

Mr. Congressman, Mr. Mayor, and you, my friends, fellow Americans, men and women of Johnstown:

As I said just before the rain and the parade, I had not intended when I went West to speak anywhere on the way back, but when I was asked to speak by the labor unions of Johnstown, I felt that they were people that I was not willing to refuse, because this war is from a double aspect peculiarly a war of the workingmen of the United States, first, as Americans, and next, as men who believe in the words of Abraham Lincoln, that the highest ideal of government is "government of the people, for the people, and by the people." [Applause.] Now, the emphasis in that statement is to be put upon the words "by the people." There always has got to be government of the people; either we have to govern ourselves or somebody else will govern us. Somebody else will come in and supply the lack. There has got to be control somewhere. There must be self-control or outside control, and the least control we get from within the more we will get from without.

Now, Bismarck's statement represents the German ideal, and on the third point is the direct opposite of Lincoln's. Lincoln said a "government of the people, for the people, and by the people." Bismarck said a government of the people must be based on the theory of "everything for the people but nothing by them." No government can last for a very long time on that basis. They never last permanently. In the end the people, those who say there is to be no government by the people, get to doing less and less and less for the people. Now, the two opposite poles in the civilized world to-day, since the destruction of the Russian despotism, are the two ideals—the ideal of the Prussianized Germany of the Hohenzollerns and the ideal of the United States, the Government that is striving to be true to the theories of Washington and of Lincoln. The opposite ideals are symbolized, are expressed well in the two phrases that I have quoted—Lincoln's government for the people and by the people and Bismarck's government, of which the essential feature was "nothing by the people." Bismarck said "do everything for the people that will not interfere with your interests, but do it as a favor to them—not as a right due them, but as a favor wisely extended to them." Now, that is just what we do not believe in. We stand for the democratic principle; we stand for making this Government a Government in which each man has a fair show and in which each man does his part in governing all of us. We do not realize the idea in many respects, but that is simply another way of saying we are human. There never has been, and I do not think there will be, a complete realization of the ideal on this earth, but we do strive toward the ideal.

The German ideal is that complete power is to rest in the people above, and that they, as a matter of expedience and self-interest, offer to give something to the people below.

Now, my friends, that means that this is just exactly as much a people's war as the war for the Union which began in 1861, 56 years ago. In the long run it was not going to be possible in this country to have side by side a black man who worked as a slave and a white man who worked as a freeman, and in the States where there were most slaves gradually the white man was crowded out and became a poor white of the mountains. The same thing began in the West Indies—I was there a year ago last winter. Originally they had a population of farmers, mechanics, artisans, and they introduced black slavery, and the first effect was to crowd out the white workingman, until you had nothing but the big plantation owner on top and the hundreds of black slaves underneath. Now, here in this country Lincoln with his prophetic vision saw that not only was it a justice to the black to free him but that the enslavement of the black was not compatible permanently with the freedom of the white world. It is just the same in the world to-day. Just as it was not possible that the men who work with their hands—whether on a farm, railroad, in a mine, in a factory—could permanently prosper in a country which tolerated black slavery, so it is not possible that the workingman and the farmers who own the soil they till can permanently enjoy their own political freedom and the right to rule their own destinies in this country if the world is to be dominated by Prussian militarism. Remember that the essential part of Lincoln's statement, as I have already said, to be found in the part of the phrase which sets forth that this Government is to be by the people themselves. Every man in this country who believes in the American doctrines for which our fathers and forefathers struggled, and for which many men have laid down their lives, must see the vast difference between us and our allies on the one side and the Prussianized Germany of the Hohenzollerns on the other—an absolute, fundamental difference.

Now, friends, of course, we went to war primarily because we had a special grievance against Germany. We went to war because after two years, during which Germany had treated us with such utter contempt that she murdered our citizens, men, women, and children, on the high seas again and again, and after two years of interchange of compliments she finally announced that she was going to continue that policy as a settled universal policy, and that it was to be continued steadily as part of her theory of warfare—murder of noncombatants on the high seas.

And yet there are people who ask, "Why are we at war?"

You may just as well ask a man whose wife's face has been slapped by another man why he is mixing it up with the other man. There are some things that do not need an explanation. If I see a man thumping another and I find that the other is a black hander who tried to kidnap his child, I do not say, "Why are you using violence?" I say, "Go to it!"

A nation that will not defend its women and children from murder is not fit to be called a nation at all. As you know, I would have acted after the Lusitania. And according to my view, people can ask why we did not act then, but no man in his senses can ask why we have acted now. For if I ever meet one of those gentlemen I think of a man who has kicked another, who has pulled his nose, and who spat in his face, and he says, "Beware, lest you go too far and rouse the lion."

We have heard a good deal about the conscientious objectors. While I suppose there are real conscientious objectors, most of them are timid creatures who do not want to be shot at. There are real conscientious objectors and I respect their consciences, but I would find out what their consciences meant. If they say they do not want to take life, I would say, "All right, I will put you on a mine-sweeping job out in the ocean, that requires that you sweep up mines. The mines are liable to be blown off when they are swept up." I would say, "Now, you are not in danger of killing anybody, but I won't guarantee your own life." Now, if he is really conscientious about killing anybody he won't object to that.

That is all right. I would treat him just as well as I would anybody else. But if he won't do anything to help the men who are helping this country, then I would say, "All right, you needn't fight for the country, but in that case you shan't vote in the country."

Universal suffrage must be justified by universal service. If ye will not work ye shall not eat. And in the same way, the men who won't fight for the country, aren't fit to live in the country, which, in a last resort, can only be saved by the sacrifices of the men of it, vast as it may be.

Now, the "shadow Hun" takes many different phases. Sometimes he advocates Germany out and out, and sometimes he screams for peace, peace, with a tremor in his voice. Sometimes he attacks one of our allies, usually England. Now, it happens that I have almost no English blood in me. I have a little. I am an English Quaker. I haven't all the characteristics of the Quaker. Now, gentlemen, we represent in this country the melting pot, the crucible of the nations. We are a new country. We represent many, many different races, and the Congressman who introduced me did so much more flattering than I deserved, but at least I can claim to be an American in this respect, that I am a part of the crucible. I represent the melting of the many different races here into one. My people were here before the Revolution, and at that time there were some German people driven out in the reign of Louis XIV, who ravaged them according to the principles of schrecklichkeit. There were some Dutch traders and mechanics in New York; some lowland Scotch farmers here in Pennsylvania, and Frenchmen who had been driven out of France because there the Catholics were persecuting the Protestants, and Irish who had been driven out of Ireland because there the Protestants were persecuting the Catholics, and then there were some Welsh-English Quakers, and if those people had not become Americans and intermarried, I wouldn't be here.

Now, if I wanted to be hyphenated I couldn't, because it would mean seven hyphens. What is true of me now is going to be true of the average American citizen in the future. We represent a new nation, one that will be blood akin to, but separate from, every other nation of Europe. If our people tried to remain separate, if they tried to remain Irishman, German, or Frenchman, all they will do will be not to become Americans; they will simply lose all chances of sharing in the great heritage that is ours. We welcome in this country men of whatever creed or wherever born, who are content to come here and be straight American and nothing else. And if they do so and act in that way, then shame on the man who discriminates against them. But if they come here and assume the "Lot's wife" attitude and are looking back all the time to the country from which they came, then the sooner they are turned into pillars of salt the better. There isn't any room here for an American who is half an American and half something else. There is no room here for a "fifty-fifty" allegiance. Either he is an American and nothing else or he isn't an American at all, and in that case I wish we could ship him back.

The usual attack made by the pro-German who does not quite venture to be anti-American is, as I say, anti-English. One hundred and forty years ago and a little over 100 years ago my people fought the English. Usually these people who talk about it have not done anything but talk about it. My people fought the English. They did not fight the English because it was England; they fought her because she was wrong; they fought her because they were good Americans; they fought her because they were standing up for liberty here. King George and the England of that day maltreated America, and the Americans signed the Declaration of Independence, and the most of those who signed the Declaration of Independence were of English blood and made this a separate Union. King George and the English in 1776 had not begun to inflict upon us the wrongs that during the past three years have been inflicted upon us by the Prussianized Germany of the Hohenzollerns. The "Shadow Huns" of to-day are the heirs, the spiritual heirs, of the Tories of the Revolutionary War and the Copperheads of the War for the Union—Shadow Huns, Copperheads, Tories. That is their line of ancestry. We have got to have in this country but one flag, and that the American flag; but one language, and that the English language, the language in which the Declaration of Independence and Washington's Farewell Address and Lincoln's Gettysburg Speech were written; and but one loyalty, and that loyalty to the United States, to the country that holds in its hands the golden hopes for the future of mankind.

The lesson I want to teach is demonstrated by the great catastrophe in your own history. One of the terrible calamities of this country was the Johnstown flood. To the memory of every older man here it is a memory of horror to this day. The Johnstown flood came from the breaking of a dam. Warning had been given again and again that the dam was structurally weak, and they ought to avert the possibility of a flood by the only way by which any danger can be averted—any danger of any kind—and that is by preparing against it in advance. But people said it would be too expensive, and probably there wouldn't be a flood anyway, and that there had never been a flood, so why should there be a flood?

And then the flood came and the awful death of thousands, the destruction of homes, the misery of families. Now, what would you have thought of people who at the end of that time said "Let's rebuild the dam as it was. There won't be another flood?"

Now, this Union is at present preparing for war. It made my heart thrill as I passed through your city here and saw before house after house the flags showing one, two, three stars, showing that in that family its sons had gone to prove their faith by their endeavor and to show their loyalty to the Union, their loyalty to this country, by the last ultimate proof of loyalty. It is a wonderful thing, and I am not only proud of the men who go but I congratulate them beyond measure, for the men who don't go will have a harder time explaining to their children in the future why they didn't go than the others will have explaining why they did go. [Applause.] You know, as I have said before, unfortunately for me, I found this a very exclusive war. I was blackballed. But I am not preaching to you anything that I wouldn't try to put into effect and that my family has not put into effect.

I honor beyond measure the men who go, and I admire the energy, the devotion, with which our people are instilled, many of those in the Government—and I want to say right here, Congressmen, that Congress has been most wise and generous in the way it has made appropriations looking toward the going on with the war; it deserves credit for the way it has acted. There has been wise action by certain Government officials, by many private individuals, doing all that can be done, and I honor the men who have volunteered, the drafted men, and men of the Regular Army and Regular Navy, all of them who have gone in. They are doing pretty well things that we ought to have done just three years ago.

Nine-tenths of wisdom is being wise in time. The men who could have strengthened the Johnstown dam were not wise in time, and the flood came. The only reason that at this moment we are able to repair and make the blunders and permit the mistakes, is because it happens to pay England and France to protect us as an incident of protecting themselves. Eight months have gone by since Germany's declaration of war against us. Congress did not declare war. It announced that Germany was already at war with us. And it was perfectly true. Eight months have gone by. Congress, as I said, has appropriated large sums of money; the Red Cross—people of whom I am going to speak later—the Y. M. C. A., and kindred organizations, have done well. The young men of the country are going forward showing splendid patriotism, and the spirit of this country is all right. Do not make any mistake. Wisconsin and Minnesota, Kansas City, and everywhere, are just as right as we are—all they need is a change; that is all they need. They are just as straight Americans as we are; they will respond to the spirit just as readily.

Now, friends, let us make up our minds to act in the spirit of Abraham Lincoln, to treat these faults and errors not as something to revenge but as something from which to learn lessons for our future. That is what my interest is. My interest is that we shall learn the lessons for our future conduct.

After the Johnstown flood occurred nothing could undo the flood suffering, nothing could alleviate the awful misery of the survivors. What could be done was, in the first place, the rebuilding of the dam, and make the next all right, and in the next place be prepared that never again should there be another flood. That is what you did. If you hadn't done it Johnstown would have been abandoned, instead of being the city that it now is. Let us do that with our country. Let us face the fact of the absurdity of our lack of preparedness. Here you are, a Nation of a hundred millions. We have been in the war eight months behind the shield of the British and French Navies, and the British and French Armies, and during that time we have put on the other side some scores of thousands of men, of whom the Artillery have no guns, and they never practiced with guns, many of them, and there are many Engineers, and one or two divisions of Infantry. If there is one division there, it is trained; it is nearly ready to go in the trenches. If there are two, the other has not been trained and isn't fit to go in the trenches yet. And here we have, I have been told, some artillery that could be employed if we were certain the enemy would not move around too rapidly. They are trained guns; you must treat them with due respect. You have to use them on a foe who will be obligingly still.

I saw it announced the other day that we are going to build a wonderful air fleet and that we would develop an airplane. It was a good one all right. I was in it the other day. It was fine. We went, I think, about 110 miles. It is the Liberty engine. It is a great thing for our inventors to invent it, and it means that when they get the plane together with the engine, instead of being as France is, with, I think, 10,000 planes, we will have one.

Now, I am proud of the men that started in and tried to fill up the gaps, that have developed the engine, but do not let us fool ourselves. It is eight months since the war began. If suddenly to-morrow our allies should say that the war was dreadful and they quit, and if Germany were at liberty to turn her attention to us, Germany, with a small army of, say, 60,000 men, with artillery and airplanes on this side, in all our country we could not put against her an army that would hold it.

Let us make up our minds that never again will we permit Uncle Sam to be caught so utterly unprepared that he owes his safety to the fact that others are willing to protect him when he is unable to protect himself.

I saw the other day that some of my pacifist friends had said that this was going to be the last great war. Three years and three months ago they were saying there would never be a great war. You know that. Just go back and look at the things they said. There was no need of preparedness; there was no need of wasting money on ships and guns, just exactly like the men who said there was no need in wasting money in preparing, in making fit, that South Fork Dam—just exactly the same kind of a statement. Then I stated to an old woman—I forget which sex—I once stated to him, when he said he preferred arbitration to battleships. I said, "Yes; but suppose the other fellow does not. I would rather arbitrate, if possible, but I want the battleships behind to help out."

It is the same way now. I will do everything that I can that is wise to prompt everything that will be done to minimize the chances of war; that will tend to provide machinery that will be to a certain extent in some cases a substitute for war; but when it is all done, remember that the only real safety to Uncle Sam lies in Uncle Sam's preparing his own strength.

Now, we have had an example in the last three years. We were told that if we were helpless we would be kept out of war. We were told that if we did not prepare for war nobody would hurt us. We did not prepare, and we have not kept out of war. We are in the war, but we are only at the receiving end of it. And no man has any excuse now not to understand from what has actually happened that we can not improvise an Army under modern conditions—that you have got to prepare in advance.

There is just one form of preparation which I believe is really efficient, and that is universal, obligatory military training for all our young men in time of peace. The son of the mine owner and the son of the mine worker, the son of the railroad president and the son of the brakeman, the son of the banker and the son of the bricklayer, the son of the lawyer and the son of the farmer, sometime between the ages of 18 and 22, make them go into the field for actual training, live in the same dog tents, eat the same food, go on the same hikes, do the same work, and then when you come to choose out the men to be trained as officers take each man on his worth as he has shown it. I will say that would be everything for young men in time of peace. It will be the best thing mentally, physically, and morally for our whole people in time of peace, and in time of war it means that we will have a genuine democratic Army.

It isn't militarism. Let me point out just what I mean. We have had thousands of officers in training camps for the last two years. If we didn't have them we wouldn't have had any officers to train the drafted men. That was the only instrument we could use, because it was our duty to use it and do the best we possibly could with it. Now, they put in a rule that every man should have the qualification of a college education before going in there. Personally I don't believe in that rule. But understand I back up plenty of things I don't approve of, and I am backing up the Government for every measure it will take for the efficient prosecution of the war. I am going to do everything I can to the last, but let us prepare so that in the future we shall not commit the blunders we have committed in the present. Now, as to officers' training camps, nobody could go to them unless his father had some money, because you had to take the man out of his business, run the risk of losing his business, and put him in.

The man of means who sent his son under those conditions was doing a patriotic act. I am one of those who was able to send my sons there. I was more glad than I can say to give my sons a chance, but it wasn't a square deal that the sons of other men just as patriotic could not afford to give them that chance. That was not a square deal. Now, if we went at it as we should and prepare, and prepare in advance, that state of affairs would not be necessary. Make every boy come up. Son of the rich man, son of the poor man, son of the man with capital, son of the wage earner. Make every man come up. Support him by the Government while he is up. If necessary, pay a minimum wage to a dependent parent or others who will need him and who will be deprived of his services. Then, after they have been there a year, don't say anything about college education or anything—take the best man.

I am not speaking as a theorist; I am speaking of what I did with my own regiment. When I still thought that I might be allowed to raise a division here, I had two of my old members of my regiment with me doing the work. One of them was a Harvard fellow, captain of the crew in Harvard; the other was originally a New Mexican mining prospector who had gotten off to the Pacific coast as third mate on a windjammer around the Horn. Now, I wouldn't tolerate either man discriminating against the other. You couldn't make either man discriminate against the other. You couldn't make either man discriminate against the other because they were each men of the best type as officers. Now, it would be a mean and base thing to discriminate against a man who had a college education, and it would be a mean and base thing to discriminate against a fellow who had gotten his education as third mate on a windjammer. Give them a chance each to show the stuff there is in him. If they have got the stuff, treat them accordingly.

The young man of fighting age is going to the front. We, who stay behind, who are not allowed to go to the front, must in the first place back them in every way; back the Government in everything it does for them and insist that the Government shall do everything for them, and then do our own part behind them. Buy liberty bonds, so that the Government can have the money to do the work; and, by the way, I have seen a good deal in the papers about the difference between the bondholder and the people. Now, the people have a chance to be bondholders themselves if they wish to be. Let everyone buy a bond, and you get in a favored class. Don't wait for 20 years and then complain about the bondholder. The Government is anxious that everyone get a bond now. They have arranged, I think, that even five men can go together and get a bond at $10 apiece. Let every man get a bond. It is the safest thing in the world; it is on Uncle Sam's credit. That bond will be good unless this Union bursts; and if this Union bursts, it won't make any difference to any of us whether the bond is good or not.

Also help and back organizations like the Red Cross. I wish our people would read the sermons of Dr. Newell Dwight Hillis, who has just come back from Belgium and France, whose description of the heart-rending misery ought to stir every human being in this country. Let us try to do away, so far as we can, with the sufferings of the people over there, and let us take steps to see that our men who go to the front suffer just as little as possible. The Government can do great things, but private action is needed, and of all of the organizations doing various work probably the Red Cross is at this moment doing the largest amount of good work. So friends, I ask you here, on Red Cross Sunday, to do what you can for the United States in this war, and to profit by the lessons of the war so that we may never again repeat the shortcomings which are being demonstrated.

I ask you to see that we permanently adopt the policy of preparedness, preparedness not just against war but preparedness to secure justice, politically and economically, and social justice. Let the young men of fighting age and physically fit go to the front in the fighting line and let them understand that we who stay at home hold them in higher honor than any other people in this country. They are doing a great work for the country, then let us all do all we can and back the Government in every move it takes that is efficient and right. Bring pressure on it to act with efficiency for the right, and let us exert ourselves in our private capacities by backing such organizations as the Red Cross. Let us, in other words, be on Uncle Sam's team. Don't let us stand on the side lines. Let us help Uncle Sam's team, and let it be understood that as we have drawn the sword it will not be sheathed until, even if it is necessary to exert every particle of our giant strength, with honor we can secure an overwhelming victory.

War-Risk Insurance.

SPEECH
OF
HON. M. M. GARLAND,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. GARLAND. Mr. Chairman, I am in favor of the amendment of the gentleman from New York offered a few minutes ago, which I understand gives to the soldier the so-called insurance in this bill without any cost to him. When we sent the soldiers over to France we did not load them down with funds. For a long time we had a discussion here as to the pay we would give them, and finally the measly sum of $30 a month was finally given to the private soldier to go across there and offer up his life. I am sorry to hear it stated here that one of the arguments in favor of the soldier being required to pay for the insurance is that $13.50 over in France is too much for the morals of the soldier.

Oh, war is such a moral thing. When men are taken and forced into the Army and forced up face to face with one another to shoot their lives out, that is called moral. Why, my friends, there is nothing moral in war. You can not expect men to sit here in Congress and direct every action of these soldiers and every penny that they shall spend. It is stated further that these young men are going over there, and that they have nobody dependent on them now. The most of these boys are coming from work and are members of families with their parents depending on them for support. We see it stated in the newspapers every day. You send such a boy over there. In a short time something occurs in that family to change the situation, and then as a fact they require all the money that they can get from the boy who is at the front. My friends, I am in favor of giving the boys that insurance and not taking that $30 away—out of their pockets If they are deserving of any insurance at all, let us go down into the Treasury and give it to them if it is necessary, just as we have been spending large and extravagant amounts for other things in this war, just as we have given all the power and all the money that has been asked for, and have sent money abroad in amounts larger than ever were voted before. Yet we talk here about the miserable dollar a day that we are giving to the boy that we send over there and whom we force to give up his life. The theory of that is all wrong and I am opposed to it.

Let us keep in mind this fact, that every American boy who goes over to France is taking from his young life the education and start for his future life—all for the good of his country. He has no more at stake so far as home government is concerned than the rest of us, but he is forced to go there because this Congress has stated that between certain ages men must go. It seems to me that it is little enough that we guarantee him this, so that he may depend upon some competency other than the amount that we have voted as compensation, and in my estimation there ought not to be any exception. Each and every man who goes to France should be insured at the cost of the Government. [Applause.]

Growing Interest in Waterways.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,
OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, never in the history of the country have the people been more interested in the question of transportation than they are at the present time. The railroads and steamships are groaning under the burden placed upon them of carrying the products of the United States, and to meet our war necessities. They are so sadly incapable of meeting all demands of shippers that, as to many commodities, embargoes have been laid which hinder rather than stimulate production. With 50,000 miles of navigable waterways—half of them not improved for public use—it is no wonder that the cry comes up from various sections of the country for increased transportation facilities by water as well as by rail. When food products are bringing extraordinary prices, and every energy is being bent to increase production, it is unfortunate that producers should be handicapped by embargoes, or should be told to let the products of their toil perish because the waterways and canals are not adequate to afford them transportation facilities to reach the markets or the ports.

That the problems thus raised are of national interest is revealed by the renewed activity of waterways advocates in response to the general demand for better facilities for making shipments by rail and water. No less than three conventions are now being arranged to deal with this question.

The people of Texas are looking forward to a meeting soon to be held at Corpus Christi, where demands will be made for improved outlets to the sea and for better means of communication by water between the ports of Texas and other States and countries. The Rivers and Harbors Committee is planning to look over the Texas waterways during the interim between the sessions of Congress.

The Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association is arranging for a great convention at Miami, Fla., the last week of November, where all the States of the Atlantic seaboard, from Maine to Florida, will be represented. The Rivers and Harbors Committee is to continue its Texas tour along the Gulf to connect with the Miami convention, where work thus far accomplished upon the Atlantic intracoastal waterway will be discussed. In addition to these two conventions, both urging internal improvements and waterway extensions, the National Rivers and Harbors Congress is prepared to bring together in the city of Washington the waterways advocates of all the States, who will assemble about the first week in December. Taken all in all, it will be an active season for the men and women of the United States who believe that productivity and commerce will be greatly advanced by a more considerate Government interest in the transportation problem.

THE MIAMI CONVENTION.

In connection with the Miami convention, which meets November 27 and concludes December 1, and which will be addressed by some of the leading men of the Nation, I desire to include in my remarks an extract from the call of the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association. It gives a brief but comprehensive statement of the situation that is agitating the waterways people of the seaboard States. It also reveals the spirit of the beautiful Florida city, which, located almost at the southern extremity of the United States, and at great disadvantage in the matter of railroad transportation, pleads for recognition as a port and evinces a willingness to cooperate with the Government, that is most commendable. It is as follows:

It was with especial pleasure that the hospitable invitation from Miami was accepted and our members will be assured of one of the most attractive programs ever arranged for a convention of the association; attractive not only because of the delightful surroundings and tropical climate in which our "Thanksgiving convention" will be held but because of the magnificent spirit of progress and self-help which will be everywhere evident in and about Miami; and finally because of the important bearing the convention may have in furthering the use and improvement of waterways for the national benefit in this time of crisis and stress.

The congressional situation that developed while the river and harbor bill of 1917 was upon its passage marked, we believe, a turning point, in public opinion, in favor of a freer and more rational treatment of our waterways. The old unreasoning opposition made itself manifest, and scant effort was made to meet any issue fairly upon its merit. The objectors gave little consideration to the commercial or strategic value of projects as reported by the War and Navy Departments. In fact, it was often evident that time had not even been taken to consult the survey maps and reports on the projects under discussion. This line of attack was directed with special reference to projects advocated by this association, which stood the test and advanced in the good will of Congress. All of which means that the work of the association must continue until those who have heretofore so bitterly opposed these important eastern developments are brought to a better understanding of the righteousness of our cause, or are overwhelmed by the enlightened sentiment of the greater number of their colleagues in Congress who know our commercial needs and who believe in the common-sense preparedness for war which this association advocates.

The definite alignment of the administrative branch of the Government in favor of the bill was another long step forward, as have been the recent activities of the Government toward the more effective use of our waterways as a war-emergency measure. The Secretary of Commerce and the Council of National Defense, it may be observed, are earnestly cooperating to bring about the use of water routes wherever possible to afford relief to the railroads for war service, and we have the prospect, during the war at least, of earnest cooperation between the rail and water lines in both routing and rating, instead of the unfortunate discordance so evident in the past.

The river and harbor bill just enacted by Congress provides for the appointment of a Waterways Commission to coordinate the activities of the Government with respect to our waterways and water resources, and to formulate comprehensive plans for future development. This again should go far toward allaying the spirit of prejudice against the use of waterways which has been spread so insidiously during recent years.

With pride in the progress made, therefore, and with confidence in the future, our members will once more assemble in annual convention. As to the past year it may be noted that work has progressed materially on some of our projects already adopted; several links in the intracoastal chain are now completed and in operation. The Champlain Narrows, an essential connection from the Adirondack ore fields to the New York Barge Canal and the Hudson River, is to be improved to standard dimensions. The East River (N. Y.) improvement is definitely adopted, together with the deeper channel for Boston. Negotiations are authorized to acquire the Cape Cod and the Chesapeake & Delaware Canals, subject, however, to ratification by Congress. This brings us a step nearer the adoption of the project for the waterway across the State of New Jersey, a vital link between North and South in the intracoastal plan. During the past year that State has given further evidence of its good faith, in providing for purchase of the right of way, and its governor and official board are justified in urging upon Congress that the time is at hand to adopt the project and proceed with the work.

Problems of similar importance continue to claim our interest along the southern section of the waterway chain, notably between the North Carolina Sounds and Winyah Bay, in South Carolina, and in the series of channels requiring improvement to extend the inside route down the Florida coast.

Miami, indeed, affords one of the finest examples of waterway progress in our country. On her harbor front in Biscayne Bay she is constructing, at her own expense, a public dock 1,000 feet long, with a public terminal railroad. In the bay, Dade County, of which Miami is the seat of government, is dredging a commodious channel and causeway. Access to these improvements is provided by the Government channel and jetties connecting with the ocean, on which the commerce of the Antilles and the Gulf passes to and fro along the Gulf Stream, seemingly a stone's throw from shore. This year's river and harbor bill carries a provision for completing the Government channel, and our members may understand the progressive spirit of Miami when we state that for every dollar the Government has provided toward these improvements the people of Miami have provided more than two dollars. The opening of this new harbor is to be timed to our convention.

AMERICA'S OWN NECESSITIES IMPORTANT.

Mr. Speaker, when Miami greets the Atlantic Deeper Waterways Association in November next the transportation problem in the United States will doubtless have reached its acutest stage to date; that is to say, the common carriers of the country will have been brought face to face with the most difficult situation that has ever confronted them. The war pressure may be bringing them better returns than formerly, but they will have been pushed to capacity, which is not much greater now than it was in 1907, when James J. Hill declared it would take $500,000,000 to bring the railroads up to the transportation needs of the country. The suggestion of Government ownership hangs over these great and hitherto powerful corporations, and, like, the labor question, tends to retard the investment of new capital for betterments and extensions. Government bonds for war purposes are too necessary just now, and too numerous also, to encourage the hope that the investing public will come to the aid of the transportation companies, the element of risk making all capital a little more cautious than it is in normal times.

We have no grievance against transportation companies as such. On the contrary, if our theory is correct, the improvement of our inland waterways must serve to feed the railroads and press new business upon them—that is our belief and that is what we advocate. But we realize now, as we have contended since this great waterways movement was inaugurated, that to depend solely upon one method of transportation in the United States, and especially along the Atlantic coast, is an injustice to the producers and consumers of the land and a setback to our national progress. We will not argue this question at any length. We will just set it forth as one of the many that will come up for discussion at Miami.

And as food for thought along this same line, may we not invite the careful attention of our Senators and Representatives, of our railroad officials and of all others concerned, to these queries?

First. Do you think the cost of living in the United States would be so high and the rail and ocean freight charges so great if our inside waterways had been encouraged to do their full share of the transportation work in this war?

Second. When the United States is willing to bond itself for $7,000,000,000 to lend to our foreign allies to spend for war purposes, including railroad construction, do you not think we should be fair enough to our own people to appropriate the few paltry millions necessary to put our own coastal waterways in order for commerce and for defense?

Third. And, Mr. Railroad Man, do you not think when the United States Government lends men and money to France and Russia to build locomotives and cars and to build and rebuild railroads which coordinate with waterways and canals to facilitate transportation and develop the country, that the time has come for a similar coordination and development in the United States?

Nebraska Wins First Place in the Soil-Products Contest.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. CHARLES H. SLOAN,
OF NEBRASKA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. SLOAN. Mr. Speaker, some months ago in speaking upon this floor I told my colleagues in a modest way the achievements and glory of "Nebraska at 50."

There were those who accorded me most cordial attention, but not unchecked credulity. They thought among my figures of speech hyperbole was given an exalted station.

To show that my statements were all well based and thoroughly grounded I desire to submit the following fact: That at the International Soil Products Exposition recently held at Peoria, Ill., Nebraska won first prize, as the following Associated Press dispatch states:

NEBRASKA WINS FIRST PLACE IN SOIL-PRODUCTS CONTEST.

PEORIA, ILL., September 24.

Nebraska won the first prize at the International Soil Products Exposition to-day. Out of a possible 1,500 points, Nebraska led all other exhibits of agricultural products, with 1,230 points. Kansas was second, with 1,148 points; Arizona, third, with 1,084 points; Minnesota, fourth, with 1,005 points; Saskatchewan, Canada, fifth, with 922 points; and Wisconsin, sixth, with 920 points.

The following Omaha Bee editorial comments on our State's achievements, not to lord it over Kansas, our State twin and geographical neighbor, and, by the way, most formidable rival in the contest, but to keep the hat of history on straight presents this following editorial:

NEBRASKA IN FRONT AS USUAL.

Comparisons instituted at the International Soil Products Exposition at Peoria go to confirm what has been modestly claimed for the State of Nebraska by its patriotic sons and daughters all along. In an open competition Nebraska comes out ahead of all its rivals, with a clean hundred points over Kansas and the others trailing. This was decided by an exhibition of agricultural products such as this State produces year after year in such quantities as astounds the world. Other Commonwealths attract attention in various ways, each boasting of its peculiar attractions, but Nebraska merely goes along about its business of raising crops and sending them to market, and taking down first honors when it comes to comparing results. If our home folks were not as modest as they are industrious and enterprising they could start a justifiable uproar about the quality and quantity of their products such as would make the others sit up and take notice, but they will hang this newest honor up alongside of others previously gathered and go about their legitimate business of producing half a billion dollars' worth of wealth each year from the farms of the State. That's all; if you want noise or politics try Kansas, but if you are looking for real results come to Nebraska.

For 50 years of statehood we referred to Nebraska as the State without a mine. There has appeared in its least promising quarter recently a concrete contradiction of that designation. Great deposits of potash have been discovered. But characteristically that will find its greatest value in contributing to our soil's fertility our present greatest asset. That fertile soil makes our subsurface a mine coincident with the area of the Commonwealth.

Its products, rich and valuable, come first from the alembic of active soil and season in richest emerald, to be transmuted, in both rain and dew, under warmth of the sun, into that form of gold upon which a battling world places the highest price.

The United States at War—What Has Been Accomplished Since the Declaration of War by the Executive Departments of the Government Under War Conditions.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. HENRY T. RAINEY,
OF ILLINOIS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, October 5, 1917.

Mr. RAINEY. Mr. Speaker, under the permission granted me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I herewith print a general résumé of the activities of the executive departments of the Government during the period of the present war, prepared by the Committee on Public Information.

GENERAL RÉSUMÉ.

It is not possible here fully to detail the multiplied activities of our executive departments under the stress of war conditions. As the legislative branch of the Government has responded to their call for legislation and vast appropriations for the conduct of democracy's war, so the executive departments, working at a speed and under a pressure without precedent, have given their response to extraordinary and imperative demands.

There has been no "slacker" among these departments. From the Department of State, with its disclosures of German intrigue, to the Department of Labor, engaged in the adjustment of domestic labor problems, there has been a harmonious adjustment of the machinery of war and a cooperation that augurs well for victory.

The War Department, creating a great army to fight our battles abroad; the Navy Department, joining the allies in keeping enemy ships from our shores; the Treasury Department, enrolling patriotic Americans as they subscribe to the liberty bonds; the Department of Justice, closing in on the enemy within our gates; the Post Office Department, curbing seditious utterances with the one hand and sending mail to our soldiers with the other; the Interior Department, promoting the development of the country's war-time resources; the Agricultural Department, stimulating the production of foodstuffs; the Department of Commerce, keeping open the channels of trade and conducting a military and economic census—all have played well their part in this era of preparation.

Six months from the day the war came to America there may be written a remarkable story of the transformation of the United States from a Nation of peace to one of enforced conflict. Great difficulties have been overcome; others are yet to be overcome, but the record as it stands to-day begets admiration and promises eventual success in arms.

We are not a militaristic Nation. We have maintained no large standing armies. When war came there was barely a nucleus upon which to build. We started almost from the ground up to equip ourselves for warfare as it exists to-day, for a modern warfare as different from that to which we have been accustomed as the airplane differs from the old circus balloon. Steadily along scientific and systematic lines we have progressed during the first six months of the war. We have endeavored to profit by the earlier mistakes of other nations, to expand speedily but thoroughly, to become equipped in the typical American way to meet a great emergency.

The purpose here is to recount some of the things which have been accomplished under the conditions suddenly confronting us. There is opportunity here to record only the greater achievements, but in the path of these more important accomplishments there follows a train of necessary little things—the essential odds and ends of this country's preparations for war.

There is a story, for instance, in the lights that shine in our big Government buildings by night. There was a time when these buildings were dark and empty overnight. Now, men in uniform and in civilian dress bend late over papers and war maps. War machinery 3,000 miles from the battle front is operating. One might find another story in the stream of Government clerks who march out of these buildings and upon the streets of the Capital. Each clerk is a worker in the broad field of war-time preparation. Again, there is inspiration in the fact that many of America's business and professional men—great merchants, financiers, economists, teachers, and others—have volunteered their services and are aiding this Government, practically without compensation, in its effort to make the world safe for democracy.

These things furnish an index of patriotism and reveal the unity of our people. They are interwoven with the major achievements of the first six months of war. Of these details others will in time speak fully. It is now proposed to record the work of the several executive departments to the end that the country may be advised of our stewardship, and that our people may lend themselves even more to a common cause.

This résumé of the work of the executive departments is not given necessarily in the order of importance or popular interest. Each department has fitted into the great comprehensive scheme of war, and aiding these departments there have been various bureaus and commissions created to assist the overworked regular establishments. And in the center of this great war wheel is the White House, occupied by a man in whom Congress has intrusted great powers and upon whom there rests to-day one of the greatest burdens in history.

A summary of "what has been done during the first six months of war" is as follows:

WAR DEPARTMENT.

From the Secretary of War to the recruit clerk the War Department is to-day an efficient, smooth-working organization. "Red-tape" methods are beating a retreat. The most visionary official six months ago would not have predicted what has been wrought since April. Our forces are to-day assembling on foreign soil. American industry has been broadened to clothe, feed, and equip a great new army. Hundreds of thousands of American youths are being trained to join our advance guard on the other side.

Within three months the War Department constructed 16 cantonments. This construction virtually meant the building of 16 cities, each capable of accommodating 40,000 population. These cities, from sidewalks and electric lights to wooden buildings, were constructed at an approximate total cost of $150,000,000, and without excessive profits to the contractors. This great cantonment project was in addition to the fitting out of as many National Guard camps and the maintenance of officers' training schools where intensive training was given to young men capable of becoming officers.

Approximately 500,000 men are now located at or en route to these cantonments. When these men are trained and ready for embarkation the United States is ready to supply others to fill the cantonments and undergo preparation for the supreme duty in France. There is practically no limit to the number of patriotic Americans who are awaiting the call for service.

Under the direction of the Provost Marshal General the War Department successfully put into effect the selective-draft law. There was a minimum of friction. Resistance to the draft has been sporadic and isolated. Everywhere there has been general recognition of its fairness, its democracy.

As a result of this law 10,000,000 men are available for examination and acceptance or exemption. A National Army of a million men to back up the Regular Army, the National Guard, and the Navy is readily obtainable under this system, and barely touches the resources of America in man power.

The work of the General Staff and the Army War College, while highly confidential and technical in its nature, should not be passed without notice. The General Staff, with a small augmentation of membership, has worked out plans not only for our present Army but future increments as well. It has studied the lessons of three years of war in Europe, has brought our Army up to the new era in warfare, and substantially revised the past organization of our armies to fit in with modern methods. Not only was Gen. Pershing's expedition organized and fitted out along entirely new lines, but the General Staff is modernizing the entire Army, unit by unit, so that it may become a powerful factor in the allied war machine.

The necessity of an entirely new type of military organization, the new demands of European trench warfare, the building up of an American Army many times the size of its peace strength, and the development of strategic plans in keeping with the requirements of the hour are tasks to which the General Staff has given a satisfying answer.

It is probable that no branch of the War Department has withstood greater war-time pressure than the office of The Adjutant General. The outbreak of the war found the country wholly unsupplied with officers to train and command the forthcoming army. Early in April The Adjutant General announced a comprehensive plan for 16 officers' training camps to train more than 40,000 candidates. There were more than 150,000 applicants, and about 43,000 were selected and assigned for training at these camps.

They received highly intensive instruction and approximately 27,000 officers have been recommended and commissioned for the several branches of the service. Some of these officers will serve with the Regular Army, others with the National Guard, and some are in France. The great majority, however, will be utilized for training the National Army. A second series of training camps has been begun and a third is to follow in January. The third series will afford an opportunity to the drafted man to become an officer, and will be largely filled by men selected from among the ranks now in training under the selective-draft law.

Upon the office of The Adjutant General there also fell the duty of bringing into the service for the present emergency the officers and enlisted men, with the exception of the enlisted men secured through the draft law, of issuing necessary orders for the movement of troops and of handling the great amount of correspondence and records incident to the formation of such an army. First there was a recruiting drive to fill the Regular Army to its war strength. This was done. Simultaneously this office procured more than 50,000 trained specialists for the Enlisted Reserve Corps.

This reserve corps supplied material for the 10 Engineer regiments sent to France as well as more than 12,000 specialists for the Quartermaster Corps.

In addition to the officers commissioned from the training camps it was necessary to commission about 30,000 officers in the Reserve Corps and to issue commissions to about 5,000 officers of the Regular Army either as original appointments or promotions. At the beginning of the war we had about 20,000 officers; now there are around 80,000. The commissioning of these men in itself is a major achievement.

The Adjutant General's office received about 3,000 pieces of mail per day during the year 1916. Now the mail averages 80,000 pieces a day, and the work of the office is constantly getting heavier, yet the clerical force has been barely doubled.

A statistical division which will keep a card-index record of the entire Army is one of the war developments in The Adjutant General's office. The soldier both at home and abroad will be card indexed so that if he figures in the day's news, either as being promoted, commended, wounded, or killed, there will be immediately available a record of that soldier. This division will maintain offices both in Washington and Paris.

The Adjutant General's department also has started a comprehensive occupational and educational census of the men of the National Army. At each of the 16 cantonments a personnel organization has been formed and the recruits are being listed as they arrive, so that whenever possible a soldier may be assigned to the right place.

This occupational census of the drafted men takes into consideration the previous employment, educational qualifications, and preferences for service of each man called. The data selected are to be available to the division commanders and will enable them to make the best possible assignments of the men composing the National Army.

The mobilization of the Nation's industries for the task of supplying arms and ammunition for the new army was a part of the task ahead of the Ordnance Bureau when the war came. The Ordnance Bureau, like the office of The Adjutant General, has been one of the speed-up bureaus of the War Department during these six months. It was equipped for times of peace, and while there was some reserve supply of arms and ammunition it was comparatively negligible in view of the sudden demands. It was no longer a matter of having the work done at arsenals and armories of the Government. Industry had to be organized to supply the ordnance for our forces.

The Ordnance Bureau is now expending for the first year of the war more than $3,000,000,000. In addition to the demands for increased output of the ordinary supplies the Ordnance Bureau must be prepared to meet the new conditions of war. Antiaircraft guns had to be produced; rifles had to be remodeled and rechambered; the type of ammunition was changed; machine guns had to be produced in great numbers; and railway artillery, and motor equipment for artillery—all of a modern type—had to be supplied on short notice. At the same time field artillery and heavier guns were made ready for the service in France.

Approximately $250,000,000 was required for the establishment of new manufacturing plants and for the cost of the guns they will produce. An illustration of the cost of war and the increased work of the Ordnance Bureau is shown by a comparison of appropriations. The carriage division of the Ordnance Bureau, for instance, spent approximately $34,000,000 the year before the war began. Since the United States entered the war the appropriations for this division have amounted to nearly $2,000,000,000.

For the procurement of mobile artillery ammunition there has been appropriated about $398,000,000. The average annual appropriations for the purpose for the fiscal years 1906 to 1914 amounted to only $310,000, and the average for the years 1915 to 1917 was $1,088,000.

Aside from its purchases and production of the munitions of war the Ordnance Department has practically completed arrangements for the construction and early operation of a nitrate plant.

As soon as war came the Ordnance Department created a section for handling matters concerning the weapons essential to modern trench warfare. This section includes in its preparations pyrotechnics, rifle grenades, hand grenades, trench mortars, drop bombs, releasing devices, flame throwers, and all other chemical devices known to the warfare of to-day. The size of the task of the Ordnance Bureau, confronted with the arming of possibly 2,000,000 men, is appreciated when it is realized that not one of the articles mentioned above was a standard article for manufacture in this country prior to the outbreak of the war.

Reference has been made to the construction of 16 Army cantonments within an incredibly short time. This was accomplished by the Quartermaster General's department, but this was but one of the war duties devolving upon the Quartermaster Corps. It has had to clothe and feed the American Army at home and the expeditionary force abroad. It has supplied everything from writing pens to woolen underwear and overcoats to our men in camp. It must provide forage for thousands of animals. It must heat the cantonments and Army camps.

To accomplish all this the Quartermaster Corps has established many depots, and its personnel has been enormously increased to carry on the work of making comfortable our Army in training. The Council of National Defense has cooperated in mobilizing the industries of the country to turn out the unprecedented order for clothing, shoes, and food required by the Quartermaster General.

Industry has expanded just as rapidly as possible to accommodate the unexpected demands. There have been shortages in equipment here and there, but considering the magnitude of the orders placed and the suddenness with which we were forced to equip not only our forces here but an expeditionary force abroad the performance of the Quartermaster Corps is remarkable.

Since last April, for instance, it has purchased more than $130,000,000 worth of clothing, consisting of countless suits, belts, hats, gloves, overcoats, stockings, and so on. More than $54,000,000 has been spent for equipage—tents, cots, blankets, bags, axes, tools, pins, stoves. Millions of yards of cloth, including tentage, have been acquired at a cost of more than $160,000,000.

Incidentally the Quartermaster Corps has secured several thousand bakers and cooks, who have been assigned to duty at the training camps. Cooking schools and organizations of bakery companies was merely one of the side line activities of the Quartermaster Department, which, like the Ordnance Department, is scheduled to expend more than $3,000,000,000 during the first year of the war.

The development of a standard military truck which will be turned out in large numbers was recently announced. This truck was designed with the aid of the country's leading automobile engineers and draftsmen, who came to Washington at the request of the Quartermaster Corps. The standardized truck was recently described by Secretary Baker as several years ahead of anything yet devised in the truck line.

The Aviation Section of the Signal Corps of the Army to-day is engaged on a work that will largely determine America's effectiveness in this war. That section is constructing an aerial fleet that soon will go to France "to blind the eyes of the Germans." Much of the work of the Aviation Section is of such military importance that it can not be revealed here, but this is a résumé of what has been done to date.

Contracts have been let and construction begun on the aerial program contemplated when Congress appropriated $640,000,000 for aviation in July. This program called for more than 20,000 machines.

This country will send into the air thousands of training machines, scouting machines, and great battle planes of the Caproni and Handley Page types.

The development of the "liberty motor" under dramatic circumstances has been described by the Secretary of War as "probably the greatest single achievement of the war." This motor, the triumph of American ingenuity and manufacture, has withstood every test. It was produced through the cooperation of the country's greatest engineers, the Council of National Defense, and the Aircraft Production Board, and the War Department.

Twenty-four aviation flying schools have been authorized and most of them are in operation. We have eight ground schools at leading universities.

In addition, it has been recently disclosed that many American aviators, wearing our uniforms, are now in training behind the European battle fronts. Special arrangements were made with our allies for the intensive training of American aviators behind the lines, and hundreds, probably thousands, of American boys are already being trained on foreign soil for air duty.

The country has become convinced that America's biggest contribution in the overthrow of German autocracy will be through the air. The accomplishments to date of the Signal Corps sustain this belief and hope. Highly satisfactory progress, it is announced, has been made on our aviation program, and soon the first American-built battle plane, fully equipped in this country, will be sent to Europe.

This progress has been all the more remarkable when it is considered that the Aviation Section had little to build upon. Until August, 1916, when Congress appropriated some $13,000,000, our air service was merely incidental. A year later the War Department asked for and received an appropriation of $640,000,000, and more will be available if needed.

The Signal Corps proper has kept pace with the Aviation Section in preparing to keep open communication when we begin to fight in France. The country has responded generously to the call of the service for radio experts, telegraphers, linemen, and electricians.

Much may be written also of the preparation of the Engineer Department of the Army, the Medical Department, the Judge Advocate General's Office, the Commission on Training Camp Activities, and other bureaus and branches of our great war machine of to-day. There has been coordination all along the line. The greatest physicians in the country are enlisted to keep our boys in health while they are in training, and to minister to their wants when they become wounded "over there." The War Department, turning from the sterner things of the moment, has provided entertainment at the various training camps, and this work is in charge of a commission composed of experts on recreation.

The Engineering Department has covered nearly the entire field of engineering and technology since war came. It has not only met the problem of increasing its personnel and supplying the engineer equipment for an army of more than a million men but has undertaken successfully railroading on an immense scale in an attempt to furnish railroads complete from this side of the Atlantic for operation in France.

The work of the engineers ranges from organizing gas and flame service to building pontoon bridges, from the preparation of forestry regiments to the erection of sewage-disposal plants. It is essential that lines of communication be kept open for the great armies of to-day, and our railroad and forestry regiments are already in France—with more to go.

Under the supervision of the engineer department a United States locomotive was constructed in 21 days by the Baldwin Works. Now 37 engines have been completed and shipped from the works and 4 have been shipped. The cost of materials ordered to date by the engineer department is approximately $70,000,000. The articles include several hundred locomotives, 500,000 crossties, 600 fill and ballast cars, 600 miles of telephone wire, 102,000 tons of rail, and many steam shovels, locomotive cranes, complete water stations, and repair-shop equipment. Great engineer depots have been established quickly in various sections of the United States to facilitate the handling of supplies for the Army.

THE NAVY DEPARTMENT.

The Navy and the Marine Corps now constitute a force of more than a quarter of a million men. When the United States entered the war there were 64,680 enlisted men in the Navy. There are now more than 143,000, an increase of nearly 80,000.

Since that time the Naval Reserve Force has been increased from 10,000 to 49,000; 14,500 Naval Militia have been put into the Federal service; the Coast Guard, with its force of 5,000, has been transferred to the Navy for the term of the war; and the Hospital Corps has been increased from 2,000 to 6,500. The Marine Corps has increased from 13,266 enlisted on April 6 to an enlisted strength, with reserves, of 32,000.

There are now nearly three times as many vessels and boats in service as there were before the war began. Every battleship and cruiser that was in reserve has been fully manned and commissioned. Hundreds of vessels of various types—yachts and fast motor boats and tugs—have been taken over and transformed into patrol boats, submarine chasers, and the various types needed for coast defense and other purposes.

The Navy is carrying out the largest ship-construction program in history. This program embraces hundreds of vessels of various types, ranging from 32,000-ton battleships to submarine chasers. Months ago contracts were let for every destroyer the American yards could build, and to provide for the many more vessels of this type just provided for in the urgent deficiency bill necessitated the enlargement of shipyards and the facilities for building the powerful engines required. This was arranged for by the Navy Department; the plans were made and work was begun on these extensions while the appropriations were pending. The formal contracts were signed and the machinery in motion as soon as the bill was passed. In spite of the large number of vessels under contract, new records in construction are being made, and all previous efforts in building warships have been surpassed.

The Atlantic Fleet now comprises twice as many vessels as in peace times. Every warship has been turned into a training school for the instruction of the men in gunnery and engineering, and notable results have been achieved, especially in target practice with guns of the smaller calibers used in fighting submarines.

Thousands of gunners are serving in the armed guards that protect our merchant ships from the enemy U boats. The arming of our merchantmen and the protection of our commerce is one of the important tasks imposed upon the Navy, and how well it has been performed is shown by the comparatively small number of armed vessels that have been sunk.

It was Germany's ruthless submarine warfare that forced this country to declare the existence of a state of war, and naval officers realized that the immediate duty was to engage in the campaign against the U boats. Soon after war was declared a flotilla of destroyers was dispatched to the war zone, and many more have been sent since that time. Our vessels have been actively engaged in the antisubmarine warfare in European waters since early in May. The reduction in sinkings as well as the praise of the British Admiralty testify to the effectiveness of our aid.

The duty of transporting our armies overseas has devolved upon the Navy, and how well our transports have been guarded is attested by the fact that, in spite of attacks by submarines, we have not lost a transport or a man.

To house and train the thousands of recruits who enlisted so rapidly, the Navy has built 20 new training camps, which provide for 85,000 men. Each of these is a little city in itself, with comfortable barracks, mess halls, and the necessary buildings.

Keeping pace with the great expansion of the Navy afloat, an immense construction program, involving about $100,000,000, is also being carried out on shore. Great dry docks, shipways, and piers are being built, and enlargement of navy yards amounting to virtual rebuilding is in progress. Immense foundries, machine shops, and warehouses are being erected. Work has begun on the large projectile plant at Charleston, W. Va., which will be operated in connection with the armor-plate plant to be built there.

The acquisition of the Jamestown Exposition site and the Pine Beach properties, on Hampton Roads, gives the Navy its first fleet operating base, which will include a training station for 10,000 men, aviation station, submarine base, coal piers, large storage facilities for fleet supplies, and various other features.

The Naval Aeronautic Corps has been increased to several times the size it was six months ago. The 100 naval aviators landed in France June 8 constitute the first contingent of our regular fighting forces to be landed on French soil. The members of the corps are being trained in the use of seaplanes, dirigible balloons, and the various types of aircraft used in coast defense, antisubmarine warfare, and over-sea service. The Navy is building at Philadelphia a $1,000,000 aircraft factory, which will produce a considerable proportion of the machanes it requires, as well as enable it to engage in experimental work that will keep it in the forefront in the development of new types of aircraft.

Contracts involving hundreds of millions of dollars have been awarded for the manufacture of guns, ammunition, and other ordnance material. These have involved the development of new sources of supply, particularly in guns and mounts, for which contractors entirely new to the business have been interested to the extent of erecting factories for the undertaking of this work. In fulfilling contracts for the allies and our own Army and Navy, an immense capacity in the production of munitions and guns of all calibers had been developed in this country before the United States entered the war, and this has since been greatly increased. The enlargement of the naval gun factory now under way will make this one of the greatest plants of the kind in the world.

The Bureau of Ordnance has also carried on a large amount of experimental work to keep up with the latest inventions and developments in this field, both here and abroad, and our guns and munitions are considered equal to any other navy and superior in certain particulars.

THE INTERIOR DEPARTMENT.

Ordinarily the Interior Department concerns itself only with domestic affairs, such as our guardianship over the Indian, public lands, and reclamation projects. When the war came to America, however, the Interior Department found that it had a niche in the plans for national defense and the struggle for world democracy. A résumé of what the Interior Department has done shows that no bureau of that great institution has failed to find something to do under the stress of war conditions.

The wartime activities of the Interior Department range from encouraging Indians—the pioneer Americans—to subscribe to the liberty loan to the leasing of Government land for the production of food or the development of water power for manufacturing purposes.

The department has loaned its topographic experts to the Army; it has supplied geologists where needed; its experts on metals have cooperated with the Council of National Defense and the War Department; it has prepared a classified list of the mining engineers and chemists of the entire country and qualified in many other ways as a department which can turn from the affairs of peace to the activities of war.

With the encouragement and approval of the department, Indian adults and minors subscribed to approximately $4,500,000 worth of the first liberty loan. A similarly generous response may be expected from the Indians now that the second bond issue is under way.

Nearly a hundred topographic engineers of the Geological Survey have been commissioned in the Army. The survey bureau will map military areas of importance in this country and abroad.

The Geological Survey has also supplied a great deal of data, of highly important and confidential nature, regarding the minerals and substances required for the successful conduct of the war and the supply of the same.

The Indian Bureau waged an extensive food-supply campaign during the past summer. On 73 Indian reservations 472,156 acres of land were cultivated this year, in comparison with 358,796 last year. Indian women and girls have been taught the modern art of canning and preserving. A woman expert went from reservation to reservation teaching this art.

The extension of canals and laterals has been rushed by the Reclamation Service in order that a greater acreage might be brought under cultivation and the food supply increased. Legislation was obtained for the temporary delivery of water to arid and idle lands and more liberal homestead regulations have encouraged the struggling farmer and increased his output.

A stimulated sale of Government lands in the West is reported by the General Land Office which says that "a constantly increasing utilization of the water resources of the West has added largely to the area of irrigated lands capable of intensive cultivation. * * * Even inferior lands, for which there were no buyers a few years ago, when offered for sale now very readily sell at prices way above the appraisements."

The war activities of the Bureau of Mines have been particularly comprehensive. The director of this bureau has cooperated in various technical investigations undertaken by the Council of National Defense and its committees and the bureau has submitted special reports on highly important subjects. It cooperated with the War Department in the nitrate supply inquiry, prepared an inventory of mining engineers and chemists, and conducted an investigation and supplied valuable data concerning greater production of raw materials for acids.

The Chemical and Mining Division of the Bureau of Mines is now working with the War Department in investigating war gases and masks. The bureau has also applied itself to the task of promoting a greater production of quicksilver, potash, petroleum products, and coal. From deposits existing in this country the bureau has also undertaken to find ways and means of supplying the manganese essential to the production of high-grade steel. The extent of the Government's contracts for steel makes this task peculiarly vital.

With the outbreak of war the peace-time machinery of the Department of the Interior was quickly transformed into agencies of preparation for war. There was a rapid readjustment, and Secretary Lane expressed gratification to-day that every bureau of the department has been able to find some way in which it might contribute to the national defense.

THE DEPARTMENT OF AGRICULTURE.

The farmer is the backbone of any country in time of peace. He does not lose his status in time of war. Without food our armies can not fight. Without food those who support the armies back of the lines and at home can not give their support. The Department of Agriculture, therefore, has its function in this war, just as has the General Staff or the Atlantic Fleet.

That the department has not been idle in this national and international crisis, when the United States confronts the problem of feeding not only ourselves but, to a large degree, our allies, may be briefly shown by an analysis of the war-time activities of the department. Here are those activities tersely told:

The Department of Agriculture has appointed 2,850 additional demonstration agents to go among our people and teach them how to make the soil yield its most bountiful harvest.

It has facilitated the distribution of seeds to our farmers and redoubled the efforts to eradicate crop-destroying pests.

It has waged a systematic and successful campaign for the canning, drying, and storing of foodstuffs. In conjunction with the food administration, the department has awakened the American housewife to the necessity of preserving foodstuffs for future use, and there are millions of jars and cans of food on pantry shelves throughout the length and breadth of the land to-day.

It has stimulated in every possible way the production of meat, grain, and other foodstuffs and sent its expert agricultural agents into every community.

The Department of Agriculture has assisted in organizing a regiment of forest engineers for active service abroad, developed and treated woods for airplane construction and other war uses, and assisted in improving gas masks for the use of our Army.

It has inspected and kept free of impurities the meat and other foods served in the Army cantonments and aided in constructing the roads about those cantonments.

It is extending a market-news service and other market activities to facilitate the marketing of agricultural products and to reduce waste and loss.

It is investigating upper-air conditions for the aviation service and creating a strong, durable, cotton fabric for covering airplane wings.

The work in progress reaches practically every bureau of the department. As the war progresses the Department of Agriculture expects to become more and more useful to the armies in the field and the army of producers at home.

DEPARTMENT OF COMMERCE.

Although not a military department, the Department of Commerce has found many war-time functions during the first six months following the entry of this country into the European conflict. In the organization of war commissions and boards the Department of Commerce has given its trained men. The United States Shipping Board drew upon this department for the chief administrative assistant in the Emergency Fleet Corporation. In the organization of the Council of National Defense the department furnished trained men for several positions.

The Department of Commerce, through the Bureau of the Census, prepared the estimate of population for use in connection with the registration of drafted men and the enrolling of the National Army. It made an estimate of population for the Federal reserve districts in the floating of the liberty loan; made a census of acids and materials used in the manufacture of explosives; and made a list of flour and other manufacturers for the Council of National Defense.

The department assisted in drafting legislation such as the "trading-with-the-enemy" act and the exports-embargo legislation. It is, of course, cooperating in the enforcement of these and other laws to regulate commerce and prevent intercourse with the Nation's enemies.

Agents of the Bureau of Foreign and Domestic Commerce have conducted investigations in this country and abroad as to available stocks for the use of the Army and Navy and assisted in the making of purchases and conservation movements.

The entire activities of the Coast and Geodetic Survey were turned into channels for military assistance immediately upon the declaration of war. The Bureau of Lighthouses transferred to the Navy Department more than 40 lighthouse tenders, 4 light vessels, and 2 light stations, including a personnel of 1,028 persons. All radio inspectors and assistant inspectors of the Bureau of Navigation trained in radio communication work have been transferred to the Signal Corps of the Army and Navy. Officers of the Steamboat-Inspection Service have been detailed where their training makes them valuable for military use.

The Bureau of Standards has had the greatest amount of work directly associated with the prosecution of the war. A greatly enlarged mechanical and scientific staff has been placed at the disposal of the Army and Navy. The work of this bureau, however, is highly confidential, and the only statement possible is that it has worked out many things of great value for offensive and defensive military work.

LABOR DEPARTMENT.

Labor has a vital bearing upon warfare. More food must be produced; labor produces it. Munitions of war must be provided; labor provides it. Ships must be constructed; labor constructs them. Fuel must be had; again labor is essential.

The Department of Labor, working without the blowing of its own trumpets, has performed signal service since the declaration of war. Incipient strikes have occurred here and there. Serious trouble on more than one occasion threatened. In every instance the representatives of the Department of Labor have hastened to the scene and their efforts at mediation and adjustment have been remarkably successful. This work is just as necessary as the fitting out of an army, because an army and a navy can not be sustained unless the laboring men of this country remain at the forge, the wheel, and the turning lathe, and produce the things required for the conduct of this war.

Differences between the operators and miners of the Central Pennsylvania District No. 2 recently threatened the entire coal output of the largest single bituminous field in the East. Through the mediatory efforts of the Department of Labor a solution was worked out and a strike averted.

Within four days after the Shipping Board appealed for assistance the Department of Labor registered 15,000 shipwrights throughout the country. It is now directing some 35,000 employees each month to work of vital importance in the production of the supplies of war. The United States Boys' Working Reserve, designed to fill depleted ranks on the farms of the country now consists of 120,000 members and is a preparedness move of inestimable value.

The Labor Department has created a public service reserve to classify men who volunteer for service in the time of national need. Men of special qualifications are being secured by the Government through this agency.

Mediators of the Department of Labor have hastened wherever strike troubles have threatened and have been gratifyingly successful in eliminating friction during the past few months. Such a service is invaluable in this hour of national need.

OTHER DEPARTMENTS.

Of the work of other departments, each rendering valuable service within its own sphere, a general summarization must suffice. It is impracticable, for instance, to deal exhaustively with the activities of the Department of State and its international negotiations. Nevertheless, it may be appropriately said that this country has been aroused as never before by the revelations, through the Department of State, of German intrigue and world-wide plotting.

The Department of Justice, likewise, is engaged in a war rôle upon which it is inexpedient to shed full publicity. Every few days the papers tell us of arrests of alien enemies made by agents of the Department of Justice and of the discovery of the machinations of plotters against the peace and security of the United States. This shows to a degree how alert the Department of Justice has been in bringing to account malefactors who threaten the Republic from within.

The chief war-time activity of the Treasury Department has been the floating of the liberty loan of 1917. The greatest bond issue in the history of the world has been and is being sold under the direction of the Secretary of the Treasury. The first liberty loan was oversubscribed by a Nation patriotically anxious to supply the sinews of war. The second liberty loan, for which subscriptions were opened on October 1, is to-day evoking throughout the country a renewed enthusiasm and giving assurance that it, too, will be promptly subscribed.

No more remarkable wartime performance has ever been staged by any Nation. The record will stand always as a monument to the patriotism, intelligence, and generosity of the American people.

The written message will be a boon to our soldiers in France. The Post Office Department has completed arrangements for the quick handling of the mail for our fighters abroad. It has encouraged the giving of books and magazines to the men in camp and behind the battle fronts and has placed its every facility at the disposal of a Government in war.

This same department, however, has found business of a most serious nature to engage a part of its time. The suppression of the publication of seditious utterances, no matter in what form they appear for distribution through the mails, is a matter to which the department has courageously and properly given its attention. The department has found it necessary to deny mail privileges to a number of inflammatory publications, and its vigilance in this respect is to be commended by all true Americans.

INDEPENDENT COMMISSIONS.

The regular governmental agencies and executive departments have been fortunate in calling to their assistance commissions and committees independently formed from the citizenship of the United States. The Council of National Defense, the Fuel Administration, the Food Administration, the Red Cross, and various other advisory bodies have given and are giving patriotic aid to the Chief Executive and his immediate official family during this period of war.

These commissions for the most part are composed of men who are giving their services to the Government and accepting nominal compensation. Many of this country's greatest business men are to-day in Washington at a salary of $1 per year, the law forbidding the Government to accept absolutely free services.

Below there is given a brief and incomplete résumé of what some of these independent but exceedingly helpful agencies have accomplished.

The Council of National Defense is chiefly responsible for the mobilization of the country's resources at the outbreak of the war. It mobilized 262,000 miles of railroad for the country's defense, mobilized the country's wire communication, made an inventory of American industry and prepared it for the reception of unprecedented war orders, and saved the country millions of dollars by bringing about a systematic scheme of purchases.

The council was of great aid in enlisting the best building and architectural experts of the country for the construction of the Army cantonments. It has created an aircraft production board, a medical section, a committee on coal production, and various other committees, including a woman's committee.

The Council of National Defense procured 45,000,000 pounds of copper for uses of the Government at greatly reduced prices, and it brought about advantageous contracts for steel, zinc, and aluminum. Its committees are to-day aiding the departments in practically every branch of warfare and in the coordination of the resources and activities of all sections of the country to the end that the war may be successfully prosecuted.

The Fuel Administration, as previously announced by the President, has carried out the authority of Congress for the fixing of a price on coal. On August 21 the prices of bituminous coal at the mines were provisionally fixed by the President, and two days later the prices of anthracite coal and the margins of jobbers were provisionally fixed and Dr. Harry A. Garfield appoined Fuel Administrator.

The machinery of the Fuel Administration, with ramifications in every State in the Union and every important locality, is now being put in motion. Other important acts of the Fuel Administration include the adjustment of wage disputes between operators and miners, the temporary prohibition of coal shipments into Canada from Lake ports—to relieve the shortage in Northwestern States—and the reduction in price of Pennsylvania anthracite pea coal.

Under authority of the Lever bill the President has appointed Herbert Hoover as Food Administrator, and the Food Administration has already taken practically complete control of the food situation. In August the Food Administration announced its plans for the control of wheat, flour, and bread. Soon thereafter the President, by proclamation, required elevator operators and millers of wheat and rye to procure Federal licenses.

The Food Administration Grain Corporation was chartered on August 16 with a capital of $50,000,000, and Julius H. Barnes was named as chairman. The first conference of food administrators was followed by announcement by the President of a price on wheat, and this was followed by a proclamation requiring importers of sugar, and manufacturers of sugar, sugar sirups, and molasses to secure licenses. An International Sugar Committee has been formed to supervise distribution of the sugar supply and a special appeal has been made for sugar conservation that the shortage in France may be relieved.

The Food Administration has officially designated as "Foodpledge week" the week of October 21–28, and the country has been asked to cooperate with the administration in its conservation work and campaigning to supply the allied nations.

Drafting of Aliens.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. RILEY J. WILSON,

OF LOUISIANA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. WILSON of Louisiana. Mr. Speaker, the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization has reported favorably a bill, H. R. 5667, the effect of which, if passed, would be to bar from American citizenship, now or in the future, all aliens who are natives or subjects of any of the countries now at war with the Imperial German Government or any of the other central powers of Europe if such aliens have claimed or shall hereafter claim exemption from military duty in this country on account of such alienage under the selective draft.

The bill further provides for the deportation of such aliens as shall persist in claiming and exercising such exemptions as undesirables, devoid of patriotism for either adopted or native land, shirkers at home and abroad.

It is further provided that all such aliens who have prior to this act claimed exemption under the selective draft on account of foreign citizenship or allegiance may within 60 days after its passage withdraw such claim for exemption and submit himself to the operation of the draft and thereby be relieved from the effect of this law in relation to the forfeiture of citizenship and deportation. In other words, all natives or subjects of any of the allied countries now in the United States who, except for the fact that they are aliens, would be subject to military duty here under the selective draft, must elect to either come under the provisions of that law or be deemed subject to deportation as undesirables, unworthy immigrants for this country now or in the future.

Under section 2 the President is given authority to draft any alien from any country into the agricultural, industrial, or other activities in the United States when in his judgment such action may be necessary and proper.

Section 3 provides that 30 days after the passage of the act no native or subject af any of the allied powers subject to military duty in his native or own country shall be permitted to enter the United States except upon permission of the President.

Now, gentlemen, in my judgment any law passed upon this subject should embody the substance of all the provisions contained in the House bill reported by the Committee on Immigration and Naturalization.

On June 5 we registered 10,000,000 men within the ages of from 21 to 31, inclusive, of which approximately 1,500,000 were aliens. Of these at least 55 per cent, or approximately 825,000, are natives or subjects of the allied countries. The obligation of these men to render service in this war is the same, if not greater, than ours, and in my judgment no treaty or rule of international courtesy or of diplomatic advisability should release them from military duty or enable them to avoid or escape the duty and obligation that we are imposing upon our own citizens.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I feel that we ought to assume that all that is desired by the alien subjects of the allied countries now in the United States is the opportunity to become a part of our National Army and to join the forces who are to fight for the safety and security of their native land as well as of this land of their present residence; but if there be those who have sought our shores or remain here in order to avoid military service in the country of their nativity or that to which they owe allegiance, then it is only just and fair to their fellows who are fighting at home and to our own people who have joined them in the same cause that they take their places in the ranks of one army or the other. One of the strongest arguments in support of the selective draft is that it imposes equally the obligation of military service upon all those who come under its provisions and owe the duty to take part in this gigantic struggle.

No doubt the greater percentage of the 825,000 young men who are natives or subjects of the allied countries are in the United States in order to enjoy the blessings and take advantage of the opportunities afforded by our democratic institutions. And if so they are under the highest obligation to defend and protect those institutions. If this country is not worth fighting for it is not fit to live in. It is not fair to our own boys that they should be called to the front to fight for the safety of the allied countries of Europe along with our own, while approximately a million men, natives and subjects of those countries, remain upon our free soil, enjoy the blessings and benefits of our institutions, and escape military duty both here and at home. And I feel that we have a perfect right to say, and that it is our duty to say, that those aliens who would pursue such a course are unworthy to remain upon American soil and are forever unfit to assume the proud title of American citizenship. It would be a welcome message to our boys now in the training camps, at home and abroad, for this House to pass such legislation and send them word that we have added 1,000,000 men to the fighting forces of the United States. We can safely assume that these men will grasp the opportunity for military service here, rather than take the chances of deportation and being forever prohibited from the privileges of American citizenship.

Of no less importance is section 3, which excludes from this country in the future, except upon the authorization of the President, anyone subject to military duty in his own country, if he is a native or subject of any of the allied countries. Canada has just passed a selective-draft law, with age limits from 20 to 45 years, and my understanding is that like age limits prevail in many of the allied countries. So it is of the highest importance that we make it impossible for those owing military duty in Canada or in any of the other countries cooperating with the United States in this war to avoid and escape such military service by finding a refuge here. Thousands might seek our shores who would not come under the selective draft in the United States, and without the provisions of this section could not be dealt with under any law now in existence.

Mr. Speaker, we propose to do our part in this war, and no one, judging from recent developments, can doubt that ours is going to be a major part. We propose to seek rather than to dodge an opportunity for effective service. But we would fail to discharge our duty and our obligation to our own people should we not find some way and some effective means and methods by which the aliens, natives and subjects of our allies now in the United States, be made a portion of the fighting forces upon the same basis and under the same conditions as our own citizens.

It will have the effect of making the selective draft more popular with our own military forces as well as the country at large if we can by this legislation make approximately 1,000,000 men additional available for such duty who otherwise would not have been subject to call.

I have no doubt that section 3 will retain for the military forces of the allied countries thousands who otherwise might avoid military duty by seeking refuge in the United States.

If we are going to do international teamwork, there should not be any international slackers.

It is admitted that we have not the legal right to draft aliens into the military service of the United States, but the authority to declare any class of aliens from any country undesirable immigrants and bar them from citizenship here is unquestioned.

The National Prohibition Resolution.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. THOMAS L. BLANTON,
OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, October 5, 1917.

Mr. BLANTON. Mr. Speaker, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks, I feel that some explanation is due to the people of the United States for the failure of the House of Representatives to consider and pass at this extra session the resolution submitting to the States the question of national prohibition.

Especially is this explanation due when we remember that this resolution passed the Senate on August 3, 1917, and no consideration whatever has been given to it by the House, notwithstanding the House has been idle much of the time since said action by the Senate.

It is possibly unknown to the general public that in the Democratic caucus held on March 30, 1917, for the purpose of effecting a Democratic organization of the House, it became necessary, in the interest of harmony and to insure such Democratic organization, to agree that during this extra session no matters would be considered except emergency war legislation. This Democratic caucus agreement therefore has prevented the House of Representatives from doing now what I predict it will do in the next general session, passing the resolution adopted by the Senate.

No longer will the brewers and distillers derive or enjoy any consolation from the great Lone Star State of Texas on this question. On September 10, 1917, the city of Dallas, which is the largest city in the greatest State of the leading Nation of the world, through a vote of its sovereign voters (all men), banished the open saloon from its midst.

On August 2, 1917, the House of Representatives, Thirty-fifth Legislature of Texas, passed the following:

Whereas the United States Senate has passed the Sheppard resolution by more than two-thirds majority submitting to the several States an amendment to the Federal Constitution providing for the prohibition of intoxicating liquors for beverage purposes; and
Whereas this resolution must be passed by the House of Representatives of the United States Congress before it can be ratified by the several States: Therefore be it

Resolved by the House of Representatives of the Texas Legislature in special session assembled, That we urge our Representatives in Congress to use their influence and all honorable means within their power to secure the passage of this amendment in the House of Representatives at the earliest possible date, in order that it may be submitted to the several States and be ratified by them within the time limit fixed in the resolution: And be it further

Resolved, That we congratulate Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD for his untiring efforts in securing the passage of this resolution through the United States Senate, and that the chief clerk of this house be instructed to send a copy of this resolution to Senator MORRIS SHEPPARD and to each Representative from Texas in the United States Congress.

I certify that the above resolution was adopted by the house of representatives, thirty-fifth legislature, August 2, 1917.

BOB BARKER,
Chief Clerk House of Representatives.

On August 3, 1917, the Senate of Texas adopted the following:

Whereas the Senate of the United States has passed a measure that will secure for the people of the United States nation-wide prohibition and thereby conserve the food supply of the country; and
Whereas it is necessary for the House to pass this measure: Therefore be it

Resolved by the Senate of Texas, That we request each and every Congressman from Texas in the present United States Congress to vote for said measure; and that a copy of this resolution be sent to each Member in the House from Texas by the secretary of the senate.

DAYTON, HENDERSON, LATTIMORE, WOODWARD, DECHERD, WESTBROOK, BUCHANAN of Scurry, ROBBINS, SUITER, SMITH, BUCHANAN of Bell, J. M. ALDERDICE.

The foregoing resolution was read and adopted August 3, 1917.

JNO. D. MCCALL,
Secretary of the Senate.

I am placing these resolutions in the RECORD in order that all Members of Congress may have knowledge of same, and in the hopes that same may influence other legislatures of other States to take similar action.

Family Allowance, Indemnity, and Insurance for our Soldiers and Sailors—The Duty of a Just Government.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. JOSHUA W. ALEXANDER,
OF MISSOURI,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. ALEXANDER. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me on yesterday to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the bill (H. R. 5723) to provide family allowances, indemnity, and insurance for our soldiers and sailors I desire to have preserved in the RECORD two very able and patriotic articles written by Hon. William G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury, to whom is due the credit of initiating and promoting the enactment of this beneficent legislation.

The articles referred to are as follows:

FAMILY ALLOWANCE, INDEMNITY, AND INSURANCE FOR OUR SOLDIERS AND SAILORS—THE DUTY OF A JUST GOVERNMENT.

[By W. G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury.]

The number of claims for exemption from military duty under the draft law has caused a painful impression in many quarters, but after all does not the fact that no provision has yet been made by the Government for the support of the wives and children, mothers or fathers, of the men who have been drafted explain many of these claims for exemption?

Under the draft law the Government has the power to require every able-bodied man between 21 and 31 years of age to perform military duty. Thousands of the drafted men are wage earners who married years ago and are the sole support of dependent families. So long as the Government has made no provision for the care of these dependents it is natural that such drafted men should seek to protect their loved ones by staying at home. I am sure that if the Congress should promptly enact the pending war-insurance bill, which makes definite allowances for the support of the dependent wives and children, fathers or mothers, of our soldiers and sailors, claims for exemption on that score will cease. This is an imperative duty of the Government. We can not deprive helpless women and children of the support of the wage earner by forcing him into the military service of the country unless the Government substitutes itself as their support.

Imagine the emotions of the man who is called into the military service of his country with full knowledge that his loved ones are left without means of support and may be reduced to want unless the charity of the community in which they live comes to their relief. It would be nothing less than a crime for a rich and just Government to treat its fighting men so heartlessly and to subject their dependent wives and children, who are unable to fight, to greater suffering than if they could fight.

The morale of an army is as essential to its effective fighting power as guns, ammunition, and other instrumentalities of war. Of equal importance is the morale of the civil population which must support the armies in the field. We can not have this essential morale unless the Nation comforts the men in the ranks with the knowledge that everything possible will be done for them and their families, and renders to the civil population at home the assistance which will make it most effective in upholding the Government and the fighting forces.

The purpose of the war-insurance bill now pending in the Congress is to secure the future of America's soldiers and sailors by insuring their lives and providing adequate compensations and indemnities for loss of life and total or partial permanent disability; also to protect their families against poverty and want by providing them with sufficient means of support during the absence of the men at the front.

The Nation, having been forced to resort to the draft in order to create quickly an army to save the country, is under a higher obligation to do these things for its fighting forces than if a volunteer army only was created. This great and rich Republic can not afford to do less, and it must do what is proposed in a spirit of gratitude and not as charity. Every soldier and sailor who serves his country in this war will earn everything the proposed war-insurance bill provides; to be a beneficiary of the proposed law will be a badge of honor.

When we draft the wage earner we call not only him but the entire family to the flag; the sacrifice entailed is not divisible. The wife and children, the mother, the father, are all involved in the sacrifice—they directly share the burden of defense. They suffer just as much as the soldier, but in a different way, and the Nation must generously discharge as a proud privilege the duty of maintaining them until the soldiers and sailors return from the war and resume the responsibility.

We have drawn the sword to vindicate America's violated rights, to restore peace and justice, and to secure the progress of civilization. We can not permit our soldiers, while they hold the front, to be stabbed in the back by uncertainty as to what is being done for their loved ones at home. Our to-morrows are in their hands—theirs in ours. The national conscience will not permit America's soldiers and their dependents to go unprovided with everything that a just, generous, and noble people can do to compensate them for the sufferings and sacrifices they make to serve their country.

Aside from the care and protection of their dependents while the soldier is alive, the proposed war-insurance act provides for definite compensation for his dependents in case of death, for definite and adequate indemnities in case of total or partial disability, and for reeducation of the maimed and disabled man, so that he may take up a new occupation and make himself a useful member of society. We must restore their efficiency and adjust their still available faculties and functions to suitable trades and vocations, which the injuries of the battle field have not wholly destroyed. The heavy depletions in man power resulting from this conflict, which is without precedent in history or imagination, will place new and greater values upon all forms and degrees of human energy, and demand as a first duty of intelligent government that every remaining useful sense and limb of the blind and crippled shall be reclaimed under the benevolent processes of education and reapplied to economic uses for the benefit of society. The millions we shall be called upon to spend to support the dependents of the soldiers while they are in the fighting line, for indemnities, and for reeducation of the crippled, are in the last analysis investments of the best sort; they are sums of capital advanced by the Nation to promote utility, self-respect, and economic development. More than all, they are essentially humanitarian and in the highest sense a discharge by the Government of an essential duty to society.

Military service is now obligatory; those who imperil themselves have no election. The insurance companies do not and can not permit this fact to affect their calculations. They must protect themselves by charging premiums so high that they are secured against loss no matter how severe the rate of mortality may be. Consequently, the very men who are called into the service because their physical condition is of the best and who as civilians would for that reason be able to secure the most favorable insurance rate in peace time, are denied as soldiers the necessary life insurance to enable them to protect their families and dependents. The tremendous rates charged by private insurance companies to protect them against the extra-hazardous risks of war put insurance entirely beyond the reach of the conscripted soldier.

Military necessity has, therefore, subjected the most fit subjects for insurance to an insurmountable discrimination unless the Government itself supplies insurance at cost and upon a peace basis. It would, in fact, be dastardly and undemocratic if the Government should penalize the soldier who is forced to render the highest duty of the citizen by its failure to provide war insurance upon peace terms and at net cost, first, because the pay of the enlisted men in the Army and Navy is less than the wages and salaries generally earned in private life, which reduces their investing capacity; and, second, because Government insurance is an essential war and emergency measure, inaugurated for the specific benefit of our military forces, and can not and should not be conducted for profit.

Such overhead charges as agents' commissions, advertising, promotion, local rentals, etc., are eliminated. The Government must assume the cost of administering this benevolent agency, just as it bears the cost of administering all other Government agencies established for the benefit of the people.

This legislation will be a great step forward in the recognition of the Republic's duty to its heroes. I consider it the most significant and progressive measure presented to Congress since the declaration of war. It immediately affects the well-being of a greater number of persons than any act with which I am familiar. It deserves the earnest and vigorous support of the country. It provides the broadest and the most liberal protection ever extended by any government to its fighting forces and their dependent families. The United States, the most progressive and prosperous nation on earth, setting an example in the ideals for which enlightened humanity is fighting, should set the highest example of all the nations in the treatment of those who do and die for their country and for world freedom.

We are proposing to expend during the next year more than $10,000,000,000 to create and maintain the necessary fighting forces to reestablish justice in the world. But justice must begin at home; justice must be done to the men who die and suffer for us on the battle fields and for their wives and children and dependents who sacrifice for us at home. To do justice to them requires only a tithe of the money we are expending for the general objects of the war. Let it not be said that noble America was ignoble in the treatment of her soldiers and sailors and callous to the fate of their dependents in this greatest war of all time.

The pending war insurance bill gives compensation, not pensions; it fixes amounts definitely in advance instead of holding out the mere chance of gratuities after the conclusion of peace. It saves the dependents from want and gives them the necessaries of life while their men are at the front. It deals with its heroes liberally for the sufferings that result from their disablement on the field of battle, and, if they die, it makes just provision for the loved ones who survive them. It fosters the helpless and dependent, the maimed and disabled, and recognizes the immensity of the Nation's debt to the valor and patriotism of her heroic sons.

FAMILY ALLOWANCES AND WAR INSURANCE.

[By W. G. McAdoo, Secretary of the Treasury.]

One of the darkest pages in the history of the innumerable wars which have afflicted the earth for centuries is the recorded failure on the part of every nation to make any sort of adequate provision for those who have had to sacrifice and suffer most, namely, the soldiers who were sent to the front and their wives, children, and other dependents who were left at the rear. Until the European war broke out this question of fundamental justice and humanity to the fighting men and their dependents seems never to have received proper consideration.

There is no more paramount duty than for each nation which is sending its men to war to tell them in advance, as a part of the just consideration for the priceless service they are called upon to perform, what will be done for them in the way of actual compensations for the injuries and disabilities they incur, what will be done for the support of their wives, children, and other dependents while they are away from home, and what will be done for these same dependents if death overtakes them.

Some of the belligerents have provided for certain allowances to dependent families while the men are alive, for certain compensations to the dependents in case of death, and for certain indemnities and compensations in case the men are totally or partially disabled in the service. But these steps, advanced as they are, are not enough. It remains for the American people, the richest and most prosperous on earth, the most able to do justice to its fighting men and their dependents, and the most humane and progressive in their ideas and ideals, to set an example to the world of just, generous, and appreciative treatment of their heroes.

The war-insurance bill now pending in the Congress is the most advanced and humane step ever taken by any nation to protect and justly compensate its fighting men and their dependents. It ought to be passed, and quickly passed. The selfish interests of no class of people or organized body should be permitted to stand one instant in the way of this elemental and essential act of justice and humanity.

Heretofore it has been the practice of nations at war to leave the wives, children, and other dependents of their soldiers unprovided for at home, at the mercy of charity, to become charges upon the communities in which they live, to endure all of the humiliations which proud people must experience when they realize that they are public charges, to say nothing of the unsatisfied wants which charity does not reach, and the suffering inevitably resulting from such a distressing condition of affairs.

The nations of the world have failed to realize that when men are called to the colors their families and dependents are also called and are equally compelled to make terrible sacrifices. Until this fundamental fact is driven into the consciousness of the people, we can not deal intelligently, justly, or humanely with this burning problem of every war, this problem that reaches down into and tears the very heartstrings of humanity.

Once we grasp the fact that the commandeered soldier means also the commandeered family and dependents of the soldier, we have advanced to the point where we can consider the problem humanely and justly and apply the necessary remedy. We can not, of course, compensate for the destroyed life, the hopelessly mutilated and maimed body, the agony of the suffering wife and children, mother and father, but we can ameliorate these sufferings; we can mitigate the horrors of war to the extent that we provide against want and needless suffering. The practice of most nations has been to fight wars to a conclusion regardless of the essential sacrifices of the fighting forces and the sufferings of their dependents, and, then, after the war—perhaps many years after the war—to do tardy and partial justice by passing pension bills, with their accompaniments of favoritism and political expediency, inequalities, and inequities, so that those who are favored with influence get the largest consideration and those who have none get little or nothing. The years of suffering before even these pension provisions are made, have gone and can never be compensated for, and the losses incurred during that interval can never be restituted.

Under this old unfair and unjust method no man knows what is going to happen to him or his dependents. He is left to the uncertain chances of the future. We know from history that nations have been, as a rule, notoriously ungrateful in all these matters. We have only to read the pages of our revolutionary history to have our cheeks burn with shame at the ingratitude of the Colonies to the gallant men in the Continental Armies who fought for and secured the liberties we enjoy today. But why dwell upon the injustices and inhumanities of the past? Let us turn our vision to the future and make reparation for all the delinquencies by doing now these humane and just things which will mitigate not alone the rigors and horrors of war, but will give our men, as they go forward to fight, a higher courage and renewed inspiration to sacrifice to the utmost, knowing, as they then will, that their Government will not permit their loved ones to starve if they perish, nor them to become charges upon the communities in which they live if they return sightless, legless, armless, or otherwise totally or partially disabled for the remainder of their days.

Not only is it the very essence of intelligence and humanity to give our men and their dependents these grateful and soothing assurances, but it is economy of the highest order to make our fighting forces all the more effective through the splendid morale and spirit with which this knowledge will infuse them, and the morale and esprit with which this knowledge will inspire the civil population, through whose industry and patriotism the fighting forces in the field must be supported.

Therefore, we should let every man and his dependents know, as that man goes to the front, that the Government is going to do the following things as a part of the compensation for the patriotic service he is going to render, and not as a gratuity or as charity or as a pension:

First. The Government will make an adequate monthly payment to the dependents of the soldier so long as he is away from home and alive. The bill provides that each soldier must give to his wife and children at least $15 per month out of his pay. The Government will add another $15 for a wife alone, with an increase for each child. For instance, a wife and two children would receive a total of $47.50 per month. If the man has neither wife nor child, but has a parent, grandparent, brother, or sister actually dependent upon him for support, the Government will make an allowance to them, provided the man himself gives them at least $15 a month out of his pay. In that case the Government will allow $10 a month for each parent and $5 a month for each brother and sister. Even if a man has a wife and child and these other relatives are actually dependent upon him, the Government will make an allowance to them if the man gives them at least $5 a month out of his own pay. The highest amount the Government will give over and above the amount the man gives out of his own pay is $50 per month.

Second. If the soldier is killed in battle or dies as a result of wounds or disease incurred in the service, the Government will pay a minimum of $30 per month to the widow alone, with an additional allowance for each child, so that for a widow and four children the total payment per month will be $60.

Third. If a man comes back partially or totally disabled permanently, the Government will pay him certain specific amounts ranging from $40 to $200 per month to compensate for such disabilities.

Fourth. The Government will educate the disabled man for a new trade or occupation if his injuries are of such a character that he can not resume the trade or occupation in which he was engaged at the outbreak of the war. This will give each disabled man the hope of increased efficiency and earning power in addition to the compensation the Government allows him, making him a more useful citizen and effective economic unit while he lives, and adding to the happiness of his remaining years.

Fifth. In addition to these benefits, the Government will give to each of the officers and enlisted men of the Army and Navy the right to buy from the Government $1,000 to $10,000 of life insurance at a rate based upon the American Experience Table of Mortality in peace time, which rate, according to actuaries, will average about $8 per annum for each $1,000 of insurance. This means that insurance is brought within the reach of every private soldier in the ranks, and that he is given the opportunity of making additional provision for his loved ones by insuring his own life, and thus supplementing, in case of his death, the compensation the Government pays to his dependents. To illustrate: A private soldier receives in the foreign service $33 per month, or $396 per annum. Under the law he would contribute one-half of this amount, or $198 per annum, to the support of his family. He could take out $10,000 insurance, at a cost of $80 per annum, to be payable to his family in annual installments covering a period of years. The soldier would have left $118 per year, or almost $10 per month—more than enough for his ordinary needs while he is on the battle front or in the training camps.

Why is this insurance not only just but important? Because the amount the Government will pay to the soldier's dependents in case of death, however generous it may be, may be wholly inadequate to sustain the soldier's family in the position in life to which they are accustomed, or to give them the advantages they ought to have.

Take the case of a man killed in battle, leaving a wife and four children: The Government will pay his widow $60 monthly, or a total of $720 per annum. This may be wholly insufficient. If the soldier can take out $10,000 of insurance at a premium of $80 per annum, the Government will pay to his wife an additional $500 per annum for a period of 20 years, thus bringing the total annual payments to the wife and four children up to $1,220 per annum. Even this is a modest income, but it might be sufficient to enable the wife to support herself and children and give them the advantages of education.

Why must the Government provide this insurance? Because when the Government drafts the soldier and puts him into this extraordinarily hazardous war service, private life insurance companies will not write insurance on his life, or, if they will, the rates are prohibitive. The lowest rate I have heard suggested for such private insurance is $58 per thousand for one year, renewable term. The next year the rate might be greatly increased. Where the soldier is receiving only $396 per annum pay, he is unable to take much, if any, insurance at the rate of $58 per thousand. The Government, therefore, has deprived the soldier of the opportunity to insure himself. It has destroyed the soldier's insurability. The least the Government can do is to make restitution to the extent of providing insurance upon the peace-time basis and taking up or absorbing the cost of the excessive risk to which it has subjected the soldier. It is, moreover, the just and humane thing to do. The Government must go to the limit to put the soldier in as favorable a position as possible to protect his loved ones when he, without any fault of his own, is taken by the Government and subjected to the extraordinary hazards of war, where his very life may be taken for the benefit of his country.

Not alone should the Government give the soldier life insurance at these peace rates because it has destroyed his insurability, but also because the Government has destroyed a large part of the soldier's earning power when it drafts him into the service. Many men have been drafted or enrolled in the Army and Navy who are earning salaries of from $1,200 to $5,000 per annum. The moment the Government puts a man in the service as a private soldier it destroys his entire earning power, except to the extent of $396 a year. The Government, in fact, not only conscripts the man's life but it conscripts all of his earning power beyond the $396 per annum it pays him. Having therefore reduced the soldier's earning power so that he is unable to pay the excessive insurance rates ($58 per thousand) demanded by private companies, it is the imperative duty of the Government to make restitution at least to the extent of giving the drafted man the chance to buy insurance on a peace-time basis.

Who with blood in his veins, patriotism in his heart, and justice in his soul can deny to the men and their families, who must suffer, more than any other class of our people, the horrors of this world carnage and war, these poor compensations? Who would submit to torturing agonies of soul and mind our gallant soldiers and sailors by withholding from them the knowledge that their wives and helpless children will not be dependent for support upon charity while they are fighting at the front? Humanity and justice cry out against such monstrous indifference as that would be.

It has been intimated that the organized insurance companies of the United States may oppose this legislation. I do not believe it. It is not conceivable that in a time like this men would be so callous and visionless. Men of vision and humanity will get behind this bill and not in front of it. But if any such effort should be made, who is willing to listen to the selfish cry of organized insurance companies that their interests may suffer if the Government dares to be humane and just to its heroes? Can we for one instant permit any selfish interest, however organized and wherever existent, to stand in the way of humanity and justice? Shall we subordinate the interests of the Nation? Shall we imperil the cause of liberty in the world by failing to do justice to our fighting men and their dependents in order that the selfish interests of any private corporations or organizations may be conserved? I can not believe that any organized effort will be made to prevent this just legislation, but if such an attempt should be made, we should welcome the opportunity to arouse the conscience and soul of America against any such selfish purpose or demand.

It has been intimated, also, that those who are wedded to the pension system might oppose this measure. I do not believe that. This insurance bill does not affect existing pension laws, although it is intended to be a substitute for and to make unnecessary future pension laws to cover this war. Nor does it interfere with or in any manner change or modify provisions already made for the gallant men who fought in our previous wars. They are not disturbed. I believe that every old soldier who fought in any American war for his country's rights and liberties will support this measure, because nobody knows better than these old soldiers how derelict our Government and every Government has been in the past in doing justice to its fighting men and their dependents. They, above all others, should want justice done to those who suffer most for the services they render to their country.

America is holding aloft the torch of liberty in the world. Can she hold it aloft with honor if her soul is dead to the sufferings of her own children? Can she refuse to do justice to her own dead and dying and suffering while she claims to be rendering a service of justice to the rest of mankind?

Let us not hesitate to go forward in this fight for America's rights, for liberty and justice with all the might and power and courage of the Nation; let us, at the same time, make our efforts ten thousand times more effective by setting an example to the world of what a mighty, just, humane, and courageous Nation can do for its own people who are called upon to make supreme sacrifices in order that the world shall be free.

The Constitution of a World Court.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. WILLIAM J. SEARS,

OF FLORIDA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. SEARS. Mr. Speaker, under the leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD I include an article on the constitution of a world court.

The article is as follows:

THE CONSTITUTION OF A WORLD COURT.

[By A. S. Hough, editor Florida Times-Union, Jacksonville, Fla].

To secure peace, nations need only imitate measures that individuals adopted to suppress violence and replace it with justice and good order.

When men realizing the fact that wrong was as apt as right to triumph when armed strength was the arbiter between nations, gave their minds to the purpose of securing something better, their thoughts turned to arbitration and conciliation and arbitration treaties were written. It is probable that in the earlier days this was the first resort of individuals. We have no proofs of it, for history is not old enough to tell us, but the reasonableness of the supposition is sufficient to gain for it credence. It is probable, it is almost certain, that before individuals organized for the suppression of violence, the more thoughtful among them appealed to their fellows to leave the settlement of disputes to the decision of impartial outsiders instead of fighting them out to the victory of the strong and the injury and humiliation of the weak.

But we need no testimony from history to convince us that this accomplished only in part the desired result. Our knowledge of human nature is sufficient to assure us of this. Physical violence became less common, but it did not disappear, and the victor instead of losing caste, gained not only in the respect that is accorded to power but also in the admiration that is won by prowess.

It is probable that in some cases arbitration treaties have prevented war, but if so they have prevented it from a distance, not close at hand. They may have kept nations from the verge of war, but not from fighting when they were face to face with it and inflamed with passion.

Another weakness of arbitration is the fact that some nations will not adopt it, and the fingers of one hand are enough to represent the nations that will apply it universally. Two strong nations that are afraid to fight each other may agree to arbitrate their disputes, but arbitration is a very poor protection to the weak members of the family of nations.

Still another objection is the fact that arbitration is not adapted to the purpose of securing justice. It aims at conciliation and compromise. In nine cases out of ten the majority of the members of a board of arbitration seek neither justice nor compromise. They seek to secure everything possible for the party appointing them. Arbitration offsets the partisanship of one side against the partisanship of the other and leaves a third member of the board to decide how much can be given to one side and how much to the other, so as to leave each not entirely dissatisfied.

The next station on the road toward general peace was the conception of a court, whose decisions the nations establishing it would agree to obey and to enforce if necessary. This court was to be granted no force of its own to compel obedience. It was to rely for the enforcement of its decrees on the promises of the nations forming it. It is quite probable that this was also the next step with individuals when they wished to suppress violence. They agreed among themselves that they would combine to enforce a common purpose, but whether they did combine or not depended on a number of things. It depended on the strength of the man or men they had agreed to combine against. It depended also on whether they were friendly or unfriendly to the man or men they were called on to control, and whether friendly or unfriendly to the man or men they were called on to protect.

This is an objection to an international court depending for the enforcement of its decrees on the actions of the nations creating it. Nations as well as men have their likes and dislikes. Would England, say in five years after the close of the war now in progress, send her troops for the enforcement of a decree in favor of Germany and against France? Would Germany send hers to enforce a decree in favor of Italy and against Austria? It is not certain or even extremely probable that a nation would help to enforce a decree in favor of an enemy and against a friend, treaty or no treaty. It was a German chancellor who first referred to a treaty as a scrap of paper, but treaties had been treated as such for centuries. And, besides, treaties expire and can be abrogated.

In order to attain the nearest possible approach to a complete cessation of personal violence individuals formed governments and gave them the force necessary to enable them to compel obedience to the laws that were adopted. We call the things that keep order governments—not influences. The good yield to influences, but the bad yield only to force, and these are the ones that need to be restrained. We can never have the certainty of international peace until we set up over nations a power clothed with force of its own to keep the peace.

This very thing the States now forming this Union did when they united for mutual defense and for other purposes. No State has made war on another State, and this has not been due entirely to the fact that it had agreed not to and had arranged other methods of settling interstate disputes but is due in part to the fact that it had helped to create a power so immeasurably superior to the power of any one of them that no State could have any hope of success in opposing it.

Some one may ask: "How can it be said that a State never made war on another State when the land is dotted with the graves of men slain in a war between the North and the South?" It was not a war between one State and another or several States and others for the forcible settlement of disputes arising between them. It was an attempt on the part of a number of States to withdraw from the Union.

Without noticeable exception the people of the South thought they had this right, as a nation may abrogate a treaty, and a majority thought it would not be opposed. HENRY CABOT LODGE had expressed the strong belief that when the Union was formed there was not one among the men who made its Constitution who held any doubt of the rights of any State to withdraw from it at will. This fact is mentioned not with a view of discussing the dead issue of secession but to show that the war it caused was not thought to be a war of one State on another.

The success of the American experiment has led some men to talk of the United States of Europe or of the United States of the World. This is not only unnecessary but is extremely undesirable. It is much better for the nations to preserve their sovereignty than to merge it into a government controlling the world. The interests, the tempers, the habits, of different peoples demand separate governments, and these should be retained, but the right to decide international disputes should be surrendered to an international tribunal which should be given control of a force sufficient to compel obedience to its decrees.

This could be done without interfering in the slightest degree with the legitimate sovereignty of the nations. The sovereignty of a nation is to the nation what the freedom of the citizen is to the citizen. Is the citizen less free because of the fact that he is not permitted to take a gun and kill another with whom he is engaged in a dispute? Would a nation be less sovereign if it were not permitted to call out its millions and deluge the world with blood?

The nations can give up the right to make war without surrendering one iota of any other right. Among the expressions of those who advocate the creation of a tribunal for the settlement of international disputes we find some proposing sessions regularly or from time to time of international legislative bodies. There should be no such bodies. Let the British Parliament legislate for Great Britain and our Congress for the United States. The world needs no legislation. We have already enough of what is called international law and should be called international advice, for there is no force to compel obedience to it. We need no international legislation. An international tribunal could follow in the paths already developed, and if they give out, could continue in the direction to which they point.

What is needed is a tribunal that would be omnipotent to prevent war and powerless to do anything else. Such a tribunal could be created, and perhaps the briefest and clearest way of suggesting its constitution and scope may be given in an outline of an agreement, as follows:

1. The nations entering into this agreement hereby pledge themselves to create a tribunal for the settlement of all disputes that may arise between any two or more of them or between any one or more of them and a nation or nations not signing, disputes that, if not so settled, might result in war. They reserve to themselves the right to settle by diplomacy, or, both parties consenting, by arbitration, any questions that can be so settled, or in any other manner except by war. This tribunal shall not assume jurisdiction over any question but shall try only cases referred to it.

2. This tribunal shall consist of one member from each nation constituting it for each 5,000,000 of its inhabitants or fractional part in excess of one-half that number. These members shall be chosen in such a manner as to secure the selection only of men of the highest intelligence and uprightness.

3. The names of the members selected by each nation shall be announced as soon as the selection of the entire list from that nation is complete and shall be furnished to all the other nations entering into this agreement. If any signatory nation objects to any name selected it shall be withdrawn and another be substituted. Such objection must be made within 30 days of the announcement of the names.

4. When the list is perfected, the members so chosen shall constitute a list from which juries may be selected to try all cases brought before the tribunal.

5. The members of this tribunal shall be chosen for life or good behavior, the question of good behavior to be decided by the tribunal itself.

6. All members chosen to serve on this tribunal shall declare on oath that if called on to try any dispute between nations they will decide according to the evidence brought before them and render a just verdict. They shall also declare on oath that they have no prejudice for or against any nation that might prevent them from rendering a just verdict for or against it.

7. As soon as a number of nations, sufficient to put it in operation, have entered into this agreement and have selected their representatives, territory—preferably insular—shall be acquired for the location of this tribunal and all members who have been chosen to serve on it and who have accepted shall move to this territory and shall reside thereon as long as their term of service continues.

8. They shall be required to renounce their allegiance to the country from which they were appointed and to take the oath of allegiance to the tribunal of the world.

9. They shall elect one of their number as executive to enforce the decrees that the international juries may render. The term of the executive shall be determined by the members of the tribunal and they shall have power to remove him at any time by a majority vote.

10. When a disputed question is brought before this tribunal for adjudication printed lists of the members shall be furnished to the representatives of each of the parties litigant, together with the names of the country from which each was appointed. The names of all members appointed from the nations involved in the dispute shall be stricken for cause. From the names remaining each party shall strike alternately till only the requisite number remain to try the case. These shall be asked if they have any prejudice for or against either of the nations litigant, and if one of them admits such prejudice he shall be excused and the member whose name was last stricken shall be substituted in his place. When the jury is chosen each member shall swear to well and truly try the case and render a verdict according to the evidence.

11. When the selection of the jury is complete, all who have not been selected to serve shall be excluded from the court room and no attorney or member of the jury shall be permitted to discuss the evidence outside of the court room.

12. When the case has been heard, counsel shall retire and the jury shall decide on a verdict. If the decision is unanimous it shall be certified to the Executive, who shall proceed to enforce it, and any evidence that may have been produced may be made public.

13. If the jury is not unanimous the number voting on each side shall be written and placed in a sealed envelope, and the men whose names were last striken shall be summoned to serve on a second jury which shall try the case under the same rules as were observed by the first. If this jury is unanimous, its verdict shall be certified to the Executive and by him be enforced. If the decision of the second jury is not unanimous, it shall record and seal the number voting in favor of each litigant. The envelopes containing the vote of each of the two juries shall then be opened and if the majority of each voted for the same litigant, the decision in favor of such litigant shall be final and shall be certified to the Executive for enforcement.

14. No orders from the Executive for military preparation shall be valid unless they state the fact of the trial of the case and the verdict of the jury.

15. The nations establishing this tribunal may, for police purposes, each maintain an establishment of civilian soldiers not exceeding in number the number of troops it contributes to the army of the international tribunal. These shall be kept, when their services are not needed, in the cities or towns in which they are engaged in business, and they shall be enlisted with the express provision that they are not to be called on to serve outside of the limits of the nation enlisting them except when called on to do so at the request of the international tribunal.

16. The nations forming the international tribunal shall contribute to its army and navy in proportion to their representation. In case of emergency they shall sustain its decisions with their full strength or so much of it as may be called for. Such nations shall also contribute to the maintenance of this tribunal in proportion to their representation thereon.

17. Any nation may withdraw from this agreement one year after giving notice of such intention.

Much of the above is mere detail that can be changed without impairment of the essentials of the plan.

The clause authorizing withdrawal after a year's notice is a nonessential one and was suggested more as a prohibition against withdrawal without a year's notice than as permission to withdraw after the lapse of that length of time. With no statement on this subject some of the nations might feel at liberty to withdraw at any ime. It was also intended as an encouragement to join for such as might feel that without a provision for withdrawal they would be irrevocably committed. No nation would be apt to withdraw with the intention of going to war if it would have to wait a year before doing so. No nation once entering into this agreement would be apt to withdraw at all, for it would divest itself of the protection of the combination while still having to face its power if it attacked another defended by it.

The essentials of the plan are:

First. A power that could prevent war but that could not interfere in the internal affairs of any nation.

The members of this tribunal would be only private citizens of the world liable to international jury service. They would have no legislative power. They would exercise no public functions at all, except when called on to serve on a jury, and their public capacity in this respect would end with the verdict.

The executive would not be a king of kings—he would be merely an international sheriff, powerless to act until called on to enforce a decree of the tribunal and then governed entirely by that decree.

Second. A system of securing justice through a jury of judge-sized men who would be surrounded by all the safeguards designed for securing justice from men of only average character and attainments.

Third. A choice by elimination instead of selection which would make it impossible for the litigants to secure for service men supposed to be favorable to them, but would leave for that purpose such men as were believed by both sides to be fair-minded and impartial.

There are reasons for thinking a tribunal of this kind would be much better than a fixed court of judges. If 8, 10, or 12 judges were selected to try all matters of dispute between nations, the certainty and permanence of their power would give them a vast influence with nations forming the court. Each nation would know who would decide any dispute in which it might become involved and would try to win the favor of the judges. With an international jury list, however, no nation would know who would decide its dispute, but each would know that if there were any reason to think it had won the favor of any eligible for service, its opponent would strike off the name of such eligible.

Generally speaking, judges are a very high order of men, but they are men with all the weaknesses and faults, more or less developed, that lead men astray. It is not inconceivable that some of the judges might yield sometimes to corrupting influences. With a jury list no litigant would know whom to approach.

The majority of the judges would have likes for one nation and dislikes for another, and it is not always possible for a judge to avoid being influenced by his feelings. But all litigants would be compelled to appear before these judges. Some time or other a nation would know that its cause was being tried before a judge bitterly inimical to it. With a jury list such men would be stricken off, but the judges would have to be taken as they were found. And the fact should be kept in mind that the men in one case would be as high in character and intelligence as in the other, but in one case the tribunal would have to be accepted in its entirety, while in the other all to whom the slightest suspicion of objection could be found would be eliminated until only the best of the good remained.

The greatest trouble that has been found in the effort to agree on a plan for a fixed court of judges has sprung from the disputes as to representation on such court. One reason why each nation has insisted on representation is its desire to try its causes of dispute before its own judge. With the jury list plan the representatives of the nation's litigant would be excluded.

Another trouble is national pride. Some propose a court composed of appointees of the great powers. Such a court might be respected, but only for its power. Its basis would not be right; it would be strength, and its existence would be a constant reminder that the great powers were the bosses of the earth.

Those who wish to broaden the representation of the court as much as possible are confronted by the fact that the greater nations demand a representation proportional to their population, while the smaller ones demand equal representation. The same dispute retarded the formation of this Union until it was settled by compromise. No objection would be found to having an international jury list based on population, for the men on such list would be only private citizens and the members appointed from the smaller countries would probably be selected on juries oftener than those from the great nations, for it would be believed that they would be more apt to be impartial.

With a representation based on population, China would have more members of the world's jury list than any other nation. China has some great statesmen; but if this were not so, no nation would be compelled to try its cause before a jury wholly or in part Chinese. It could strike them from the list.

The salaries of the men selected for the world's tribunal need not be more in the aggregate than one hour's cost of the war now in progress.

The scholarly, philanthropic men who ought to be selected for such a position would care less for money than for the honor and the grand humanitarianism of their work. They would not demand the pay that is given to the high officials of huge corporations. The entire annual cost, including the maintenance of the Army and Navy, need be no more than one week's cost of the big war, and it would be distributed among the nations of the whole world and be met by them as a rule at one-fifth of what they pay for their war preparations in time of peace.

Would this plan be easy of adoption? It would if the people of the earth really desire to end war. No nation would give up anything except its power to make war. No nation can hope to abolish war without giving up this power. One thing that would make the nations readier to accept a proposition of this kind would be their confidence that its adoption would secure justice. If the international jury plan were believed to furnish the strongest assurance of justice, it would be the plan most readily adopted.

It need not wait for the agreement of the whole world.

Any three nations could adopt it and combine their defensive strength by doing so. A fourth, threatened by a stronger nation, would seek it as a city of refuge. Until the league had attained great strength it might not be well to make an iron-clad rule to admit and defend every applicant, but it would grow to a strength that would enable it to throw the protection of its justice over any nation that wished to be admitted.

Now, in this hour of national war madness the time is ripe for the discussion of plans looking to permanent peace, for while the nations are war mad the peoples are war sick. We do not know when the end will come, but of this we may be sure: When the armies are called from the field to the farm and the factory once more, men of all nations will be firmly resolved that this tragedy of tragedies shall never again blight the earth. Some plan will be devised for preventing war, and the world was never as ready as now for suggestions. The act of one assassin has cost the lives of millions, and men understand better than ever before the costliness, the folly, and the uselessness of war.

Effective Insurance for Privates.

HON. EDWARD C. LITTLE,

OF KANSAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, September 13, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 5723) to amend an act entitled "An act to authorize the establishment of a Bureau of War-Risk Insurance in the Treasury Department," approved September 2, 1914, and for other purposes.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, those who present this bill to the House advance the theory that it is a beneficent and philanthropic effort to improve the pension system of the Republic and give to the soldier and his dependents better treatment and a higher order of care than has been accorded them during the last half century. The loftiness of the motives they announce, and the extent of the contract they undertake challenges our admiration and our most careful consideration, in view of the fact that it comes from those who have not been the most enthusiastic supporters of the pension system heretofore. Possibly the gentleman from Georgia [Mr. ADAMSON], chairman of the Interstate Commerce Committee, which reported this bill, shed some useful light upon its purposes and the reasons for its existence when he suggested to the House last Monday—

> I recognize that in the past pensions have been distributed through one section of the country mostly, and it is not unnatural that through the other section of the country such bills should have been unpopular. I recognize that, and I deplore it.

One of the improvements suggested for the benefit of the soldier and his family is this clause which we are now seeking to amend, which provides that no soldier shall be compensated for any disability incurred while serving his country unless he makes application within one year, and which provides that no family shall receive compensation for the death of their husband and father unless they make application within one year therefrom. This farsighted and benevolent application of the statute of limitations to the men who die in battle for their country does not, I find, commend itself to the hearty approval which I would much like to give to all the terms of this measure, a measure which will receive my vote partly because if we do not enact this statute we will not have the opportunity to pass any to meet the wants and necessities of our soldiers and their families. To be frank about it, I would like this bill better if the widows of men who served the Union and freed the slaves and the men who enfranchised Cuba and planted our flag on the other side of the world were placed on the same plane as the dependents of the soldiers who go to Europe.

There is a phase of this immediate amendment under discussion to strike out the statute of limitations which might not occur to the Members of the House who have not served in the Army on the firing line. Every regiment that has achieved success in battle has an esprit du corps which holds its men up to a high standard which often prevents them from reporting minor diseases and minor wounds to the surgeon. In any fighting regiment soldiers will often refuse to go to the doctor and tell him when they are sick, in order that they may proudly boast, "I never was on the sick report." The younger they are the more apt they are to be governed by this idea. So it happens that in after years, when they have large families and small means, and the wounds and diseases of their old service begin to undermine their constitutions, they have no sick report to direct the attention of the Pension Bureau to, and with great difficulty establish just claims which more prudent comrades easily sustain.

On the evening of the Battle of Guiguinto, in March, 1899, Capt. George Watson came to me and remarked that Carey Amsbaugh had been struck on the head by a bullet, which left a lump bigger than an egg, and that Carey, who was a fine soldier, contemptuously refused to make any report of it at all. Watson who fought at Wounded Knee in the Regular Army and was familiar with what the soldiers need, suggested that I endeavor to have Amsbaugh make his report, as he might need it later. The boy did not, and years after we had to make affidavits to the fact. Many, many times we who were out with these boys find that a man has been slightly wounded or has some ailment and makes no report, and years after we all have to help get together the evidence that would be read into the records the moment he reported to the doctor, if he had done so. Again and again Members of this Congress have had occasion to assist veterans of the Civil War under similar conditions. When you put this statute of limitations into the bill you tie a string to everything you have promised the soldier in this bill. The gallant boys who march with beating drums and flying banners onto the field of battle are the very ones who would neglect to attend to the petty details that find their place in a lawyer's office, and it was the hand of a lawyer, not of a soldier, not of a philanthropist, that wrote this clause into this bill.

Those who desire, if there be such, to take advantage without just cause of the provisions of such a statute, are the very ones who would be the most careful in complying with its technical demands. You put a handicap on the very best men of the Army by raising the statute of limitations against them. Under this rule, a man might be wounded in action in France and taken to die in a German prison camp, and there would be no way in which his family could know whether he was dead or alive for years, and you refuse his people a pension because they did not file a claim in time, while they were weeping for him who disappeared in the abyss of battle and left no record that they could make affidavit to. We see the list of the dead and the wounded, but how many hearts are wrung when they read the list of those missing, the boys who lay with their limbs shot to pieces and are never heard of for months, and are lying alone in some European cottage or some German prison camp while the statute of limitations runs against them. The "expert" who wrote this bill should have consulted the soldiers who fought for their country before he presumed to set himself up as an expert on what the soldiers need. I hope the amendment offered by the gentleman from Ohio will prevail.

Do not tell the heroes of the Republic that you have them under suspicion when you send them off to die and that you propose to bar their claims unless they comply with the technical terms which lie hidden and unknown to them within the statute you hold out as their reward and compensation. What kind of encouragement is this to the men who crowd your transports, to say to them as they start, "Now, be careful, we are watching you; do not you try to put anything over on the Pension Bureau; we have fixed it so you can not accomplish that." The gentleman from Georgia very aptly quoted from "Horatius at the Bridge" in support of this measure—how "they gave him of the cornland." But, gentlemen of the House, there was no statute of limitations against Horatius. Such an enactment would not be fair, would not be just, would not be an incentive to heroic conduct. The young men who go off to war have souls unmarked—as white as the parchment on which your laws are written. Do not put a bar sinister across their reputations. Put the statute of limitations on anybody except the man who is too proud to report every minor casualty which may sometime determine the length of his lease of life. If you had served three months in the Army somewhere, you would not think of enacting a statute of limitations against the soldiers of the Republic, who will carry its banners in the greatest battles of all time. [Applause.]

* * * * * * *

Mr. LITTLE. Gentlemen of the committee, the acid test of the bill is whether it will help the enlisted man. The officers are always taken care of just as the men who are able to take care of themselves are always looked after in all legislation. The officers draw considerable salaries. Those of the Regular Army have life jobs. Many of the officers will receive larger incomes than in times of peace. This bill provides that members of the Army may take insurance to the amount of $10,000 at the rate of approximately $8 a thousand per annum. Probably every officer in the Army will take the very limit of this insurance. To a man drawing $1,800 or $2,000 a year $80 per annum for insurance is a small item. Nowhere else can he secure as cheap insurance. The committee has informed us that this insurance would cost about $58 a thousand at home. When the Government issues a man a thousand dollars of insurance at $8 per year, it simply gives him the $50 difference per year. When the officer takes out $10,000 in insurance the Government makes him a present of $500 a year under the terms of this proffered statute.

But what about the private soldier who is working for $33 a month, half of which he does not receive for the present? Whether it goes to his family or is put to his credit at the close of the war, the actual income of the boy in France will be about $16. In other words, the young men in Europe will receive their board and clothes and less than $200 a year. It is very doubtful whether there is a man in the United States who with that small an income is taking insurance. In order to get men with small incomes or reasonable incomes to take out insurance, it is absolutely necessary to send armies of skilled talkers to induce them to consider the proposition. Yet here you have told these boys getting $200 a year that they can take out insurance if they want to. Vast numbers of them will never hear of the opportunity. Those who have families will send home every cent they can. Is there a business man on this floor who seriously thinks that this provision means anything or is of any real value to the private soldier? Ninety per cent of these men will not even consider the idea of taking out any insurance. Suppose you were 25 years old, 5,000 miles from home, fighting in the trenches, and were brought back of the line for a few days' rest, or on a furlough in Paris occasionally. Imagine spread before you all the fascinations and temptations and curiosities and opportunities for amusement, for education in the Old World, how much do you suppose you would spend of the $200 a year for insurance? Every officer with a salary of $125 a month and more will take the insurance if he has any business judgment at all.

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I want to ask the gentleman if he will not wait until we get to Article IV of insurance.

Mr. LITTLE. I will say to the gentleman from Georgia that I will cover this proposition soon, and probably he will save the time if I do so now. I am surprised at the impatience of some of us here when we come to discuss measures of this importance. The Congress of the United States takes up legislation of vital interest to its Army, and somebody moves that this debate close in 40 minutes.

We are told that Gen. Pershing says that these boys ought not to be allowed more than $10 a month. It appears that the American soldiers with $11 a month each to spend are about to wreck business, demolish society, and break up social conditions over in France. [Laughter.]

Ninety per cent of the soldiers in a foreign land who will draw $15 or $16 a month will have it all spent before the month is half through and will be borrowing money till next pay day. How could there be a more hollow mockery than offering boys like that an imaginary opportunity to buy insurance? Do you expect to turn them loose in a foreign land without friends, without society, and imagine that they will not spend a little money? Are there no nickel shows in France? Most of the Members of this Congress will go home broke from this session probably, and if your boy is at the front you will be sending him money. Gentlemen, when you enact legislation for the benefit of private soldiers you must put yourself in the place of the private soldier. If you were young again your money would be scattered from the seaport to the trench, at every counter, at every wayside inn, at every shop where appetite is tempted or fascinating sales people tender the wares of an unknown people. [Laughter.] These boys will spend this money, and they are not going to spend it for insurance, and they will buy none of this insurance, and as this bill is drawn the private soldier will not get anything out of it, and you are doing nothing for him.

Here you have a clause which says that the soldier's widow will receive $25 a month, and these experts knew when they drew it that, as far as possible, we were sending only single men to the front, and that soldiers' widows will be as scarce as hens' teeth, as they are lost in a hundred million of people at home. How many soldiers' widows will draw pensions for men slain on the battle fields of France if you send nothing but single men? Gentlemen, this is not the way to help the enlisted man. Your bill does not stand the acid test. I think we have all observed by this time that the men who drew this bill did not include in their number anybody who ever had any familiarity with the duties of the private soldier or the difficulties that he has to meet. Doubtless they have had the advice of scholarly graduates of military schools, of gentlemen amply skilled in the clerical work of the War Department, but what private soldier, what noncommissioned officer, what officer that ever took men into the firing line was heard by this committee or the author of this bill? Whatever their other qualifications, we are all absolutely satisfied, and I think they concede, that none of them know the frame of mind of the private soldier and the things he is up against.

Mr. SLOAN. Does the gentleman seriously state that no one engaged in the preparation of this bill was familiar with actual military service, military duties, and military conditions? Is it possible that such is the case?

Mr. LITTLE. They may all be Napoleons, but from their presentation of it and the general tenor of the bill I gather that they concede my statement is correct. Whatever you call it, this is a bill to provide a bureau to take the place of the Pension Bureau, which has bothered some of our friends for the last 50 years so much. The gentleman who loaned his name to the introduction of this bill is one of the ablest and most useful Members of the House, but he has had no experience on the Pension Committee, and, as I understand, makes no claim whatever to the equipment necessary to get together this legislation. This bill does not come from the Pension Committee, which should have presented it, and has, by long experience, acquired much information that would have been useful in its preparation. This requested law has never been examined by the Pension Bureau, and no suggestions for its writing spring from the bureau, whose indorsement could have sent it in here ready to receive the highest consideration from the House. The distinguished jurist who is credited with its authorship and is held up here as the expert, never was a soldier, never was a legislator, and the only qualification he has for this work is his desire to be useful, which he shares with most of the rest of mankind. I challenge the authenticity of his commission as an expert.

A careful analysis of this requested legislation does not bear out the theory that it was drawn by an expert. Article I gives the definitions of the legal terms, which any fair lawyer could have made in an hour. They embody in Article II the family allowances and allotments the Government authorized during the expedition on the Mexican border recently, with the improvements that naturally spring therefrom. Article III is simply a change in the pension law, which, I regret to say, does not extend its more favorable provisions, where they occasionally appear, to the veterans of the great War for the Union or their widows. This is an oversight that we must remedy by subsequent enactment which must carry within it provision for the soldiers of the Spanish and Filipino wars and their dependents. To call the pension "compensation" is a mere interchange of words, and it requires no talent and no educational equipment except the dictionary to accomplish that. The Government insurance suggested in Article IV is a feature which has been discussed for many years. No expert is required to present these different propositions.

There are only two new ideas here, or two that may be called new. One is the provision to discard the Pension Bureau and establish a new bureau down in the Treasury Department, which is about as bad as it could be. To bring in that proposition is no good reason for taking the bill from the Committee on Pensions. The other is the splendid idea of extending Government insurance to the soldier at war, and I take off my hat to the gentleman who brought in that plan, and if for no other reason I shall vote for the bill and assist in its passage. But while we are at it, why not make it seriously useful? These talented gentlemen have overlooked one little practical detail which makes it difficult for this proposed enactment to be of any real use to the private soldier as it now stands. With a very slight modification it can be made to help him. These boys will take out no insurance. See that they do get it. At $8 a year per thousand, $2,000 would cost a boy $16 per annum. Let the Government give him that $16 per annum and present him with $2,000 of insurance. That adds $1.33⅓ cents per month to his income and that will assure him and his dependents that they will really get something out of this Government insurance for soldiers, which as yet means nothing but Government insurance of officers in effect. Gentlemen, this bill was drawn by men in touch with officers and with officers only. When the Interstate Commerce Committee came into this House they brought with them an amendment which provided that no pension, or "compensation," as they call it, and no terms of this bill should apply to any soldier's wife whom he married after the war. Ninety-five per cent of these lads will go to France unmarried, and this golden shower which you jingle in the pockets of the Treasury so patriotically is nothing but the imaginary yellow sunshine on a mirage. So little comprehension had the gentlemen who fathered these propositions of the real purpose of this legislation that they wanted to be sure that some poor fellow did not come home and marry his sweetheart and pass away from some wound or disease he brought from France with the knowledge that his widow would receive compensation, and she might be compelled to nurse him for years and see all she loved and cherished taken from her by the long finger of bony Death stretching from the ramparts of the Rhine to her heart and hearth. You will give the soldier nothing in this insurance because he will take no insurance. When you sell an officer $10,000 insurance for $80 you make him a present of the other $500 which he would pay the company at home if he took it from them. If you give the officer $500, can you not afford to give these young boys $16 a year? As I suggested, many of the officers will be better paid than in peace. You must remember that you will send to Europe thousands upon thousands of young men who are drawing salaries far in excess of those you will pay them for getting killed. You break up their business; you take them out of the place where they made their start in life and made their plans for a wife and a home and a family; you cut their wages to sixteen dollars and a half a month; then you shake the golden apples of Hesperides before their faces and safely out of their reach, and then boast of your generosity. If you give the officer so much—and I am glad to vote for the bill giving the officer such a chance—why not go a step farther and make this bill a real help to the soldier by voting him another $16 a year? No insurance agent will ask him to take it, and the very men who most need this assistance will hardly know that it can be had. Your plan is not efficient toward its purpose, gentlemen of the House, and a slight modification extending its provisions is all that is necessary to make it worthy of the proud consideration of the American people.

* * * * * * *

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I ask for the reading of the amendment which I send up.

The Clerk read as follows:

Amendment offered by Mr. LITTLE: Page 28, line 5, after the word "provided," strike out the period and insert:

"But every enlisted man who has or shall have during the war a wife, a child or children, a parent or parents dependent or partially dependent upon him is hereby granted without charge and without application an insurance of $2,000 against total disability or death in or from injuries received in battle, or in any attack by or engagement with the enemy, and this sum shall be paid to him in case of total disability, and in case of death to his wife, and to his child or children if there be no wife, and to his parent or parents if there be neither wife nor children."

Mr. ADAMSON. Mr. Chairman, I make the same point of order on that.

The CHAIRMAN. The Chair overrules the point of order.

Mr. LITTLE. Mr. Chairman, I sincerely hope that the American soldier in Europe will have more time to fight the battles of his country than the committee seems to have for the American soldier this afternoon. We are told by the gentleman from Texas, who has charge of this bill for the committee in this House, that a gentleman who now draws $10,000 a year in France thinks that "$13 a month for a soldier in the trenches over there is too much money for the morale of the American Army, and that $10 a month is the limit that a man ought to have to maintain the democracy in the Army that we should have." Before anybody else takes the floor I desire to resent that insult, and I do not care where it comes from, and I am surprised and astonished that anybody should bring such a statement in on this floor when the affairs of the American soldier are being considered. Ninety per cent of the men in the American Army, 90 per cent of the soldiers who will go to Europe, are as competent to spend the money they get as the officers in the American Army. [Applause.]

This makin' mock o' uniforms that guard you while you sleep
Is cheaper than them uniforms, an' they're starvation cheap.
Oh, it's Tommy this, and Tommy that, an' Tommy, how's your soul?
But it's thin red line of 'eroes when the drums begin to roll.
Oh, it's Tommy this, and Tommy that, an' anything you please;
But Tommy ain't a bloomin' fool—you bet that Tommy sees.

Gentlemen have suggested here in this discussion that insurance is only $8 a thousand, that any private could afford to take several thousand, and that five thousand would cost him only $40 a year. Forty dollars a year is not much to a man who gets $2,000 a year, but to a man who receives $200 a year it is 20 per cent of his income. If a private takes the ten thousand an officer will get, it will cost him more than 40 per cent of his income. All that I ask is that you add $16 a year to his income, and thus give him $2,000 insurance, and he will have something, and he will have encouragement to go ahead and take more and be thrifty and farsighted.

Suppose you were working for board and clothes and $200 a year. How much insurance would you take? Imagine yourself stranded in a foreign land on $200 a year, 3,000 miles from your home, spending half your time on a firing line, half frozen to the solid ground or knee-deep in cold water and sent back to the rear for a few days to recuperate. How would you feel when some man who is drawing $10,000 a year and spending it came along and said, "Here boy, is $10; don't waste that on champagne and diamonds." Do you think that would have a tendency to improve "the morale of the American Army" and to "maintain the democracy in the Army that we should have"?

The soldiers of the Republic that go to carry the American flag over the German trenches owe a debt of gratitude to the Hon. RICHARD AUSTIN, of Tennessee, that time can not stale nor custom wither in a thousand years. He brought in the amendment here that gave them a pay that no soldiers in the world ever received before. His name will shine luminous in the dark watches of the night over the American camps for a century, while these "great leaders," with records as yet unmade, and these expert statesmen, with their pruning knives, who seek to snatch from the fighting man's fingers DICK AUSTIN'S magnificent gift, are unwept, unhonored, and unsung.

Gentlemen of the committee, after a while a million or two or three, or possibly five million soldiers, will be home from Europe, and they will adjust these pension laws according to the dictates of their own patriotic judgments. Now, I ask as a soldier in a small war that you make this an actually useful statute for the private soldier and really give him the benefit that you have hung beyond his reach. This legislation is at such a stage it seems almost useless to bring the affairs of an ordinary common soldier before Congress. We can hear from a man who draws $10,000 a year and wears shoulder straps. We can hear from committees who never saw a man marshaled into service. We can hear from judges who have not the slightest comprehension of what it means to be a soldier. We can hear from military experts on swivel chairs who never marched a company into battle and never heard the rattle of an enemy's gun, but when a man gets up and tells what the soldier does and what he needs, they move that the debate be discontinued in 40 minutes. You are only asked to give the soldier $16 a year and thus grant him $2,000 of insurance, much less than you have made it easy for the officer to receive. For pity's sake, gentlemen, let him take it and get away with it, and do not have some major general tell you the boy has not sense enough to spend it when he gets $2,000 and brings it home.

Mr. REAVIS. The soldier who by reason of poverty is able to take but little if any of this insurance is the man who has the dependents and needs the insurance himself, is he not?

Mr. LITTLE. Yes; the gentleman from Nebraska has stated it correctly.

Mr. REAVIS. And the officer who has dependents does not need it.

Mr. LITTLE. As far as the officers are concerned, it was not absolutely necessary that this bill be drawn. These soldiers are those who need this bill, as the gentleman suggests. I say to you, gentlemen, after 18 months' experience with them, in my judgment, not over 5 per cent of them will take this insurance. Unless you make proper provision for the private soldier your bill is nothing but a scrap of paper.

Mr. PLATT. The gentleman says that he does not take the word of a major general. Does not the gentleman know that some of the junior officers have returned from Europe, and that they confirm the statement that the soldiers have so much money they do not know what to do with it?

Mr. LITTLE. What are the junior officers coming home from France for at this stage of the game?

Mr. PLATT. They are ordered home.

Mr. SIEGEL. I will say to my colleague from New York that I have received some letters from the men at the front during the past few days, and they say that they have not been able to see an American newspaper, and they point out the fact that they have not sufficient money, and they are asking the people of this country to send them cigars and cigarettes.

Mr. LITTLE. The judgment of the junior officers who return after the war is over upon their comrades will be of more value than that of those who come back now. The gentleman suggests with evident surprise that I do not accept the ipse dixit of a major general. The members of the Twentieth Kansas Volunteers, thank God, have their information first hand and do not have to take the judgment of any major general. Every man in that regiment has fought in more battles and seen more soldiers marched into action than all the major generals in the Regular Army of the United States put together, except Frank Bell, and, I think, than all the brigadier generals put together, except Clarence Edwards. This bill, unless amended a trifle, is not an effective method of assisting the private soldier. This war is six months old, gentlemen, and the time has gone by to be firing blank cartridges. One American soldier has already died for his country, and he came from Kansas City. As the greatest armies the world ever assembled shake the ground with the tread of marching millions, the balance swings to and fro. This war will be decided on the advent of 3,000,000 American soldiers who will cross the plains of Europe keeping time to the drums that beat at Louisburg and thundered at Quebec, beneath the flag under which their fathers fought from the bridge at Concord to the bridge at Marilao. This Congress is now discussing victory and the means thereto. The Congress, the administration, the people, the business of America must stand behind the American soldier as one man, that the tremendous sacrifices the Nation is making shall not be made in vain. For the character of our soldiers we can take the word of those mighty chieftains who freed the Colonies and preserved our Government in its darkest days. [Applause.]

Food Control.

SPEECH

OF

HON. STUART F. REED,

OF WEST VIRGINIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. REED. Mr. Speaker, I expect to vote for the conference report, although I am not entirely satisfied with all the provisions of the bill. I hope the public will not be disappointed in what it anticipates it will accomplish. I realize that the people are expecting great benefits, and for weeks they have been complaining about the failure of Congress to speedily pass the bill and give them relief from the high cost of living.

Enthusiastic friends of the Executive have been filling the columns of the newspapers for weeks with glowing prophesies of what it will do for the masses, who have been led to believe it will put an end to profiteering and make lower prices for the common necessities of life.

This propaganda has created a thrill of hope and expectation in the minds of the people which I greatly fear will end in disappointment and reflect little credit upon the sponsors of the bill.

Food products are likely to remain high and taxes will soon begin to mount higher and higher. The price fixed on wheat will still mean a higher price for bread than the consumer thinks ought to prevail.

The producer having for a time reveled in the ecstasy of enormous profits will be dissatisfied if he believes the Government has put limitations upon his business.

The Government is getting into pretty deep water when it starts out to help the consumer by giving him lower prices and in the same law help the producer by guaranteeing him higher prices.

Because wheat is scarce it is necessarily high. This law proposes to increase the production by keeping the price up. That appears reasonable. On the other hand, because of a car shortage and a scarcity of coal we know coal is very high. Now, I hear it rumored that in order to remedy that situation and get more coal the President is about to reduce the price of coal and fix a maximum above which it may not be sold.

I want to see the people get relief, but I can not understand the logic of the administration in these matters. I am afraid it is a hopeless appeal to the potency of statutes to work miracles and nullify some well-established principles of economics.

Only a few years ago the farmers were having a hard time to make a bare living on the most fertile farms of the Republic. They got a mere pittance for their grain, butter, eggs, and beef cattle.

In these disastrous times many a farmer placed a mortgage on his lands in order to get a little money to educate his children. His Government did nothing to relieve him. I do not know what it could have done, but I know what happened. The boys all left the farms and went to the cities where wages were good and surroundings more fascinating. A few years ago 65 per cent of the people lived in the country. Now only about 40 per cent are in the country and 60 per cent in the cities and towns.

No miracle of legislation can change existing conditions relating to supply and demand in this great country over night.

This law for food control seems to be one of a series of laws proposed as war-emergency measures.

I refer particularly to the pending food-survey bill, which seeks to aid in increasing the food supply; the food-control bill we are now considering, which proposes to regulate prices; and the river and harbor bill, which has just been passed and which we were told was a war measure because its purpose was to improve the creeks and streams of the country and make them available for transporting the expected increase in the farm products of the Nation. We were asked to believe that these rivers and creeks, in all sections of the country could be improved, provided with steamboats, and used to transport the enormous products which I presume are expected to be produced by the boys in the cities who will go back to the farms next year for that purpose.

All this to be accomplished in time to provide food for America and her allies and help win the war into which we have entered.

To my mind this part of the program is ridiculous. Certainly the people of this country know how long it would take to carry out this scheme of river improvement which is said to be necessary in winning the war. If the war is to last that long, God help us.

It was clearly understood that this extra session of Congress would consider only measures relating to the war, and especially was it made clear that no river and harbor bill would be brought in. Our Democratic friends who are in full control of this House held a caucus, we are told, and absolutely assented to such a program. Yet some of our friends who are overanxious to secure appropriations to be expended in improving creeks and rivers in their districts have devised a ruse to drag in here and pass their pet schemes under the guise of war legislation. I voted against the bill because it was brought here under false pretenses, and to my mind was a badly constructed piece of legislation. It was legislation that very properly might be considered in the regular session which is now only a few weeks off. But it was thrust into this busy session when it was not possible to give it careful consideration. It placed upon the people who are already overburdened with taxation an additional load of $27,000,000. It creates seven new Federal officials at a salary of $7,500, who are empowered to employ an unlimited number of men at any salaries they choose to pay, and thereby make another raid on the Treasury. The argument was made that it was necessary to have the appropriation in order to improve our harbors and deepen certain channels and inlets to accommodate our battleships and destroyers.

By referring to the report of the unexpended river and harbor appropriations we find about $30,000,000 yet available. It is true that some members of the committee have figured it out that when amounts for certain contracts already made are deducted there will not be that amount unexpended, but the lowest they have ever been able to bring it is $19,000,000. Certainly a sufficient sum to take care of any emergency in the line of harbor or river improvements needed in the conduct of the war between now and the opening of Congress in December.

But that bill is now a law, and $27,000,000 additional are available for the improvement of various harbors, inlets, rivers, and creeks, especially the creeks. It is an old saying, "Every dog has his day," but surely the creeks are given their day in this bill. I thought I understood the meaning of the word "creek," but in order to be on the safe side I consulted a late edition of an unabridged dictionary and find "creek" defined as "a small tidal or valley stream between a brook and a river in size." Let me give you the names of some of the creeks that by this bill are proposed to be converted into mighty arteries of commerce: In Florida we find Slaughter, Tyaskin, Broad, and Banana Creeks; in Mississippi, Bear Creek; in Texas, Oyster and Clear Creeks; in North Carolina, Smiths, Broad, and Queens Creeks; in South Carolina, Church Creek and Bohicket Creek; in New Jersey, Matawan, Compton, Cheesequake, Woodbury, Raccoon, Oldmans, Alloway, and Woodbridge Creeks. Of course, these may all be noble, crystal streams, worthy of the attention of Congress. During this extra session we have had no time to go into their history. I did, however, look at the Engineers' Report as to the last one named in the partial list I have given. It says, "Woodbridge Creek, N. J., is a small crooked tidal stream * * * navigable 2¾ miles above the mouth." Some of them may, as I said, be worthy projects, but certainly no creek or river improvements can be started and completed in time to help any transportation problems connected with present war emergency.

I am in favor of improving our rivers whenever the benefits justify the expenditure. It will take a long time to make them what they ought to be, and much money will be required to do it, even in normal times.

With labor, concrete, steel, and everything else that goes with river improvement costing to-day three times as much as in ordinary times, it would be an inexcusable waste of the people's money to begin extensive improvements on waterways not necessary to the carrying on of the war.

In shipbuilding, in providing guns and ammunition for our Army, we are far short of our requirements. The material and men that would be required to start new river improvements are needed in other places. There is a shortage of farm labor to carry out the plans suggested by the administration.

Mr. Speaker, some may say, "Why protest against a bill that is already a law?" True, but the money has not yet been spent. The matter is under the control of the Secretary of War, and I hope he will exercise his authority in these days of high prices, and instead of sending men and engineers to survey Banana Creek and Raccoon Creek and other streams he will use the money of the people, as common sense should dictate, in activities that will help us win this war in the shortest possible time and save our young men from slaughter in the trenches of Europe. Of course, some money must be spent in harbors and other places to meet war exigencies, but new projects ought not to be undertaken.

The food-control bill now under consideration, whatever may be its merits, may be properly called legislation in the interests of sustaining the Army and Navy. Its objects are commendable, and while I would like to see it modified in some respects I shall support it, and my sincere hope is that it may bring the people some of the relief they expect of it.

Universal Obligation to Service.

SPEECH

HON. GEORGE M. YOUNG,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, April 26, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Chairman, when I was a boy the preachers used to talk about free salvation, and the congregations sang a hymn which ran like this:

I'm glad salvation is free;
I'm glad salvation is free.
Salvation is free for you and me;
I'm glad salvation is free.

And we sang it with great enthusiasm. Free salvation is still an orthodox church doctrine, but now the preachers are talking more about the idea of service, of the opportunity of doing things, of the duties and the privileges of service. They are putting the emphasis upon service and sacrifice. It is not so much a question of how much one can get from the Almighty as how much one can do for his fellow men.

There is a surprisingly large number of people in this country who glory in the statement that this is a free country—free—something for nothing!

Mr. MILLER of Washington. Mr. Chairman, will the gentleman yield?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Yes.

Mr. MILLER of Washington. I will ask the gentleman if he heeded that admonition in the good old hymn, "Salvation is free"?

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. I hope so.

Now, as the preaching has improved during the passing years, we are also getting better ideas on the question as to our duty to our country. Instead of the idea of everything being free, like the sunlight, thoughtful men are talking now of the obligation they owe to their country, of universal obligation to service. It is their idea that what we have of freedom and liberty was fought for, was dearly paid for, and to maintain our liberties ought to be an equal obligation resting upon all. We are fighting to make the world safe for democracy, so our President has declared. We are fighting to uphold the rights of international law and the fundamental and sacred rights of humanity. Can a more lofty cause enlist the activities of a democracy? If so, let our conduct of this war be democratic in deed and in truth. Let there be a sense of obligation upon every citizen. Let us rid ourselves as a people from the false notion that it is the privilege and duty for some to serve and that it is the privilege of others to deny such obligation while at the same time enjoying the protection of their ordinary rights of citizenship. I commend to those who have had so much to say about special privilege as related to the industries to turn their attention to that reprehensible form of special privilege which would permit them to enjoy all the blessings of our great Republic and at the same time shrink from the just obligations of citizenship.

This debate has been exhaustive. There is little new which can be said. There is, however, one thing which I desire to say in the most emphatic way, and that is that the young men upon the farms of the Northwest are not the ones who have suggested a substitution of service in the industrial army upon the farms in place of service at the front, although that may be found to be a very wise thing to do. Others, among them the Secretary of Agriculture, have made such proposals. The young men upon our North Dakota farms are just as patriotic as the young men of other States.

Now, Mr. Chairman, while all citizens should recognize their obligation for service, we, as Congressmen, sharing in the direction of the war, should see to it that the burdens imposed upon the people are distributed equally, fairly, and justly. This bill if passed will mobilize the young manhood of the country into a great army. We are calling upon these young men to make the supreme sacrifice of their lives if need be. What will be our attitude hereafter in respect to what will be required from other citizens? Will there be favoritism? Will there be a disposition to shield certain of our citizens? The resolution of Congress by which a state of war was declared to exist, which many Members voted for only under a compelling sense of duty, contained these words:

And to bring the conflict to a successful termination all of the resources of the country are hereby pledged by the Congress of the United States.

Mr. Chairman, will this pledge of Congress be carried out without fear or favor? It will call for the same degree of courage upon our part as that which will enable our brave boys to face death in the battle lines of France. We must demand sacrifices upon the part of those not accustomed to make them. We must tax wealth. We must raise huge sums of money from classes that have heretofore kept powerful lobbies at Washington. Will we have the courage to demand of every citizen, high and low, rich and poor, his full share of the war burden according to his financial ability? If not, then in God's name we ought not to pass a law which will conscript these young men into a service which may cost them their lives. No man should vote for this bill unless he expects to go down the line voting for other bills which shall bring about equality in sacrifice. I shall vote for the bill upon this theory.

Mr. Chairman, in discharging the duty which will be ours of equalizing the burdens, one of the questions for decision will be the pay for those serving in the ranks. There is talk in the newspapers now of conscripting an army to work in the fields. It will probably never be done. Whether it is ever done or not, the pay for farm help this year will be from $45 to $50 per month plus board and room. Is there any justice in conscripting an army to go upon the farms to work in safety at high wages and at the same time call from the farm young men to an exceedingly hazardous service at $16 per month? And is it fair for us Congressmen to leave on the statute books a law which makes it possible for 40 agents of the Dominion Government to scatter themselves through the agricultural areas of our country for the purpose of soliciting men to go to the fields of Canada, offering them high wages and in addition 160 acres of free land to each. Under our laws it is unlawful to advertise for help in a foreign newspaper, and the farmer who even writes a letter to one living beyond our national boundaries suggesting that he can find employment here is guilty of a felony, and some of our North Dakota farmers have, to their sad experience, been placed behind the bars for unintentionally violating this unjust law. The fathers of the boys who will be called to the colors must employ labor for their farms in competition with the agents of the Dominion Government, if, indeed, they can find men at all to do the work.

Here is an advertisement appearing in many American newspapers, which reads:

Canada offers 160 acres of land free to farm hands—bonus of western Canada land to men who assist in maintaining needed grain production. The demand for farm labor in Canada is so great that as an inducement to secure at once the necessary help required, Canada will give 160 acres of land free as a homestead—

And so forth.

Mr. Chairman, the Government should be fair with those who serve in our armies. The wages of railway men have been increased. The Interstate Commerce Commission is proposing to increase railway rates. Wages and prices are on the increase everywhere. In the midst of such conditions it is unfair to offer the pittance which is paid to our soldiers. I know the feeling of our splendid young men of the West. They do not like to leave the school, the store, and the farm to go to the trenches for the pittance now paid to our soldiers. They will go, however, even if the compensation is not changed. They will prove to the world that the spirit of '76 and '61 is not dead and that they are as patriotic as their forefathers. But how much better will it be for us to show these young men who come to the colors that our obligation to do justice to them is equal to their obligation to serve their country. I feel confident that this will be done.

I want to ask a question of the gentleman from Vermont [Mr. GREENE], a member of the committee, and it is this: Has any consideration been given to the compensation that an enlisted man should receive now that he is to be drafted rather than volunteer for service?

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I suppose that the Army pay table heretofore prevailing will prevail, so far as I have any information of it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Heretofore, while the enlisted man has been paid very poorly, his service was voluntary, but now that his service is, in a sense, involuntary, since he is to be drafted, since you can not forcibly take a man's property without giving him just compensation, you ought not to take his time without giving him just compensation.

Mr. GREENE of Vermont. I never understood that any patriot risked his life in war for the sake of the money there was in it.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. There is something in that; but the conditions are somewhat changed now, as I have already pointed out, and the matter of just compensation for our soldiers should command our most serious thought.

Mr. Chairman, I yield back the balance of my time. [Applause.]

Selective Draft.

HON. PATRICK D. NORTON,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, April 26, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 3545) to authorize the President to increase temporarily the Military Establishment of the United States.

Mr. NORTON. Mr. Chairman, we are in a great world war. We are in a war to-day arraying our strength and resources against what is the most thoroughly and systematically organized and the most powerful autocracy in the form of government that the world has ever known.

The time has passed to debate, to criticize, or to speculate on what might have been done to have kept this Nation out of this world war. The problem now before the Nation is a concrete one. The problem is to carry on our part in this war not only for a day or a year but to carry it on for such time and until such time as the glorious banner of our Nation shall be carried to final victory on the fields of this war. The paramount problem in this legislation is to provide for an army of citizen soldiers in a way that will best carry that banner to victory in the shortest period of time.

The volunteer system has been well championed during this debate. Members have eloquently recalled and recounted certain history of our country to justify the continuance of that system. A great deal of affection and a great deal of love, unbounded admiration, and endearing memories attach to the volunteer system. For myself, I desire to say here that I personally have the greatest love and veneration for the splendid men who have in the past nobly volunteered their services in their country's cause, and I have, too, the profoundest respect and admiration for the tens of thousands of equally splendid men who from one end to the other of this land of ours to-day nobly stand ready to volunteer to give the fullest measure of devotion to their country in the contest in which we are now engaged. But with due regard for the blessings that have come down to us from the volunteer system as it worked out in the past, to-day with the present development of our country the volunteer system, as a system for quickly and efficiently placing the military strength of our Nation against the country's enemy, is as antiquated and as inefficient as is the old flintlock of colonial days in modern warfare.

I look upon this question somewhat differently than do a great many Members who have spoken on the subject in the House the last few days. To me it seems that the best system of military service to be adopted is that which will most nearly place upon every able-bodied citizen an equal liability and an equal responsibility to serve his country at his country's need and call. For several years I have been interested in the question of universal military service, and I have given this question some careful study. Having fully in mind all the arguments that have been made in favor of the volunteer system, I am nevertheless firmly of the opinion that if we could secure through the volunteer system five times the number of men needed in this war, and I think that this could be done, it would still be far better for our country and far safer for the maintenance and perpetuation of the cardinal principles on which this Nation was founded, to adopt either the selective-draft system or the universal military system as a permanent policy of our Government, and to do this now.

In the early days of this Nation its population was comparatively small. The interests of its people were not so widely divergent as they are to-day. Its people lived closer together. They were not as to-day scattered over a territory extending from Florida to Alaska and from Passamaquoddy Bay to Manila Harbor. They then felt, and were, in fact, bound much more closely together, by association, by ancestry, and by common interest, than are the people of our country to-day. In recent years there has been growing up in this country a most noticeable lack of unity among our people and an absence of real intelligent interest in the Government. Hundreds of thousands of our population have felt free to enjoy all the fruits and benefits of this Government without giving a single thought to any service which they might owe or which they might give to the Government. To them the Government of the United States has meant very little other than a free protection to make money and to prosper in worldly goods. It is clear that this individualistic and selfish tendency of a large part of our population, native as well as foreign born, if continued, would inevitably leave the country an easy prey to any strong forces that might assail it from without or from within. Some time ago, in discussing the subject of national preparedness with one of the highest military officers of our Government, I made the statement that I did not believe that this Nation would have the military preparation it should have if we maintained a regular standing army of 1,000,000 men and paid each of the private soldiers in the regular standing army a salary of $50 or even $100 a month, and did not have in the Nation a system of military preparedness, under which every citizen of the country would feel that he was a real part of the system and that it was part of his duty as a citizen as well as a privilege for him to share in the Nation's defense in all times of need. I shall heartily support the selective-draft provision, as I believe it will best tend to distribute among our people the burdens of actual military service and defense of the Government, and will develop a greater unity among our people and a greater appreciation of the true responsibilities of citizenship. I shall heartily support the selective-draft provision because I believe it is thoroughly democratic and better meets the present needs and conditions of our country than the volunteer system. [Applause.]

"I Find Then a Law."

—The Apostle Paul.

SPEECH

HON. GEORGE M. YOUNG,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Friday, August 3, 1917.

The House had under consideration the conference report on the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. YOUNG of North Dakota. Mr. Speaker, the bill before us will, in my judgment, prove to be a good one if the law is properly administered. Let us hope that those intrusted with its execution will act with wisdom and discretion. The United States grain standards act is an example of a law carefully drawn, but which is likely from present indications to be administered in a way which will cause much dissatisfaction. The law is all right, but those who are charged with its execution are disposed to look for advice almost wholly from the middlemen.

Mr. Speaker, the grading of grain is a subject of importance to every living soul in the United States. All who produce food and all who eat food, including every man, woman, and child, are interested in the marketing of wheat. It is vital to all. A just and fair system of grading grain is essential to healthy marketing conditions. The miller, living outside of the wheat-producing areas, can not see the grain he buys. He must depend upon the grading of the grain. This ought to be done in such a way as to enable the buyer to know the quality of wheat which he is buying, how much flour it will make and of what quality, and the amount and quality of the by-products. This knowledge is also necessary to the seller or producer. He should know the quality of the article which he sells in order to act with intelligence, and is entitled to have it graded in such a way as to indicate its real milling value. While progress has been made in every other line of business, the grading of grain is done in the same old way, and the grades or standards now proposed by the National Government promise no improvement.

A number of years ago the by-products were of comparatively small value. Now even the screenings sell for about $20 per ton. In spite of these changed conditions the grading is done in the same old way. Having discussed in detail the bulletins of President E. F. Ladd, of Fargo, before Congress, some time ago, I shall not now go into those matters but instead make some general observations.

The word "law" is a scientific term. It was a scriptural term for nearly 2,000 years before it became a scientific term. The Apostle Paul said, "I find then a law." His was a logical mind. He studied to discover the law back of all natural and spiritual phenomena.

Every advance in human progress has come through the discovery of a great law.

Newton discovered the law of gravity, the law which holds the world in its grasp.

Galileo discovered the law of the heavens.

Watt discovered the law of steam.

Franklin discovered the law of the lightning flash.

Marconi discovered the law of the air.

Edison discovered the law of electrical control.

Langley discovered the law of aeronautics.

Burbank discovered the law of plant development.

I regret to find that grain dealers and those interested in the subject of grain grading have the habit of saying or believing that rusted wheat is an unknown quantity. We have had rusted hard wheat so many times its milling qualities are well known. Badly rusted wheat, like that of 1916, has been seen before. Such crops will come again, and when they come their characteristics, their flour content, their quality, need not be a matter of conjecture. In other words, there is a law in respect to rusted wheat. Nature repeats itself. Paul said, "I find then a law." What are some of the laws of nature in respect to rusted wheat?

(1) The screenings content is always larger. Screenings are worth money, and they cost the miller nothing. They offset in large degree the loss occasioned by the slightly reduced flour content.

(2) The protein content is greater. Protein is another word for gluten. It is the blood-producing, muscle-building property of food. Much if not the chief demand for hard wheat comes from millers where soft winter or spring wheats are grown. Such wheats are deficient in gluten. To make first-class flour it is necessary to mix them with hard wheats. So the hard wheat having the highest gluten content is the most valuable to all such millers, and is in constant demand.

(3) The flour made from rusted wheat makes a larger, better-looking loaf.

(4) It makes a flour more easily handled by the average baker.

(5) The absorption is greater. That is to say it will absorb and retain more water. This makes no difference to the housewife, but it does make a difference to the bakers, as they sell their bread according to weight. So such flour is in great demand with them.

All of these factors go to make rusted wheat worth almost the same as wheat free from rust, pound for pound. It required, in 1916, about a bushel and a half in bulk to equal in weight a measured bushel of rust-free wheat. But wheat is not sold in bulk. It is sold by the pound, and it requires the same number of pounds of rusted wheat to make a bushel as rust-free wheat. It is a simple proposition, but interested, selfish men have found it easy to confuse both buyers and sellers.

Strong statements, you say. Yes; they are, but they are susceptible of proof not only by experiments made by President Ladd but by a statement made to the trade by one of the largest flour-milling concerns at Minneapolis in respect to flour made from the rusted wheat of 1916. The message sent out by this concern, which corroborates my statement, reads as follows:

"The quality of the 1916 crop as milled by us is excellent. There will be a marked increase in loaf volume. The gluten content will be from 11 per cent to 12 per cent, which is considerably larger than the 1915 crop. The time of fermentation will possibly be about one-half hour longer than the last crop. Owing to the extremely warm weather during the ripening period the wheat has already gone through the sweat, and consequently the difficulties often experienced in handling new wheat flour will not be noticed to any extent. The indications are that the absorption will be about 2 per cent to 3 per cent higher than the previous crop."

This quotation is from a postal card in the possession of and printed in the Nonpartisan Leader, published at Fargo, N. Dak.

The grading of wheat is a simple matter, but those who have established or defined the grades in Minnesota in the past have made it an abstruse matter. They have sought to mystify the public. They have assumed the demeanor of a quack. They have, in the language of the dictionary, pretended knowledge which they did not possess. But they have gotten away with it because the people, prior to bulletins issued by President Ladd, were uninformed as to the milling value of wheat.

To begin with, in 1873 it was a simple matter to grade the wheat. Two grades were sufficient, Nos. 1 and 2 northwestern spring. Later the name was changed to "hard spring." Finding this easy, they established an additional grade in 1885, namely, No. 1 hard, and retained Nos. 1 and 2 northern. Finding that nobody was looking nor kicking, they added two more grades in 1907, making the list as follows: No. 1 hard and Nos. 1, 2, 3, and 4 northern. Still finding the public credulous, they boosted the number of grades up to seven. Of late, however, the farmers have been learning what the grain men have always known—the milling value of their wheat—and they have been doing some plain talking. They no longer reverence or respect the high-browed gentlemen in Minnesota who called themselves scientists. They have discovered that the definitions of the grades, making highly technical descriptive statements of what is required for the different grades, are simply devices to impoverish the farmers and take their products at less than their real value.

The farmers had great hopes that the standard grades established by the National Government would be more simple, fair, and just. Unfortunately, the National Government has no experimental flour mill of its own, such as we have at our agricultural college in North Dakota, and the officials have depended, I fear, too much upon milling data furnished by private and more or less interested concerns. At the next session I hope Congress will agree to the very small appropriation for which I am asking to install at the Capital a small experimental flour mill and chemical and baking laboratories. This will enable our market officials to secure reliable first-hand data, free from the coloring, bias, or misstatements of private irresponsible investigators.

In an article prepared by me for the August, 1916, issue of Pearson's Magazine I discussed this subject from the standpoint of the consumer as well as the producer. In that article I attempted to show that because the farmer is the victim of crooked measures and false weights every woman who buys bread for her children is cheated; that Londoners paid less for bread in war time than we did in peace; and that bread eaters, by intelligent cooperation, could lower the cost and raise the quality of the family loaf. I ask permission to print this article in the RECORD.

The SPEAKER. Is there objection? The Chair hears none.

The matter is as follows:

THE MIDDLE AGAINST THE ENDS—HOW 100,000,000 PEOPLE WHO GROW WHEAT OR EAT BREAD ARE HUMBUGGED BY CROOKED MEASURES.

[By GEORGE M. YOUNG, Member of Congress from North Dakota.]

[Representative YOUNG, while a member of the North Dakota Legislature, introduced and secured the passage of what was known as the Young bill, providing for the installation of an experimental flour mill and testing plant at the Agricultural College, Fargo, N. Dak.—Editorial note.]

16 drams make 1 ounce.
16 ounces, 1 pound.

Millions upon millions of Americans who learned this table at school stand for a "pound loaf" of bread weighing 12 ounces. The table known as Troy weight made a pound consist of 12 ounces, and we were taught that Troy weight was used to weigh gold, silver, and jewels. The bakers evidently believe that bread should be weighed on the same scales as gold. Barnum allowed that the American people liked to be humbugged. In the case of wheat and bread it is doubtful whether they like it, but that they are humbugged—and properly—is a fact beyond the shadow of a doubt.

Volumes have been written and spoken to show how grain dealers have juggled with the grades, raising the grades on millions upon millions of bushels from so-called low grades to high grades. Such speeches and articles have been predicated upon the idea that the grades established by Minnesota were not doctored; that they were honest and made in order to describe what were supposed to be several distinct varieties of hard wheats with different milling values. Speakers and writers have apparently overlooked the basic facts which made such manipulations of the middlemen easy, and overlooked the astounding fact that there is practically no difference in the milling values of the different grades of hard wheat. There is some difference, however, in the baking values of the flour made therefrom, but, strange to say, in favor of the so-called lower grades.

BIG BAKERS THWARTED.

When it was proposed last year by certain big bakers in New York, during a flurry of the wheat market, to advance the price of bread, the people made a howl and some of the newspapers protested. It was pointed out that 57 loaves of 16 ounces are made from a bushel of wheat, which at 5 cents per loaf makes the gross proceeds $2.85 per bushel, to which should be added the value of the by-products. If computed on the basis of the make-believe loaf containing 12 ounces the gross proceeds amount to $3.56, to which should be added the value of the by-products—shorts, bran, and screenings.

It was not the protests, however, which brought the bakers' combine to time. The trick was pulled off by some small and apparently insignificant bakers who advertised to do business at the old prices and threatened to capture the business of the combine. Now that the wheat is mostly out of the hands of the farmers, the prices are advancing at the time of writing this article, and there is considerable prospect of the speculators boosting wheat up to an excessively high price. If so the consumers will be face to face with another bread price advance, and the next one may stick, as it is fair to presume the bakers will be better organized next time. The consumers, if they are wise, should not only resist any advance in price but also make a fight for a real pound loaf containing 16 ounces.

MIDDLEMEN HELPED BY CROOKED MEASURES.

There is nothing which will help a crooked man to defraud his victims more than crooked scales or a crooked measure. So, in the passing of a bushel of wheat from the farmer to the consumer the greed of middlemen is helped by crooked measures of value and false standards of weight.

The Constitution of the United States makes it the duty of Congress to fix the standards of weights and measures. That there is great need for standard measures in the grain trade is plain. Take for example that section of the country producing hard wheat. Dr. E. F. Ladd, of the North Dakota Agricultural College, a noted chemist, has conducted some experiments with wheat and flour of great interest and immense value. There is at the college a complete milling plant, and every facility for making chemical and baking tests. A bulletin issued last year contains some tables which tell the story of crooked measures of value.

BAKING TESTS.

It will be observed that in the baking tests the texture for Nos. 3, 4, and rejected averages above that for the so-called higher grades, and that the flour per pound from "rejected" wheat makes more bread, being of larger volume and greater weight, also greater gluten content, as shown by other experiments. In the matter of color Nos. 1 and 2 take higher percentages than the other three grades, but even here rejected comes well above the lower limits for second patents, which is placed at 88 in the commercial laboratories.

The figures in Table I demonstrate that the difference in the values of the different kinds of hard wheat is very slight, and could be described by two grades. Instead the Minnesota State authorities have established pretended standards showing six grades—No. 1 hard, No. 1 northern, No. 2 northern, No. 3 northern, No. 4 northern, and rejected.

As there are clearly, by Dr. Ladd's test, not that many distinct kinds of hard wheat, the Minnesota grades, so called, are arbitrary and not honest measures of quality or value. If a "grade" serves any purpose, it is to indicate the value of wheat for the making of flour, how much and what quality of flour it will produce. The Minnesota grades do the opposite. They mystify. They create a half dozen grades to cover imaginary differences, and all who handle the wheat, from the local buyers through its devious and unnecessarily long course through the middlemen, use the false measures, the grades, to add to their profits, part of the burden falling on the producer and part on the consumer. The excessive profits thus gained are for the most part made before the wheat reaches the flour millers, particularly those of the East. The flour millers, as a general rule, both in the United States and England, must pay all the wheat is worth. The fiction of grades does not signify much at the mill door. Indeed, when the foreign importer gets it, or the majority of the big flour mills, the low grades, so called, have vanished, and high grades have taken their places. Thus do middlemen and chamber-of-commerce gamblers play with the necessities of the people.

WHAT IT COSTS.

And the percentage of unjust profit added is by no means small. In fact, it is so large as to make one wonder why a plundering system of such magnitude could exist so long. For instance, follow the purchase of wheat for the different grades shown in Table I and compute the value of the products of the wheat as shown by the market quotations of the Northwestern Miller of Minneapolis, issue of December 9, 1914, for flour, bran, shorts, and screenings. Also, the average of market quotations for wheat for eight days in the same publication. It is found that for each 100 pounds of wheat purchased, according to such market prices, the returns above the original cost are as follows: No. 1 northern, 34 cents; No. 2, 37 cents; No. 3, 49 cents; No. 4, 52 cents; rejected, 57 cents. This is shown in another table prepared by Dr. Ladd, given below:

	No. 1 northern.	No. 2 northern.	No. 3 northern.	No. 4 northern.	Rejected.
Cost per 100 pounds.....	$1.950	$1.905	$1.858	$1.789	$1.746
Receipts.....	2.28391	2.2722	2.3495	2.3094	2.3148
Increase per 100 pounds..	.33391	.3672	.4915	.5204	.5688

It goes without saying that if the Minnesota grades represented real differences in the grain purchased, the profits would be the same upon each bushel handled. The arbitrary character of the grades, as well as the utter foolishness of calling them standards of value, is shown by the spread in the gross profit of 34 cents for No. 1 northern to 57 cents for rejected. In order to have a just measure of the value of the wheat the flour and by-products should yield the same profit for each grade. Anything else means a crooked measure, and somebody must pay the bill, either the man who walks behind the plow or the man who steps up to the flour counter, or both.

LONDON WITH DEARER WHEAT HAS CHEAPER BREAD.

In a general way, according to the present system of marketing grain, there are, in fact, two measuring sticks, one used in buying the farmer's grain, which does not in any sense measure the value or put an honest brand upon it; then it is graded again, sometimes officially and sometimes unofficially, when the wheat is turned over to the flour millers, at which time, the mask being off, both parties to the deal know what it is really worth. Ordinarily, taking the country as a whole, it makes no difference to the flour miller what the wheat costs him, excepting in those cases where the flour millers are themselves either directly or through subsidiary companies engaged in the business of handling grain, because the cost is passed on to the jobber, and the jobber passes it on to the grocer, who passes it on to the consumer. It will be seen, therefore, that so far as the fixing of standards is concerned the losses to the public occur chiefly at the ends, before the grain reaches the miller and after the flour is turned over to the baker. In the latter case it is fair to presume, considering the average sale price of wheat and flour, that the bakers could afford to sell a real pound loaf containing 16 ounces for 5 cents. The average American city is nearer to the wheat fields than London, yet the "war price" of bread in London is considerably less than that. In other words, London, with dearer wheat, has cheaper bread. Here is a dispatch from London, under date of April 13, 1915, when wheat had reached the highest price for many years, which says: "It has been decided by the master bakers, on account of the war, to advance the price of bread, beginning next Monday, to 17 cents per quartern loaf" A quartern loaf is 4 pounds of 16 ounces each, which means that a full pound loaf containing 16 ounces is sold in war times in London at 4¼ cents. During the flurry of high wheat prices last year some of the papers that protested against the proposed increase in price for a make-believe pound loaf containing only 12 ounces seemed to leave out of the computation the by-products, though of admitted value. In the issue of the Northwestern Miller above referred to flour is quoted at $2.88 per 100 pounds, and the by-products were quoted as follows, per 100 pounds: Bran, $1; shorts, $1.25; screenings, 60 cents.

Hard wheat is seldom made into flour without being mixed with winter or soft wheat. Some exceptions are found in the hard-wheat areas. A flour mill, say at Buffalo, desires hard wheat for mixing because of its gluten content, and the so-called low grades contain the largest percentage of gluten. If the Government shall hereafter establish standards of value, it is quite possible that what is now classified under the low grades, so called, will be graded as No. 1, not only on account of their high gluten content, but because their flour content and by-products combined, according to market quotations, are more valuable than the wheat of the so-called high grades. In any case, with the establishment of honest standards hard wheats will be of substantially the same value, pound for pound, although the creation of a couple of grades might be necessary to properly indicate the milling and baking values. If measured in bulk, a bushel of rejected grade weighs around 49 pounds, whereas No. 1 northern weighs 57 pounds to the bushel in bulk. But the farmer who sells it must give 60 pounds of either to make a bushel. In other words, it is sold by the pound. The farmer drives up to the local elevator with a load of wheat. The local buyer comes out with a bucket, weighs a sample and says, "Docked 2 pounds for screenings," for which the farmer gets nothing, though they have a commercial value, and notwithstanding the fact that he pays the freight on them to the terminal. "Forty-seven pounds," says the buyer; "this wheat grades rejected." He then settles for the wheat, taking 60 pounds to the bushel, but pays according to the quotations for wheat of rejected grade.

Those interested in following this study further are referred to Special Bulletin, volume 3, No. 14, food department of the North Dakota Agricultural College, Fargo, prepared by Dr. E. F. Ladd and A. K. Johnson.

It has not been attempted in this article to cover the abuses of the market raiders, speculators, gamblers, and the line elevators, storage men, and certain terminal flour millers who play in along with them. That is a whole story by itself.

CONCLUSIONS.

1. At both ends of the bread line the measures and scales are faulty and incorrect, resulting in false measures at one end and short weights at the other.

2. Wheat of rejected grade will make just as good flour as No. 1 northern, and more nutritious bread because of the high gluten content. This is very important to poor families. Bread made from full gluten flour is the best known substitute for meat.

3. The flour from rejected wheat makes a loaf of the largest volume and takes the highest rating in point of texture.

4. While it is true that the high grades of wheat, so called, will produce a higher percentage of flour per bushel, it is also true that the flour and by-products from one bushel of the low grades are more valuable than the flour and by-products from the same quantity of the high grades.

5. A crooked yardstick is a weapon of oppression. Even so strong an organization as the Standard Oil could not exist if it used crooked measures. The grain raisers, the consumers, and the great bulk of the flour millers (excepting some of those who engage in the grain trade as a separate or auxiliary business) are interested in having honest standards of value and correct weights.

6. The price of wheat invariably rules higher in England than in the United States. Yet the war price of bread in London is cheaper than the normal price of bread in New York and other American cities.

7. It would seem that the middle has been "playing" the ends long enough. Why not play the ends against the middle? Here is an opportunity for successful cooperation. In the past some people from certain wheat areas have been trying to secure remedial legislation. They have failed. But they can win with the help of the bread eaters. How long will a patient and long-suffering people wait for Congress to pass a law providing for the grading of grain, the establishment of definite standards of value, and standard weights for the sale of bread? It need not be long with intelligent cooperation.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

HON. THOMAS P. GORE,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Saturday, July 21, 1917.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

The VICE PRESIDENT. The time of the Senator from Colorado has expired.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, the argument of the Senator from Colorado [Mr. SHAFROTH] in favor of the Chamberlain amendment is the best argument which has yet been made against that amendment. If, indeed, New York is the principal primary market and the farmer is to have the price of his wheat discounted upon the basis of the New York price, then the amendment of the Senator from Nebraska certainly ought to be adopted. According to the statement of the Senator from Colorado, if wheat be $2 a bushel in New York, it will then be $1.70 or $1.75 in the great wheat belt of the Middle West, and what the price would be on the Pacific coast I am unable even to guess. Mr. President, I do not believe that the farmers in the wheat belt, who have been encouraged to sow generously, ought to have their price fixed upon the prevailing price in the city of New York.

There is a singular coincidence between the price which would result from the Senator's argument—$1.70 to $1.75 in the wheat belt—as compared with the price which has already been fixed by the Wheat Export Co. I hold in my hand Russell's Commercial Review, issued in New York on July 17, 1917. It states that the Wheat Export Co. has agreed to pay from $1.75 to $1.85 to farmers for their wheat. The Wheat Export Co. is the buying concern for the allied Governments; it is made up of all the leading English grain companies. The price fixed by the Wheat Export Co. is from $1.75 to $1.80. According to the Senator's argument, if $2 were made the basic price at New York, then the farmers will receive from $1.75 to $1.85. I do not say that there is any concert of action; I merely suggest that the coincidence is singular.

The Senator says there is nothing in this bill which gives control to the Government of the price of wheat. Mr. President, this bill must be considered in connection with the act passed a few weeks ago which vests the President with the embargo power. That power has been exercised. An embargo has been laid upon the exportation of wheat. The Senator well knows that whenever this Government is vested with the power to control the surplus production of wheat in this country it can fix the price not only of the surplus but of the entire production. The power that can control the surplus can control the entire production, and the farmer takes the risk of having his wheat fixed by the Wheat Export Co. at $1.75 to $1.85, and if Mr. Hoover should work in harmony with these English companies the price received by the farmer would be $1.75 or $1.85 per bushel.

I think the Senator made a wise suggestion when he declared that we ought to fix the price to the farmer at the farm, or rather at the farmer's local market. Then all possibility of manipulation would be eliminated. But I do not intend to pursue this subject further.

In this whole price-fixing endeavor we are departing from the lessons of human experience. I wish, Mr. President, to have read one or two extracts which shed a most luminous light upon frail human attempts to arrest or repeal the fundamental laws of economics. This is not a new thing under the sun. For more than 20 centuries puny human efforts have been made to repeal the law of supply and demand, or, rather, to reverse that law. These efforts were made in Athens 400 years before Christ. It was a capital offense to hoard foodstuffs in Athens. Efforts were made in England before the Norman conquest. Before the time of Edward the Confessor repeated statutes were enacted in England to regulate prices. They had an assize of beer and an assize of bread to regulate those prices. Not only that; they undertook to regulate the wages of labor. The celebrated statute of laborers was passed in 1349, the year after the black plague which destroyed from one-third to one-half the population of England. Wages soared to unprecedented heights. Employers controlled Parliament. Employers prevailed upon Parliament to pass a law that no laborer should ask or receive higher wages than he received for like labor before the plague. The statute also regulated the clothes which he should wear and the food which he should eat and made it a penal offense to eat better food or to wear better apparel than the statute provided. England long ago abandoned that policy, although the policy of regulating wages was not finally forsaken until 1514.

I wish to have one sentence on that subject read from the book which I send to the desk.

The VICE PRESIDENT. In the absence of objection, the Secretary will read as requested.

The Secretary read as follows:

It will be seen in the Historical Digest that a long series of acts endeavoring to fix the rate of wages and, indeed, general prices, began in England as early as 1266; was abandoned and tried again, until finally definitely given up for the last time about the time of Elizabeth. (Federal and State Constitutions of the United States; Stimson; p. 34.)

Mr. GORE. It was abandoned, Mr. President, in the time of Elizabeth.

I now send to the desk a copy of a statute passed by the German Reichstag in 1512. I ask to have the marked passage read.

There being no objection, the Secretary read as follows:

The Reichstag, sitting at Cologne in 1512, saw itself compelled to take steps against the usurious, forestalling, capitalistic companies. A very stringent antitrust act was passed, in which it was ordained "that henceforth it shall be prohibited to carry on such injurious practices whereby the Holy Empire and all the estates have suffered considerable loss and damage." It was ordered that "if these merchant companies should dare to produce an unseemly dearth, then all authorities shall, with diligence and severity, abolish such dearth and other honest and tolerable trading, and if they neglect this duty then the imperial fisc shall proceed and act as determined in the law." "Thou shalt not" has at all times been an easy expedient of the lawmaker. The fathers, however, were not more successful with the execution of the law than the children are to-day. * * *

Of Ambrose Hochstetter, of Augsburg, a contemporary relates that he bought up whole lines of goods and paid higher prices than their market value to drive out other merchants who could not afford it. "He then made a rise in the goods in all countries and sold them just as he wished. No merchant with 50,000 florins or 100,000 florins could stand against him, because he made profits as he chose. He bought up the quicksilver in all the kingdoms and countries dearer than the common price, and paid 8 florins the hundredweight," so that he could press the other merchants by his foxiness. When he had bought all the quicksilver into his hands he sold it again for 14 florins the hundredweight. Pepper rose in the six years from 1512 to 1519 to three and four times its former price; sugar, in 1516 at 11 florins, stood, in 1518, at 20 florins the hundredweight; almonds rose from 8 florins to 12; nutmegs to seven times their old price within the same period. (Money and Prices; Schoenhof; pp. 72, 73, and 74.)

Mr. GORE. In the book which I send to the desk, at page 249, I ask to have read a statute passed by the first legislative assembly that ever assembled in the Western Hemisphere. It was enacted in the Colony of Virginia in 1624. I ask to have it read for the enlightenment of the Senate. It would be pertinent as an amendment to the pending bill.

There being no objection, the matter referred to was read by the Secretary, as follows:

The ancient prejudice against forestalling survives in the following statute, which would make havoc of the business of some modern brokers: "Whatsoever person or persons shall buy or cause to be bought any merchandise, victuals, or any other things, coming by land or water to the market to be sold, or make any bargain, contract, or promise for the having or buying of the same * * * before the said merchandise, victuals, or other thing shall be at the market ready to be sold; or make any motion by word, letter or message, or otherwise to any person or persons for the enhancing of the price or dearer selling of any thing or things above mentioned, or else dissuade, move, or stir any person or persons coming to the market to abstain or forbear to bring or convey any of the things above rehearsed to any market, as aforesaid, shall be deemed and adjudged a forestaller. And if any person or persons shall offend in the things before recited and being thereof duly convicted or attainted shall, for his or their first offense, suffer imprisonment by the space of two months without bail or mainprise, and shall also lose and forfeit the value of the goods so by him or them bought or had as aforesaid; and for a second offense * * * shall suffer imprisonment for the space of one-half year * * * and shall lose the double value of all the goods * * * so bought * * * and for the third offense * * * shall be set on the pillory * * * and lose and forfeit all the goods and chattels that he or they then have to their own use, and also be committed to prison, there to remain during the governor's pleasure." Conservation of Food and Fuel.

HON. THOMAS P. GORE,

OF OKLAHOMA,

IN THE SENATE OF THE UNITED STATES,

Wednesday, July 18, 1917.

The Senate had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. GORE. Mr. President, I will say that I appreciate the importance of mobilizing the talent, ability, and experience of the leading business men in this country. It would be shortsighted not to press such resources into the service of the Government. I also appreciate the desirability of divorcing patriotism from profiteering. Our first duty is to protect the Government so far as we can against the possibilities of high finance. But I think these men themselves who are serving on these advisory committees are entitled to protection. They are entitled to have their relations with the Government and their motives protected against such suspicion and against unmerited criticism. If they are honest, they will welcome every possible safeguard to render themselves immune against undeserving criticism.

I wish to say, Mr. President, that resulting from the price stock wheat advanced between the declaration of war and the 12th of May about 60 per cent. The market was closed in order to prevent a further advance, possibly in order to affect a reduction in the price of wheat; I can not state, but I desire to call the attention of the Senate in this connection to the market quotations of certain stocks, the stocks in companies which are represented on these advisory committees. As a rule the stocks have experienced most propitious fortunes. They have greatly enhanced in value. I do not say that this enhancement of value is due to the presence of the representatives of these companies on the advisory committees or these purchasing boards; I merely submit the statement for whatever it may chance to be worth.

Of course, I had to select dates, and I have taken the 5th of March, the date of the inauguration of the President; the 5th of April, the day before the declaration of war on the 6th; and the 5th of July. I would have taken the 5th of May, but was unable to obtain the Wall Street Journal, the authority upon which I was relying for that date. The party preparing the schedule, for some reason or lack of reason, selected the 25th of May. That may be discarded from the equation. I ask that it be read to the Senate.

The PRESIDENT pro tempore. Without objection, the Secretary will read.

Conservation of Food and Fuel.

OF

HON. JAMES C. WILSON,

OF TEXAS,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Wednesday, June 20, 1917.

The House in Committee of the Whole House on the state of the Union had under consideration the bill (H. R. 4961) to provide further for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving food supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel.

Mr. WILSON of Texas. Mr. Chairman, I have given more study to this proposed food legislation than I have to any measure that has been up in this war Congress; more than to the war resolution, conscription, the revenue bill carrying billions in taxes. It was easier for me to reach a conclusion I felt was right as to those measures. I am inclined to agree with those who have said on this floor that this is the most important legislation we have considered.

For the Nation to control and conserve and increase the production of the necessaries of life and at the same time reduce their cost to the consumer and do justice to the men who produce those necessaries in the matter of prices presents an unheard-of problem in this country, and is an undertaking fraught, on the very face of it, with the gravest difficulties. We are launching into new and untried fields every day, and this is another one. There is scarcely a tree blazed to aid us in getting our bearings. The experience and mistakes of our allies will aid us in avoiding many pitfalls in the conduct of our part of the war, but their food-control legislation and that of the central powers does not throw the light very far ahead of us over here. Outside of their unsatisfactory results, America and Americans present another problem.

On the other hand, as the war progresses we are becoming accustomed, and we will more and more become accustomed, to new problems, and in proportion as the difficulties of their solution increase the labors and determination of America to solve them will also increase. The duty is pressing upon us to do something, and to do it now, in the direction of food and fuel control.

I am sure most of the Members have heard or read those statements before certain committees as to the situation of our allies with respect to their present supply of foodstuffs. These statements, on account of the confidential information contained in them, have very properly been suppressed. No one can read them without becoming alarmed. We realize that lack of food is threatening our very cause. Most of the wealth-producing man power of our allies is on the various battle fronts of Europe and Asia, either fighting or dead. Their consumption, on the other hand, is greater. The workers in their munition factories have been increased nearly a thousandfold. This of necessity takes or keeps labor from their farms. This course they must pursue in order to have the necessary output of munitions to supply the men on the hundreds and hundreds of miles of battle lines.

When one contemplates these conditions and also the havoc being wrought by the submarine in sinking thousands of tons of foodstuffs and ships, we are not surprised that our allies are beginning to see the bottoms of their granaries and storehouses, with no hope of them being refilled by their own labor. They are now almost looking to us for their daily bread. Their commissions visiting us recently have said that they can whip the Germans if we can feed them. We should do more than this if we can get there in time, but feed them we must. To conserve our food supply and increase production so that we have sufficient in American granaries and storehouses to feed them will not suffice; this will not win the war. But we must fill their ships in our harbors and furnish the balance of the ships needed to put the necessary foodstuffs to their shores. This emergency demands the best effort of this Nation in all its history; it calls for the patriotic, unflinching sacrifice on the part of every loyal American.

Again, as to the importance of this food legislation, we are brought irresistibly to the conviction that for our part now—to furnish food and to do all the things necessary to furnish it—is more important than to furnish soldiers, battleships, or munition. I know of no other nation as a belligerent that has been nishing food has outranked in importance all the other items in a war program; when we as a belligerent could effectively help defend or win a war without soldiers or guns or ammunition. I know of no other nation as a belligerent that has been so situated. We must discharge this duty of feeding first and then do whatever else is necessary to bring the war to a speedy end and to ourselves and the world a real and lasting peace.

Now, when we turn our eyes to our food situation at home we find added cause for alarm, and the reason for quick relief and action immediately in food and fuel control and conservation is doubled. The cry of actual distress is coming up from all over the country, especially from the poor of the cities, by reason of the outrageously high prices of the necessities, the mere staples of life. We have no shortage of foodstuffs that we know about. The only change in our situation is, we have a better market than ever in all our history. We were the richest country on the earth before the war, and it has of necessity, and in the main legitimately so, added billions to our wealth. The allies, all expense counted up, pay approximately half of the value of a cargo to get it oversea. We escape such confiscatory freight rates, yet the prices of our foodstuffs are but little under the prices in our allied countries. We are in fact a land of plenty, yet there are poor in our country at the very door of starvation, and people who work at that. We are threatened with and have actually had food riots in the midst of all this plenty and wealth.

Are we surprised? Can we expect it to be otherwise when flour goes to $18 per barrel, or approximately $9 per hundred, and Irish potatoes sell at $4.50 and even as high as $6 per bushel? Daily the prices are leaping upward. The price though to the farmer is not leaping up in proportion. Some one who does not earn or deserve it is raking in the millions without a corresponding service, at the expense of us all. These prices do not represent real or intrinsic value of these necessaries. Not prices coming naturally under the law of supply and demand but artificial and speculative and so high they seem fabulous. The circumstances are conclusive. They are the prices that gamblers and combinations are fastening upon us.

I do not agree to the wholesale onslaught by some on the middleman as a class. I know men in this class who are conducting their business conservatively, taking only a reasonable and legitimate profit. On the other hand there are those apparently without any sense of responsibility of their crime, free of all consideration of patriotism, or of humanity, willing to take advantage of the war, of our troubles, of the distress of the poor and the weak, and through combinations and gambling are going at the very throats of the people and the Nation with a ferocity of wild beasts. They seem not satisfied with the prospect of riches through toil in a few weeks or months but only with getting rich in a day. People who will do this, and through combinations and illegitimate speculation drive the price of things we eat and wear out of all reason and the reach of the poor and by it threaten our very cause, are but a grade above the vandal who cuts off the dead soldier's finger to take the ring he wore when he fell in battle. They are each getting something they have not earned and do not deserve. The only distinction possibly in instances is a lack of consciousness of what they are really doing. Who would say that this mad revel of money making through get-rich-quick schemes on the part of those who produce nothing and serve nothing except their own selfish ends, should not be controlled and curbed. Of course any laws we pass fixing penalties to control such people, like all criminal statutes, must be general and apply to good and bad alike. Special laws applying to the illegitimate and to the legitimate dealer would involve on the part of the Government the trial of each man's business and his methods separately. What we pass here must of necessity apply to the legitimate dealer as well as to the gambler I have just described.

When we contemplate our own situation and that of our allies with respect to foodstuffs and fuel and prices, the duty of every man in this Congress is plain. We can accomplish nothing by sitting here idle with hands folded. There are men here, in the face of this serious situation, who oppose this bill in toto. Yet these men offer nothing better as a substitute—in fact, offer nothing. They propose nothing. It seems they had rather during the war to have the gambler and speculator control than to trust the Government to do so.

The purpose of this bill as found in its preamble and first section is to provide for the national security and defense by encouraging the production, conserving the supply, and controlling the distribution of food products and fuel. To prevent, locally, scarcity, monopolization, hoarding, injurious speculation, manipulation, and private control affecting such supply, distribution and movement of such necessaries. To do these things it is declared to be essential to a successful prosecution of the war and for the support and maintenance of our Army and Navy. What American, believing we could justly accomplish these declared purposes through this bill would oppose its passage? Surely none in this Congress. Did I think the bill as written, with all of its present provisions, would accomplish these things justly and with due regard to the rights of the producer, I would not favor a change in it even to the dotting of an "i." As it is, the bill is a great conception, and the Committee on Agriculture and its chairman, Mr. LEVER, deserve the Nation's praise. I am seriously opposed to one feature of it. This is the provision in section 12 with reference to price fixing, and I will later fully discuss my objections to any maximum, minimum, guaranteed, or any other kind of price fixing affecting the prices of the product in the hands of the producer or that he may sell on the market.

I want to give my attention for the present to some more features of the bill that I favor. It is easy to see the bill is to have more good than bad in it when finished. No man should vote against it unless he has something better to offer. Legislation is only accomplished through compromise. We should not kick out of the harness or balk because a bill does not in all of its details and provisions fit our every notion. If we only supported bills carrying many provisions when this was so, we would be always just a negative quantity, voting against everything and never favoring anything. This bill has dozens and dozens of important provisions. We vote upon each of these separately. I have made up my mind as to these war measures when a majority outvote me to take that as the will of the people on that issue, and if I think it is, in the main, good and violates no principle to which I cling, and that I would not surrender under any circumstances, I shall vote for such bills when finished.

I shall oppose certain amendments I understand certain parties are threatening to ingraft on this bill. I shall want to see some changes in it. There are a few amendments I hope will be added to it, but whether they carry or not I am going to be found voting for it on the finish. [Applause.] The situation is too serious, the need of relief too urgent, to play the rôle of obstructionists. Where there are many items in a bill voted upon separately, if each Member carried his opposition to a particular item to the extent of voting against the completed bill, you would have a situation where a majority favored each item of the bill and yet an overwhelming majority against the bill voted on as a whole.

I think our purpose should be to fix no prices on the farmers' products, just free the market from all improper influences, strike from it the gambler and combinations, and leave it a fair market controlled by the law of supply and demand, and see that all dealers in necessaries above the producer are allowed during the war to sell at such a price above what they paid the producer on such a market as will bring them a just and reasonable profit and no more. Let us see if the provisions of this bill will accomplish, or in a measure accomplish, these objects.

Section 4 makes the willful commission of waste unlawful. It is currently reported that certain parties during this war have destroyed millions of eggs for the purpose of enhancing the egg market. Who would say that we should tolerate such influences on the market at this time? Unreasonable and excessive hoarding, except in case of producers and their own products, is forbidden. This hoarding and storing for the purpose of controlling the markets must stop. It of course prevents merely unreasonable storage. The storing of some foodstuffs, of course, is indispensable, but hoarding in quantities in excess of the reasonable requirements for use or consumption or in excess of the reasonable requirements of business should cease.

All alike are forbidden to conspire, combine, or agree with any person to limit the facilities for transporting, producing, manufacturing, supplying, storing, or dealing in any necessaries, or to combine to restrict the supply of any necessaries, or their necessaries, or to restrict the supply of any necessary, or their distribution, or to prevent, limit, or lessen the manufacture or production of same. Of course, combinations to enhance the price of necessaries or to exact excessive prices for them is made unlawful. Also monopolies or attempted monopoly and unjust and unreasonable charges for handling, and this applies not merely to interstate commerce and to conspiracies affecting interstate trade but to commerce in the States and to all combinations, though they affect only a locality. Of course it is only the fact of the existence of the war that makes such a law by the Congress constitutional. These provisions should be effective in stopping all conspiracies for the purpose of unduly enhancing the prices of necessaries.

Now, as to the regulation of the middleman, as we call him—the dealer in necessaries. Section 5 provides that from time to time whenever the President shall find it essential to license the importation, exportation, manufacture, storage, distribution of any necessaries, in order to carry into effect any of the purposes of this act and shall publicly so announce, no person shall after a date fixed in the announcement, engage in or carry on such business specified in the announcement unless he shall secure and hold a license issued pursuant to this section. This is a vast power we are placing in the President's hands. He is empowered to regulate the conduct of the business of any such licensees. He can specify the system of accounts and auditing used. It requires this to make the control effective.

Reports under oath may be required and inspection allowed at any and all times.

Whenever the rate, charge, or practice of the licensee is unjust, unfair, or discriminatory, the President can stop them by Executive order, can revoke the license, and can find and specify what is a reasonable rate, charge, practice, and so forth. If it is meant by this provision and the use of the word "charge" to authorize the President to fix arbitrarily the price that such dealers or licensees must sell at and irrespective of the fact that they may be making only reasonable profits, I am opposed to it. I would rather grant such a power to the President than any other person in America, but I am not ready to vote that power to the Government. The emergency might come when I would vote that way, but I do not think such an emergency exists now. I am opposed to this Congress or the President fixing any prices that the producer is to sell his crops at, and am opposed to anything being done by the Government, directly or indirectly, with a view of fixing those prices or that will have the effect of fixing them. Make the market for the producer a fair one, based and fixed by supply and demand. He can not justly complain at this. It is all right to fix the dealer's price, not arbitrarily, but by allowing him to sell at such price above what he pays for necessaries in such a market as will yield to him a reasonable and fair profit; this is practicable and will work no injustice to anyone nor to the Government. Of course, the farmer is exempted from the license provision, and in these words: "This section shall not apply to any farmer, gardener, or other person with respect to the products of any farm, garden, or other lands owned, leased, or cultivated by him." Now, some contend these words include the cattle raiser and that he is also exempted from the license provision. I doubt if these words exempt him. Evidently the person wording this section did not have him in mind. We do not refer to him as a farmer or gardener, nor to his work of raising cattle on land as cultivation, nor can it be hardly contended that cattle are the products of the land on which they are grazed. Mr. LEVER says these words are intended to include him; if so, they should be made clear; otherwise it is an unjust discrimination. The cattle and hog raiser is just as much a producer of foodstuffs as the farmer or gardener. The fact there is more wealth among them as a class than among the farmers is no excuse for a discrimination; and the exemption should include not only the man who feeds and raises cattle but the man who buys cattle and fattens them for the market. This exemption should not include the man who merely buys and sells cattle; he is just as much a dealer in foodstuff as the man who buys and sells wheat. But the man who buys a bunch of steer yearlings weighing 400 pounds and fattens them or increases their growth, either on the grass or in feed pens to 800 pounds is just as much a producer and as much entitled to this exemption as the cattle breeder, the farmer, or the gardener; in fact, I expect more pounds of the world's meat supply in these days is produced by this man than by the cowman who handles stock cattle exclusively.

There is another American business man or parasite who should be put out of business, and that is the gambler, speculator in the necessaries of life—whether in the Chicago Board of Trade, Wall Street, or any other street or place in the United States. The bulls and bears alike should go. Let us see what this legislation proposes to do for the people with respect to him. In section 11 the President is given full power to limit or even prohibit if he deems it necessary, to prevent undue enhancement or fluctuation of prices, all injurious speculation, unjust market manipulation, unfair and misleading market quotation of prices, and is given the power to close up all exchanges, boards of trades, or similar institutions or places of business in order to stop such evil practices.

We are facing a crisis in this food situation of ourselves and our allies, and who, understanding that this bill carries such provisions, can oppose its passage? As a measure looking to the conservation of our food supply and the prevention of artificial, speculative, and excessive prices, due to unjust manipulation of our markets, who can offer a better remedy than these provisions of the bill?

I have discussed those features of the bill forbidding willful waste and preventable deterioration of foodstuffs; unreasonable, injurious, and unnecessary hoarding; the bridling and control of dealers in the necessaries of life; and, lastly, that stop the gambling in the wheat pits and cotton exchanges of the country in these things on which we subsist and on which our national security and defense largely depend, and with which, for the present, this Nation is to do its principal part in winning the war. I do not question the honesty or patriotism of those who oppose this bill in its entirety, but, frankly, I can not understand their attitude.

But there is something equally as important as conservation and the prevention of unjust prices, and that is increased production. In my judgment it is in this respect that the bill is weak. I come to that feature of the bill which I seriously object to. It is the provision in section 12, as follows:

That whenever the President shall find that an emergency exists requiring stimulation of production and that it is essential that the producers of any nonperishable agricultural products produced within the United States shall have the benefits of the guaranty provided for in this section in order to stimulate production of such products, he is authorized, from time to time, seasonably and as far in advance of seeding time as practicable, to determine and fix and to give public notice of what, under specified conditions, is a reasonable guaranteed price for any such products in order to assure such producers a reasonable profit.

The declared purpose of stimulated production is all right, but the trouble is the remedy offered of a guaranteed price in its practicable operation will not produce the desired result of increased production.

I have been opposed to any maximum or minimum price fixing, and I am glad those provisions have been eliminated from the bill. I am just as much opposed to giving to the President any power to fix a guaranteed price or to this Congress fixing such a price. I do not know that the President favors this guaranteed price feature. I find the fact that a provision is in a bill not conclusive that he favors it. Be that as it may, we are all going to make mistakes—I may be making one in my opposition to this; but every man here is presumed to be capable of thinking and deciding and acting for himself and his constituents, and if he is not he should be at home. Some presidents of farmers' unions and the heads of agricultural societies have been here favoring the fixing of maximum and minimum prices, and, since these features are eliminated, are now favoring the fixing of a guaranteed price. I accord to all of these honesty of purpose—I can think of no other purpose that could actuate them. I think it is simply a mistake in judgment. It is my idea that my friend Mr. YOUNG's prejudice against some of these gentlemen who have appeared before his committee accounts for his getting off wrong in his opposition to this entire bill. The heads of farmers' organizations evidently think that the price, when fixed, will be as high as the market would afford, or at a price higher than the farmer could get for his product on a market governed by supply and demand. In this they are mistaken. When the price is fixed it will not be with a view of benefiting the farmer, but for the benefit of the Government or the whole people, and will be fixed at a lower price than the farmer could get in the market. Though it is only a guaranteed and not a fixed price at which the farmer must sell—no more, no less—it will have the effect of reducing the market price to the guaranteed price. Too, no man nor set of men on this earth—call them food administrator or food commission or what not—under present conditions can tell the value of any commodity except in one way, and that is by noticing what such commodities sell for in a market controlled and fixed by the law of supply and demand and made fair by being stripped of every unnatural, illegitimate, and speculative influence.

What is the value of a commodity, anyway? The standard of values and of ascertaining value is not changed by the war. The courts have decided what value is. It is the exchange power of an article, the money-getting ability of such article in the market, what it will exchange for in money. Value is not what anybody thinks a thing is worth; it is not what you or I think the farmer ought to take for it; it is not what the town farmer, without practical experience in his business, might imagine, viewed from a patriotic standpoint, that he would be willing to take for it had his own sweat produced it; it is the sum of money it produces to the seller when sold. If there is not a market, then it becomes a matter of intrinsic or actual value gotten at by figuring the capital and labor expended in producing it. But who says there is no market? On the contrary, we have a better market for more commodities than ever in the world's history. No human mind is capable, especially now, of grasping and pulling together all of the constituent elements that enter into value and of welding them into value as a fact, or even to say, with any degree of certainty, what a given commodity should sell for. Why, the rules of evidence, perfected through the ages, do not permit even the expert under oath in court, where there is shown to be a market for an article, to say what the value of that article is, not even to give his opinion about it, but only to state what the market is or was for that or a similar article at a given date and place, yet we have those who think that fixing value or the prices is a simple and easy task.

When you enter into price fixing, you enter into a realm of guesswork and speculation full of uncertainties and possibilities of injustice. You will either fix it at less or more than the market. If you fix it at more, the farmer is not entitled to it and you do the greater number an injustice, and you raise instead of lower the price to the consumer, and thus defeat one of the main purposes of the legislation. On the other hand, if you fix it at a lower price you do a rank injustice to the producer. You take money by the millions out of the producers' pockets and put it into the consumers'—a thing manifestly wrong.

If we make the market a fair one, as I have described, based on supply and demand, neither the producer nor consumer can justly complain. If it makes wheat $3 and cotton 25 cents in such a market, the farmer is entitled to it, regardless of what it cost to produce it. The producer is merely fortunate for the first time in all of his history by reason of his occupation and place in our economic life, while those of us who are consumers are merely unfortunate. I am a consumer; you are. If we do not like it, we should go to the farm and see how easy it is to produce the stuff that feeds the world. We should not take care of the consumer by making him a gift out of the pockets of the producer; we should reduce the price to the consumer by removing illegitimate hoarding and waste and speculation, and yet leave the producer unrestricted in the sale of his products in a market governed by the law of supply and demand. In addition to this, the salary of the wage-earning consumer should be increased in order that he may buy his necessaries in such a market. In war, of necessity, some are fortunate and some are unfortunate by virtue of their business or positions in life, and this can not be helped; some must fight, some must die—all must pay our just share—the business of some is crushed, while others, of necessity, prosper. These natural hardships and benefits, though coming from ill winds, must not be shifted by law from the shoulders or from the pockets of one citizen to another, and certainly if injustices in some instances must be done it should not be by discrimination against those who produce the wealth by tilling the soil.

The producer does not fix or dictate the market. He has been compelled through the past to sell on a market presumably controlled by supply and demand, but in fact influenced by all kinds of illegitimate practices, and has often gotten the worst of it, and now since the supply is comparatively small and the demand enormously great and his profits correspondingly great, they should not be denied him even if we are at war and even if they are called war profits. This idea that money is not to be made out of the war is a dream, and since it is going to be made, let it be made by those who most deserve it. Our accumulated wealth in 140 years is $250,000,000,000. The farmer produces annually nine billions of wealth, and he has a mighty little of it.

Frankly, the distance between the extremes of wealth and poverty in this country is entirely too great. This is the result of our institutions. They are wrong. We are chargeable for it, but I love those institutions. They are changing; they are swinging in the right direction. I would change them to remedy these conditions if I could. I would correct them as I would the defects in my own children. This war presents the greatest opportunity in the world to bring these extremes nearer together. Let those who possess the wealth, in so far as possible, bear the financial burdens of the war, and let those who produce the wealth—the farmer and the laboring man—have all of their legitimate profits during the war.

Here I want to do justice to the rich individual of America. In all the propaganda that passes through our offices we see no word of protest from him. The rich corporation in instances are complaining; but the rich individual, as far as I can see, is patriotic and stands with his pockets open and says to the Government they will remain open during the crisis. After being heavily taxed, he buys liberty bonds; he gives millions to the Red Cross and Belgium relief fund. I want to say I admire their patriotic attitude and loyalty to the Government, and the humanitarian spirit that they are exhibiting at this time. There are Members of this Congress who are voting and fighting for provisions in the war-revenue bill that will entail on them the payment of such taxes. If they remain in this Congress for 20 years their total salary would not equal their war tax.

But here I think of Markham's poem, "The Man with the Hoe." He says in this poem he bears the burden of the world. I will not take time—I wish I could—to read it. I say just leave this man with the hoe alone. He is also patriotic. As the gentleman from Nebraska [Mr. SLOAN] just said, if you hurt him or help him he will be just the same, as far as his patriotism is concerned. He will be loyal. If there is any man in this country of ours who deserves special privileges, if they are to be granted to anyone, I say in all frankness and fairness it is the farmer. [Applause.]

Now, as to this guaranteed price feature in the bill. I have said, if fixed, it would tend to reduce the market to the guaranteed price. Let us see about this. Markets are sensitive any way. Crop reports made by the Government, the manipulation of bulls and bears, drive it up and down in an astounding way. Last year this happened: The presidents of the various farmers' unions of the South were meeting at New Orleans. Cotton at that time was selling at about 16 cents. A telegram, without authority, either through mistake or fraud, was sent out at a point in Texas to New Orleans and there repeated in messages to the whole country, stating that the farmers' organizations were going to hold cotton for a price of 12 cents. This broke the cotton market from 16 cents and lost the farmers' millions of dollars before the error could be corrected. Now, these organizations are not powerful enough to exercise any control over the market. It was just an influence and shows how sensitive the market is and what things will cause it to fluctuate. If such an announcement of a price under the market will have such effect, what would be the effect of a power like the United States, representing itself and its allies as buyers of wheat, announcing a guaranteed price for wheat? It will be taken as the judgment of the United States that it is worth no more; that that is its value. It will have the effect of a maximum and, at the same time, a minimum price. If it does have this effect and cuts the value of the producers' products, it is a taking of his property, and unjust. For illustration—and this applies to wheat, cotton, and all products—if a farmer owned a certain sized mule of a certain age and actually and on the market worth $250, the Government arbitrarily fixes the price of such a mule at $125. This is just as much a taking under the law as if the Government should actually take the mule and pay the farmer $125 for same. What is the difference in the two to the farmer? It is wrong in principle, unfair, unjust, and in the very face of the Constitution. No provisions of the Constitution are suspended in war; the only difference is that some provisions of it are in effect in war that are not in peace. The harm you do him by thus cutting his values is difficult of ascertainment, of course, but the principle is there, and violated just the same. The guaranteed price is a nice evasion. It presents a different legal question from fixing maximum and minimum prices, but if it has the same result it is the same in principle and equally wrong and unfair and will equally operate to the injustice of the producer.

Though we are at war, suppose the market affords the farmer $3 for his wheat. If he can get that on such a market, if the world wants it at that price, who can say it is not worth it? He is merely fortunate by being in the business. To take a dollar off of that value or price is just as much a taking as if the farmer owned three bushels of wheat and the Government took one of them without just compensation. Again, what is the difference to the farmer? Either, and one just as much as the other, would be an indirect war tax upon the farmer that no man in this Congress for one minute would advocate as a direct tax. Take wheat for illustration, and all products in competition with it are going to be affected by any price you fix on it. Say we raise 800,000,000 bushels, if the Government strikes even 50 cents from its price and value on the bushel you have imposed a war tax of $400,000,000 on the wheat farmers alone. If it has such a result it would be an outrage even though they constitute but 5 per cent of our population. Who would favor such a war tax on that class?

To go into the cost of production is folly. It is so different in different States and the yield is so varied. This is a realm of pure speculation and involves interminable difficulties and injustice. Besides, in the South—in Texas, I know—the farmer realizes he is not going to make a profit every year. He must take the fat years and the lean figured together to show a profit, and he has decidedly more lean years that fat. And, of course, the Government could not figure this. And to figure, as you propose to do, the cost of production, and to allow a 10 or even a 25 per cent profit is the sheerest injustice. If his profits are a hundred per cent they belong to him and should not be taken from him, directly nor indirectly. To deprive him of the fat years is to leave him a loser. Leave off all price fixing of producers' stuff; add one more exemption to this bill—leave the producer alone. Whether it hurts or helps him, make the market, so far as possible, a fair and natural one, and let him take his profits whatever they are. To take any other position is to fall into a dollar argument—it is a dollar argument, anyway—in behalf of the Government and our allies as buyers as against the individual producer. The Government is authorized to buy and sell necessaries by this bill. We are rich and should buy in such a market like the individual or dealer. The Government can sell at cost or under cost. As a last resort, the Government, in order to relieve the distress of the poor in the great centers of population, had better sell these necessaries, as I understand our allied Governments are doing, at a loss. Such a loss incurred by the Government in so doing would be taken care of out of the taxes we all pay, would be paid by the whole people. This strikes me as more just than to let the producer pay it all by cutting his values.

You will not stimulate the production by this guaranteed price. The conditions that now exist, and that will exist for several years to come, are all the guarantee that the farmer wants for reasonable profits. He is patriotic, but profits—war profits, if you please—will best cause him to strain every nerve to increase production. He is patriotic, but he will not increase his production as a matter of patriotism. This will cause a man to raise a garden who has not been doing so before but will not materially increase production among those who follow it as a business, and in this respect they are only human. Nature did not plant in the heart of man that kind of patriotism that is in the heart of a woman who wears the needle into the flesh knitting socks and clothes for soldiers. He may have the patriotic impulse to do it, he may be all filled up with determination to do it, but weeks and months of dirt and sweat and sun in hot fields and fatigue will cause it to ebb. Charity begins at home. The prospect of bettering his own condition in life, that of his wife and children; these things will make him stick. They are the things that will cause him to double his labor and energy and to increase his production when all else fail. In this respect he is like the business man the world over.

I may not understand the condition and viewpoint of the Dakota farmer, of the Illinois or the New England farmer, but I do understand the viewpoint of the southern, especially the Texas, farmer. When a boy I did every kind of farm labor. When I became a man I owned and operated them and tried to make enough money in town to keep them up but failed. To look at it, it is the happiest of any life, but to follow it, with us, it is one of the hardest. Any who have had the actual experience know that it is a dream to talk about patriotism as a sufficient mainspring to cause any man to increase the output of his business, and we had as well face the facts as they are, and the only safe policy is to leave the producer a market untrammeled and unrestricted.

An emergency might arise when I would vote for such a hardship on the producer, but I do not think it is here now. I might be willing to apply a different rule to those wealth-producing corporations—artificial beings—that enjoy existence as a matter of permit and license on the part of the Government.

Mr. Chairman, in seeking light on this bill I have listened to the debate with a great deal of interest, but the speeches of most of those I have listened to largely prove where they are from and whom they represent. Some represent all consumers, others all producers, some all coal miners, others copper miners, some exclusively agricultural districts, some all business men, others have no agricultural producers, even to the extent of a war-time gardener. Those who represent all consumers apparently want to fix the provisions of this bill so as to benefit consumers exclusively. Some of these Representatives amuse me in their opposition to the guaranteed price feature of this bill on the ground that it is voting too great a benefit to the producer. I notice the local environment and influences seem greatly to color the views that Representatives express here on this food legislation. In a larger sense we are the Representatives of the Nation, of the whole people, but in a more practicable sense, on as good an authority as Lincoln, I presume it is proper that we reflect in our votes as near as we know what it is, the will of our constituents. I am quite differently situated from these gentlemen. I represent a district with more diversified interests to be directly affected by this food legislation, possibly, than any Representative here. In the first place, I live at Fort Worth, a city of approximately a hundred thousand inhabitants. It is the center of our cattle industry, the Swift and Armour packing houses are there. It is our railroad center. My county has the largest population of any in my district, and the greater part of its population is in the city in which I live. These largely come in the class of consumer. Labor unions are as strong there as anywhere in the State. We have large milling and elevator interests. The largest coal fields of the State and the largest coal-mining organizations are in and near Thurber, in my district. On the other hand, I represent six counties where the people are largely engaged in agricultural pursuits—producing cotton, wheat, corn, produce, and, incidentally, I might mention, producing more commercial peanuts than any other congressional district.

With these varied and diversified interests, I am left in a position to be fair and to consider this bill, I think, impartially. I do not know what the will of my constituents, if expressed in a vote, would be on this bill. I have taken such positions and expressed such views, and shall vote as I think for the best interest of the country and for what I think is just, and with the belief that my constituents will approve of my position when they understand my viewpoint.

Some seem to be opposed to any food legislation because they were originally opposed to our declaring that a state of war existed with Germany. The constituted authorities of the country have declared war, and it is no time now to quibble about why we declared war. It is the patriotic duty of every loyal American to do his bit to win it, and after it is won and we have peace to then settle up with any who may have acted wrongfully in voting for it.

I have been amused at some Members of the Texas delegation. If I say anything slanderous here it is intended only for them—my home folk—whom I have a right to talk about. Their various reasons assigned and their real reasons for opposing this bill make an interesting study. Some object to the great power given to the President. This is the most ridiculous of all. I do not wish to underrate the importance of our position, but a Representative individually stands here with no power except to vote and to work for his constituents. The President, under the Constitution, is given his power by the 110,000,000 people of America. The President is given the power, with the stroke of his pen, to undo the work of the majority of both branches of the Congress combined. As the Commander in Chief of the Army, under that Constitution, he has the power to take millions of our boys and send them where he deems best for the interest of the Nation. The Federal judiciary—its judges, its marshals, and its clerks—is in his hands through the appointive power. He can, with a stroke of his pen, open the doors of our Federal penitentiaries and turn every man out of them to-day. Put all of the offices of Representatives and Senators one upon another, stack them up, and they are not as great as the office of President of the United States. Whether it is a Republican or a Democrat occupying the office makes no difference. Collectively, of course, we possess great power. We do hold the purse strings and the welfare of the Nation in our hands, and these we should guard jealously. But to presume that the President is going to abuse the power granted, or to act corruptly with that power, is unjust. Our constituents could make the same presumption with reference to our course in office. By granting these great powers to the President we are proving that a Republic like ours is equal to the emergency that we are now facing. The question should not be is the power proposed to be given to the President a great one but is it a power we wish exercised by anyone? These men look down the road and get frightened. They are like some horses I have ridden. They spend all of their mental energies looking for something to scare at, and if they see anything as big as a piece of paper across the road they go out of their heads. And there are other Representatives like horses I have seen. If he is accustomed to an old log house and comes by and sees one there painted yellow, he will tear out through the woods. Many cry out that this or that thing is a departure; that there is no precedent for it. I am glad I am in no hurry to leave the old, but I am constituted so I have no regret about it—absolutely none. Breaking away from precedents does not disturb me in the least, nor do I consider precedents unless I believe that those establishing them were at the time confronted by conditions similar to those which confront us. No man should oppose this bill because there is no precedent for it, or because it appears to be a departure. The question for consideration: Is it right under present conditions; does it offer an adequate remedy to meet, or in a measure meet, the emergency we are facing? With these changes, I shall give it my hearty support. [Applause.]

Transportation by Water.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. J. HAMPTON MOORE,

OF PENNSYLVANIA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. Mr. Speaker, transportation by water is receiving the attention of Congress, although much is yet to be done to get the best service out of our navigable streams. The chairman of the Rivers and Harbors Committee, the gentleman from North Carolina, Mr. SMALL, has long advocated an improvement of the rivers and harbors of our country, devoting much of his time and thought to the question of terminals and the coordination that should properly prevail between water transportation lines and the railroads. Recently, as the result of action of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, the gentleman from North Carolina communicated with the Secretary of War, drawing his attention to some of the problems to be considered in connection with the development of our waterways.

As a contribution to the literature of the movement I submit this communication and the reply of the Secretary of War thereto:

ESTABLISHMENT OF TRANSPORTATION BY WATER.

[Letter from Hon. JOHN H. SMALL, chairman of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors, House of Representatives to Hon. Newton D. Baker, Secretary of War.]

OCTOBER 5, 1917.

Hon. NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

MY DEAR SIR: I am directed by resolution adopted by the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives to make this communication.

It is conceded that the Federal Government has jurisdiction over all navigable waterways, and it is the established policy of the Congress to make provision for the improvement of meritorious projects consistent with the demands of the country for additional means of transportation by water. As the House of Representatives must initiate all legislation and appropriations for the improvement of rivers and harbors, of which this committee has jurisdiction, the members of the committee desire to discharge their duties in the most effective manner. The primary purpose in the improvement of our rivers and harbors is to provide adequate channels for navigation and thereby to promote transportation by water. It is self-evident that the mere deepening of the entrance to or increasing the depth and area of a harbor or the improvement of the channel of an interior waterway will not alone establish water transportation. Likewise neither will the construction of a railroad track assure traffic. They simply provide the basic necessity for transportation.

There are additional facilities which must be provided for the establishment of water transportation:

First. There must exist a demand for the movement of products.

Second. There must be water terminals constructed in accordance with appropriate plans. These terminals require ample water front and capacious warehouses. They should be physically connected by a belt-line railroad with the railroad or railroads serving the community, and one or more good highways should radiate therefrom. They should be equipped with modern appliances for transferring freight between the water carrier and the warehouse and the rail car in the cheapest and most expeditious manner. These terminals should be constructed by the municipalities or other agencies of the State and maintained and regulated for the service of the public. The size and cost of such terminals will vary according to the population and the financial ability of the community to be served and the volume of traffic which exists.

Third. There must be one or more established lines of water transportation with sufficient capital, the requisite number of carriers, and a complete traffic organization.

Fourth. There should be a complete coordination between the water transportation lines and the railroads, and a prorating of traffic as to through rates between the water carriers and the rail carriers such as now exists between the several lines of railroads, to the end that each may complement the other and be jointly dedicated to the service of the public.

The committee submit that the above additional facilities are both necessary and feasible. They further suggest as a general proposition that water terminals must be provided by the States or by municipalities or other public agencies of the States, and that water carriers must be organized and maintained by individuals, corporations, or other local agencies. It may be substantially stated that Congress may only improve for purposes of navigation the capacity of the harbors and the channels of the interior waterways.

It will be admitted that there are a limited number of harbors and a larger number of interior waterways on which the foregoing essentials have not been provided. In fact, it may be stated that the people of the country, including even that forceful class of citizens who manage large industrial units and are vitally interested in transportation, appear to have slight knowledge of the primary essentials for securing transportation by water. The demand for the movement of products by water which exists under normal conditions has been made acute under war conditions, but in many cases the essential facilities are lacking.

The committee are impressed with the conviction that it is their duty to direct attention to this serious dereliction of duty upon the part of the public and to express the opinion that appropriations should not be made for the improvement of those rivers and harbors where the communities and localities are continuously unwilling to discharge their correlative duty by providing the facilities essential for the promotion of water transportation.

The committee have not established any arbitrary or inflexible rule. They are conscious that the public must be induced to realize its obligations in the development of water transportation by the processes of publicity and education. They find it difficult to excuse larger cities where production is large and additional facilities of transportation are so insistent and where neither ignorance nor poverty can be pleaded in extenuation. The committee are further aware that time will be required, even where the civic conscience has been aroused, to provide these facilities and to fully utilize navigable waterways. For the present the committee only insists there shall be no willful disregard of local and public obligations in these respects.

On behalf of the committee I have the honor to suggest that a copy of this communication be transmitted through the department to all district engineers in the United States, with the request that they submit a copy of the same to the governors of the States in which their districts are located, to the mayors of municipalities, to the officers of all commercial and civic organizations in their districts, and that they give publicity to same through the press as far as may be practicable.

Very respectfully,

JNO. H. SMALL, Chairman.

THE SECRETARY'S REPLY.

WAR DEPARTMENT,
Washington, October 6, 1917.

Hon. JOHN H. SMALL,
House of Representatives.

MY DEAR MR. SMALL: I have the honor to acknowledge receipt of your letter of October 5, 1917, giving the views of the Committee on Rivers and Harbors of the House of Representatives on the general subject of the facilities for water transportation that should be furnished by local interests in order to warrant and make effective the Government improvement of channels, and expressing the opinion of the committee that Government appropriations should not be made for localities that persist in disregarding these obligations. This statement has my hearty approval, and I shall take pleasure in bringing it to the attention of the Chief of Engineers for compliance with your request that it be distributed through the local engineer offices having charge of river and harbor improvements throughout the country. I consider it a most opportune reminder to local interests generally of the essential part they must take in the rational development of water transportation so that it may best serve the commercial and industrial needs of the country.

Very truly, yours,

NEWTON D. BAKER,
Secretary of War.

The War With Germany.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS
OF
HON. J. THOMAS HEFLIN,
OF ALABAMA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. HEFLIN. Mr. Speaker and gentlemen of the House, under leave granted to me to extend my remarks in the RECORD on the importance and necessity of standing by the President and giving loyal support to the country in this war with Germany, I desire to submit the following:

Mr. Speaker, we are in no way responsible for war with Germany. We broke no treaty obligation, we violated no principle of international law, we followed to the letter every rule laid down for the conduct of a neutral nation, and we transgressed in no instance a single principle of the law of nations. While the President was doing all in his power to remain at peace with Germany, and while our people in every State in the Union were praying that war might be avoided, Germany, without any fault on our part, denied us the right to remain neutral. She denied us the use of the free seas, she arrogated to herself authority to take away from us the right to sell food, clothing, and shelter to people in other neutral nations. By a brutal and unwarranted Prussian edict she challenged our national sovereignty and trampled upon our rights and liberties. She sunk our ships, destroyed our commerce, shot down our flag, and murdered our citizens; and, Mr. Speaker, I state correctly the American position when I say that when Congress by solemn act declares a state of war to exist, and when the President by proclamation calls the boys to the colors, it then becomes the duty of every American citizen to give whole-hearted support to the war program adopted by the Government. When the constituted authority of the country decides that certain ways, plans, and policies are wise and necessary, it then becomes the duty of every American citizen not merely to quietly acquiesce in the stand taken by this country but to give active and positive support to those plans and policies. I do not exempt even Members of Congress from the righteous requirements of this just and patriotic rule, and when a Member of Congress, by what he does and says in Congress or out of it, fails to recognize his obligation to submit to and loyally support the measures enacted by the body to which he belongs, he is not doing his duty as a Member of Congress. His conduct becomes suspicious, and he deserves the contempt and the scorn of every loyal American citizen.

When our boys are coming in obedience to the call of duty and the love of country to fight and, if need be, to die for our rights and liberties, I am not willing to remain silent while certain Members occupyiny places here, far removed from danger, are doing and saying things that I know are against the unity of purpose and solidarity of the American people in this war. When our brave boys, in response to their patriotic duty, are going upon our transports across the deep and dangerous sea, where cruel and murderous German submarines lie in wait, I will not permit my desire for personal comfort and safety to cause me to pass unnoticed and uncondemned unpatriotic and disloyal acts even in a Member of Congress and, however hazardous it may be to me personally, I have determined to take up the cross of my country and to follow faithfully the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. All that Christianity and civilization stand for are at stake in this war. I have said, and I here repeat, that the conduct of certain Members of Congress has been suspicious, and three times before Congress adjourned I asked unanimous consent to be permitted to name the Members that I had in mind and to give my reasons for saying that their conduct has been suspicious, but the friends of the men who were afraid of being named before the Congress and the country caused objection to be made. I then requested permission to make that motion before the House, so that it would require a majority of the Members, and not one, as in the case of unanimous-consent request, to prevent a full and free discussion of the matter, but the Speaker would not recognize me for that purpose. I call this to the attention of the country now, because when, on September 24, I had the floor but was denied the privilege of speaking in my own way and replying to Mr. NORTON, who had attacked me in his speech, several Members of the House called on me to name the men that I had in mind. I declined to do so then, because I knew that certain Members would make points of order and prevent me from giving my reasons for naming certain Members. Feeling that it was my duty to name these men and that the House desired me to do so, I determined to make known my willingness to name them, and in obedience to my conviction in the matter I went upon the floor of the House, where some Members had just a few days previous requested me to name them, and asked unanimous consent to be allowed to do so, when lo! the colleague of one of the men that I had in mind arose and objected. I found upon inquiry that the objector had agreed with a Member on the other side of the aisle, a Republican, whose conduct, MOORE'S the pity, I could not fully indorse, that in order to prevent a personal encounter between Mr. NORTON and myself he would object to me speaking and the Pennsylvanian would object to Mr. NORTON speaking. This purely disinterested and unselfish consideration shown for me by these two Members is something that I most respectfully submit to the country. It is passing strange that in order to keep me from naming the few suspicious Members a Member from Pennsylvania was going to object to Mr. NORTON making a speech and Mr. GARNER, of Texas, was going to object and deprive me of that privilege. It was claimed by some Members at first that when I said there were 13 or 14 Members in the two bodies who had acted suspiciously that I had, in failing to particularize, reflected on the great body of loyal Members, and that it was my duty to name them; but when I determined to do so, and asked for the opportunity to name them, I found the matter of granting me that privilege under unanimous consent blocked and tied by an agreement between Mr. GARNER and Mr. MOORE of Pennsylvania. I want the line drawn between the loyal American and the man who is deceiving and trying to injure his country. I do not intend, if I can help it, that any man whose loyalty has a Prussian spot or blemish on it shall escape the full and fair scrutiny of his constituents. The American people are entitled to know who in this mighty crisis are regarded as loyal and trustworthy Members of Congress. Every Member who is a true and loyal American is ready and anxious to have the suspicious ones named, but the personal friends of the few whose doings and sayings were about to be exposed were on the alert and active in their efforts to shield them. This should not be the case. No man who is neutral or lukewarm now in this war with Germany is entitled to have and hold the friendship of any loyal Member.

From every viewpoint and consideration of American welfare and safety the lukewarm or neutral Member deserves to be listed as an enemy to the country. If he elects to give aid and comfort to the enemy, he ought not to expect, and he should not receive, any sympathy or tolerance from loyal Americans. We all must now realize that there are only two classes of people in our country—the loyal and the disloyal. Instead of calling on me or giving me the opportunity to name the Members of Congress whose conduct I had said was suspicious, certain Members sought to dodge the issue by trying to create a sentiment in favor of censuring me. This was discussed quietly, and so eager were certain Members to get away from the real issue that they suggested that if possible some prominent Democrat should be persuaded to introduce the resolution. Some interested Republicans suggested it, but failing in this Mr. STEPHENS of Mississippi introduced the resolution, the terms of which denied me the right to summon a single witness or to conduct a real investigation of any kind. On top of this performance of Mr. STEPHENS, he moved the previous question on the passage of the resolution, and would not permit me to make any suggestions as to the inquiry to be made or as to the personnel of the committee to be appointed. How the mighty have fallen in some sections of Mississippi. I then appealed to the Speaker of the House. I wished to know if I could say a word in protest against the appointment of certain Members on that committee and to say something about the investigation to be had, but the Speaker ruled that I could not do so. I would name the suspicious Members in this statement now, but if I should do so my remarks would not be published in the CONGRESSIONAL RECORD. I will name them soon. The country is entitled to know them—lukewarmness and disloyalty must be made odious and unpopular in this country. He that is not with us is against us. The American Republic is not courting favor with any native or alien enemy within its confines. It merits the love and support of every person worthy of consideration in the country. The time has come to stamp out sedition and disloyalty wherever found. Mr. Lincoln said that "It is better to silence the agitator in high places than to shoot the simple soldier boy who is inspired by the one higher up." After Congress has declared a state of war to exist, the Member of Congress who gives out for publication statements attacking our allies, the Member of Congress who sits in silence at a meeting bristling with sedition and treason, and hears a speaker say that the President should be impeached, and the Member of Congress who is carrying on a propaganda in his district against the law under which we are raising an army, and the Member of Congress who introduces a resolution which criticizes our position in the war, and takes away from the Commander in Chief authority and control over the Army, and the Member of Congress who introduces a bill to exempt boys of German blood from military service in this war with Germany, and the Member of Congress who introduces a bill, the effect of which would be to leave the President without authority and without an army to conduct the war is guilty of suspicious conduct, and by his own act raises the question of his loyalty. It can not be said that any of the acts that I have mentioned in any way help the United States in its conduct of this war, but, on the contrary, it can be truthfully said that they give aid and comfort to the enemy. The German propaganda to encourage our boys to resist the selective-draft law and to repeal that law, and to exempt boys of German blood from service in this war against Germany, and to hold meetings to create sentiment against our position in the war has been aided innocently or otherwise by some Members of Congress. Washington in his Farewell Address warned us against the insidious wiles of foreign influence. He said that "Foreign influence is one of the most baneful foes of republican government." The insidious workings of the German autocracy, and its brazen interference in our country's affairs has aroused the righteous indignation of all American patriots, and the time has come when a position of lukewarmness, neutrality, or double-dealing will not be tolerated in any State in the Union. For private citizen and Member of Congress, for all, there must be but one standard of loyalty. America, incarnated spirit of liberty, is entitled to our love and loyalty. God help us to silence speedily everyone who is trying in any way to hamper and hinder her in the successful conduct of this war.

Mr. Speaker, I desire to print as a part of my remarks the following editorial comments on my position in this matter:

[From the Boston Post, Sept. 28, 1917.]

WHITE HOUSE PUTS SEAL OF APPROVAL ON HEFLIN.

In reply to intimations circulated in certain quarters to the effect that HEFLIN had been rebuked by the President for his statement, Secretary Tumulty to-day gave out the statement saying that Representative HEFLIN was one of the staunchest friends of the President and had given hearty support to all the administration measures for prosecuting the war. This statement caused a sensation. It showed that an investigation would not be unacceptable to the President, and indicated, too, that the State Department would be available to the investigators.

In fact, it is rumored that the President is anxious to have a definite line-up of the friends and enemies of the Nation at war published before the entire country.

[From the New York World, Sept. 22.]

In commenting upon the matter given out by Secretary Lansing to-day, Vice President Marshall said:

"This ought to end forever any doubt in the mind of any American as to the justice of and the necessity for this war. It proves that the German Government was seeking all along to split us into two factions by corrupt means, if necessary and possible, hoping in time to win the war in Europe and then humiliate and subjugate us. He who is not now wholeheartedly for the war runs a grave risk of being suspected of getting part of that $50,000. This is an honest Congress, and all of its Members will resent this insult to its intelligence and honor."

[From the Washington Times, Sept. 29.]

Mr. HEFLIN said: "The Associated Press misrepresented me in its report of what I said yesterday. What I did say was that I wanted the House to elect the members of the committee, and that I wanted patriotic Democrats and Republicans on it."

[From the Washington Star, Sept. 3, by Associated Press (Chicago).]

Gov. Frank O. Lowden arrived here to-day to take personal charge of the situation * * *.

W. E. MASON, Representative at Large from Illinois, the next speaker, declared there was more misery in the country to-day than at any time since Bunker Hill.

"But no worse thing ever happened in the history of the United States," he said, "than is happening now, when people like you are branded as criminals and denied the right of free assembly."

He also declared that the only people who welcomed the war were the bankers and editors, and denounced conscription and the sending of troops to France.

[From the Daily Times, Sept. 29.]

Hon. CLAUDE KITCHIN denies the statement regarding Mr. HEFLIN, of Alabama. The following is his statement:

"In reply to the inquiry from newspapers and correspondents as to whether or not the statement published in the Washington Times this afternoon to the effect that I would take the floor to-day with a demand for a vote of censure on HEFLIN is true, I will say that it is absolutely without foundation, and there is not a word of truth in it. I have never entertained such a thought or intention; in fact, the article in the Times is the first intelligence I had that such a statement had been attributed to me.

"CLAUDE KITCHIN."

[From the Washington Times, Sept. 29.]

I have not said that these men received money. I made no such charges. I have not denied saying, and I do not deny saying, that the conduct of some of them does not square with my idea of loyalty. There is now being carried on in this country a German propaganda to tie the President's hands and to leave him without authority and without an army to defend our country in this war. This infamous work was going on in another form before Bernstorff left the country. It is at work now insidiously and sneakingly, and the sooner every vestige of sedition and treason is stamped out the better it will be for our country.

[From the Post, Oct. 4.]

MINNEAPOLIS, MINN., October 3.

Congressman ERNEST LUNDEEN, termed "Lesser Microbe" by Col. Roosevelt, was expelled to-day from membership in Hermion Lodge, No. 18, Knights of Pythias, Minneapolis. Charges had been preferred against LUNDEEN accusing him of unpatriotic utterances. It was on these charges that he was expelled.

[From the Indianapolis Star, Sept. 28.]

Representative HEFLIN may not have any definite proof, but some others in Congress, who are so indignant at his "generalities," do not seem anxious to prod around any to see what might be uncovered.

[From the Syracuse Journal, Sept. 28.]

There should be reasonable harmony in Congress and full support of the administration's war policies. At least there should be a minute scrutiny of any Representative or Senator who strives to deprive this Government of aid and comfort and thereby indirectly gives "aid and comfort to the enemy."

The United States is engaged in war. It must be fought to a satisfactory finish, if it is within the power of this Nation. Those who try to hamper governmental war efficiency and power are becoming detestable in public estimation.

The question is not one of integrity. It is one of constitutional rights of expression. It is solely whether the American people will endure Congressmen who fight the Government from their easy seats in Congress and who draw American money in salaries.

[From the Boston Journal, Sept. 28.]

Out of a congressional investigation such as HEFLIN proposes might come a distinct definition of treason; a separation of the sheep from the goats among the many organizations and individuals devoted to the preaching of peace; the internment of many persons, aliens and others, whose sympathies in this war take an active and harmful bent.

[From the Age-Herald, Sept. 26.]

There is no getting around the fact that certain Congressmen have laid themselves open to suspicion by foolish utterances and actions which may have been made in good faith, yet have put this country in a bad light abroad and most certainly convinced the German Government that America was unwilling to go to war.

[From the Birmingham Ledger, Oct. 2.]

THOSE DISLOYALTY CHARGES.

There are thousands of honest Americans who hold the view that Congressman HEFLIN'S temperament or political ambitions have nothing to do with the case, but that since open charges were made by a Member of Congress against a number of his colleagues, the question is, Has he or has he not grounds upon which to base those charges?

Thirteen or fourteen Members of Congress, some of them by name, have been charged with disloyalty to their country, and the public has more or less suspicion that German money has been floating around the Capitol in some form or other.

[From the Houston Daily Post, Sept. 30, 1917.]

No doubt Mr. HEFLIN regards the conduct of some Members of Congress as suspicious, for heaven knows that in both branches some Members have proven a serious handicap to the war measures of the administration.

Congressmen with large German constituencies have not in all cases been positive supporters of the war measures in Congress.

So, instead of raising a rumpus about HEFLIN'S reckless insinuations, Congress will render better service by proceeding to draw the line on German influence in the country and handling without gloves those who are serving the country's enemies.

[White House statement by Mr. Tumulty.]

In the Washington Star of to-day this paragraph appears in an article on the first page:

"It was learned to-day that President Wilson has expressed deep regret at the speech of Representative HEFLIN, characterizing it as a great mistake."

There is not the slightest foundation in fact for this statement. Not at any time has the President made the matter a subject of conversation or expressed an opinion concerning it.

From the outset Mr. HEFLIN has earned the friendship and esteem of the President by reason of his intense Americanism and unfaltering support of every American measure.

In view of this, under no circumstances would the President lend himself to any effort to prejudge or to prejudice a case in process of inquiry.

[From the Age-Herald, Sept. 26.]

Money was spent by the German Government, and the American people want to know where that money went and who got it.

[From the Birmingham News, Sept. 26.]

There is an old saying to the effect that "the hit bird flutters." * * *

Whether Congressman HEFLIN meant to go gunning for anybody when he stated that 13 or 14 House Members have acted so suspiciously during recent months that a doubt of their loyalty had entered his mind does not alter the fact that his statement caused a lot of fluttering among the Members.

[From the Washington Herald.]

Just why are so many persons incensed at TOM HEFLIN? He thinks, as everyone knows, that German propaganda is rife. He repeats certain serious charges and asks an investigation by a joint committee of Democrats and Republicans. Now they want to censure him. If there is "a nigger in the congressional woodpile," why not "smoke" him out?

[From the Troy (N. Y.) Ledger, Sept. 26.]

Why is Congress peeved over the insinuations of Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama?

It is not impossible, although not probable, that any of the Congressmen were corrupted with German coin. It is plain, however, that certain Senators and Representatives, whose names have been repeatedly anathematized by press and people, were influenced by the "slush fund" administered indirectly.

[From the New York Times, Oct. 5.]

Representative HEFLIN asked if he might be heard. Mr. STEPHENS said he saw no reason for discussing it and moved the previous question.

"May I not speak briefly?" asked Mr. HEFLIN.

"Not one word," replied Speaker CLARK.

[From the New York Herald, Oct. 5.]

The House ordered the investigation of the Heflin charges with a suddenness that was startling. With less than a quorum present, Mr. STEPHENS of Nebraska presented his resolution, announcing that it was one of the highest privileges, and moved the previous question.

"I think there has been enough discussion of this subject," said Mr. STEPHENS, "and that the time has come for action."

In the meantime Mr. HEFLIN was on his feet asking to be heard. The Speaker refused to recognize him.

[From the Montgomery Advertiser, Sept. 29.]

There has been out of Congress a strong suspicion that a few Members were supporting with and acting for the German propagandists in this country. The people should recognize the patent truth that 95 per cent of the Members of Congress have not been suspected of any response to any seditious or disloyal influences of German propaganda.

Of course, there were a few Senators and Representatives who stood out for the course Germany would have this country pursue, because they believed that the German element in their districts would back them up.

[From the New York Telegram, Sept. 25.]

Noise is no argument. Jeers and cat-calls don't prove anything. By boohooing it down Members of the House disprove nothing.

Let us hear just what Representative HEFLIN does know. He may possibly have information dovetailing with Secretary Lansing's publication of Count von Bernstorff's request to Berlin for $50,000 with which to influence Congress as before.

[From the New York World, Sept. 26.]

Having in mind nothing but the honor of the House of Representatives, most Americans will wonder why Mr. HEFLIN, of Alabama, had no support when he was making a plain case against the Kaiser's apologists in that body.

[From the New York World, Sept. 26.]

Members of the House said they intended to press vigorously the resolutions asking Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama, to name the Members of Congress, who, he says, "have acted suspiciously."

[From the New York Tribune, Sept. 23.]

The majority in both Houses has realized that certain Senators and Representatives were acting in the interest of Germany, but there are few in Washington who believe that any money was paid to any Member of the present Congress, despite the remarkably pro-German attitudes of some of them.

[From the New York Tribune, Sept. 29.]

The Colonel also paid his respects to Representative BAER, of North Dakota, the Nonpartisan Party's representative in Congress, who was among the five Members of Congress named by Representative HEFLIN.

"On June 27 Representative BAER said that this was 'no time to make Americanism an issue,'" said the Colonel. "That statement would be all right in the German Reichstag, but a man who thinks and speaks that way ought not to be admitted to Congress. If this is not the time to make Americanism an issue, there is no time."

Col. Roosevelt turned his attention also to the Nonpartisan League.

[From the New York World, Sept. 29.]

When Representative HEFLIN said he suspected that 13 or 14 Members of Congress had been influenced by way of Count von Bernstorff's secret fund he put the case mildly. For more than three years past the RECORD has shown that many more than 13 or 14 have been regularly voting for Germany. Furthermore, Mr. HEFLIN'S suspicion is shared by the great mass of the people.

The strange thing about the fury into which the House lashes itself over this matter is its failure to distinguish between bribery and disloyalty.

[From the New York Sun, Sept. 26.]

Some of the men who jeered most loudly and who howled him [HEFLIN] down are numbered among the chief pacifists and obstructionists in the House. Their chance to obscure their records by a noisy denial of any share in actual corruption was ready to hand and they seized it.

[From the Washington Star, Sept. 21.]

Two facts stand out conspicuously in this now revealed telegram. It was the purpose of the German ambassador to "influence" Congress by means of money, and he had evidently used money "on former occasions." The amount named, $50,000, is very small if it was the German ambassador's design to bribe Members of the American Congress.

[From the New York Evening Post, Sept. 24.]

Once the House agreed, on motion of Representative LITTLE, of Kansas, to permit Mr. HEFLIN to proceed in his own way for 10 minutes, if he would name the men he suspected, but he declined the offer.

[From the Cincinnati Times Star, Sept. 28.]

What hands are pulling the strings that make certain men in Congress do that which the German Government would have men do if it had representatives in Congress?

Therefore we are grateful to Mr. HEFLIN, a man who evidently does not care to call a spade "a digging instrument adapted for being pushed into the ground with the foot."

[From the New York Herald, Sept. 27.]

Mr. HEFLIN issued a statement to-day in response to inquiries as to whether he included in the list of suspicious acts the votes of Members against the war resolution and the selective-draft law.

"Of course not," replied Mr. HEFLIN. "I do not intend that the few whose conduct is under suspicion shall deceive the other Members into believing that I had them in mind."

[From the New York Herald, Sept. 28.]

Why, they even hired some newspaper reporters to report that the President expressed regret about my having made the speech and very much deplored it. One paper, a German sympathizer, had large headlines, "The President rebukes Mr. HEFLIN." Both of them are false.

[From the Fredericksburg Free Lance, Oct. 2.]

While we can not bring ourselves to believe that any Representative of the American people has fallen so low as to accept German bribe money (and Congressman HEFLIN didn't charge this), yet we fully agree with him that the action and vote of some of them, including the one Senator and five Congressmen named by him to the Rules Committee, has been very suspicious.

So far from a resolution expelling Congressman HEFLIN being adopted in the House, we believe the chances would be much better of securing the passage of one ridding the House of such undesirables as MASON, BRITTEN, NORTON, BAER and company. Certainly America would suffer from the expulsion of HEFLIN, while just as surely she would profit from the expulsion of those he criticized. This is no time for Members of Congress to be mealy-mouthed or bound by congressional etiquette. Rather it is time for each Representative to speak out, denouncing treason, semitreason, and suspicious acts and conduct even if in doing so he has to incur the enmity of his own colleagues. The people are sick of so-called Representatives whose chief efforts seem to be directed toward paralyzing the war efforts of their own country, and if Mr. HEFLIN'S charges have the effect of pillorying these men he will have deserved the gratitude of the Nation.

[From the Meriden Morning Record, Oct. 1.]

Mr. HEFLIN knew many things as well as a man can know a thing and not be able to prove it.

HEFLIN has done a good turn to Congress if he has shown the necessity for clearing the atmosphere of its microbes.

[From the Financial America (New York), Oct. 3.]

It would be interesting to see how such distinguished individuals as the Hon. JEFF: MCLEMORE, of Texas, and the very honorable Mr. LUNDEEN, of Minnesota, would vote on the punishing of the gentleman from Alabama.

[From the St. Paul Dispatch, Sept. 25.]

The House of Representatives would make a deeper impression of its sincerity if it had been as indignant over the Bernstorff activities as it is now over HEFLIN'S charges that certain Members soiled their garments in Bernstorff's filth.

[From the Syracuse Journal, Sept. 26.]

The greater the agitation over the recent disclosures the more apparent it becomes that Congress should hit upon some means of putting its Members on record in such a way as will absolutely determine whether they are for America or for some other nation. Make men who are using their alleged hatred of war as a shield for traitorous conduct come out from cover, if any such there be in Congress.

[From the New York Morning Telegraph, Sept. 28.]

MASON advocates a repeal of the draft resolution, BRITTEN urges the German-Americans be exempted from the draft, NORTON has been consistently voicing copperhead views, and Senator LA FOLLETTE has won the enmity of almost the entire Senate for his opposition to war measures. Representative BAER was sent to Congress by a nonpartisan league, and he has been working faithfully against war.

[From the New York Herald, Sept. 28.]

Keep your eyes on the ball. It should occur to somebody at Washington that all this indulgence in personalities around Mr. HEFLIN, of Alabama, is diverting the attention of the Capitol from the main question: Who got the money?

[From the New York Evening World, Sept. 27.]

HEFLIN also said he would not be satisfied to have Speaker CLARK name the members of the proposed committee, but would insist that the House elect them. He accused the Speaker of unfairness toward him at a recent House session.

[From the New York American, Sept. 28.]

HEFLIN said he could, if given the opportunity, name 13 or 14 others whose acts had been suspicious.

HEFLIN denied statements attributed to him in newspaper interviews. He declared German spies had brought about such publications. He denies he had said Members of Congress had won money at a gambling house frequented by pacifists, where German gold was easily won.

"I never once said any Member has been corrupted with money. I do not know how Members were influenced." HEFLIN took a fling at Speaker CLARK in his closing words, saying that he wanted the investigating committee elected by the House instead of being appointed by the Speaker. "Would not you be satisfied to have the Speaker name them," asked Mr. NORTON. "No; I would not," retorted HEFLIN.

[From the New York World, Sept. 28.]

He said he wanted to inquire about correspondence of certain Members who had written in one vein to their constituents and acted in another in Congress, and who had written one way to one set of constituents and another way to others. Mr. HEFLIN declared he wanted to ascertain who were preparing to join the organization which sent Representative BAER to Congress—the National Non-Partisan League. He emphasized the desire that in ordering the investigation Congress go into the activities of Members and the sources of money for carrying on a propaganda and distributing over the country literature relating to the antidraft bill of Representative MASON, and the resolution of Representative BRITTEN to exempt German-Americans from military service abroad. He charged German agents had got newspapers to quote him falsely.

[From Financial American, Sept. 28.]

Representative HEFLIN probably was indiscreet in his statements about Congress and the signs of German money or German influence there. And, yet, it is more than likely that there is 90 per cent of truth in what he said. The methods employed by bribers are designed to prevent any possibility of the money being traced. The methods employed by the bribed to protect themselves are skillful as human ingenuity can devise.

[From the New York Evening Globe, Sept. 27.]

HEFLIN pleaded with the committee to-day to turn its attention to investigating how the Bernstorff fund was used rather than to his speech, declaring that 13 or 14 Members of the two Houses had "acted suspiciously." Mr. HEFLIN insisted that the committee should develop who supplied money for mailing out Representative MASON'S antidraft bill and Representative BRITTEN'S German-American service resolutions, and about the antiwar activities of Senator LA FOLLETTE.

[From the Indianapolis Star, Sept. 25.]

Congress should turn on the light. That riotous outburst of righteous indignation in the House of Representatives is amusing to those who watched congressional developments since the war was started. Members profess to be grieved and shocked because Representative HEFLIN has said, in connection with the Von Bernstorff disclosures, that he could name 13 or 14 in the House and Senate who have acted suspiciously. He did not accuse anyone of getting any part of that $50,000 "slush fund." Bernstorff himself in his published cablegram asked for the money to be used "as on former occasions" in influencing Congress. Bernstorff apparently was satisfied that he had succeeded in influencing Congress "on former occasions."

Mr. HEFLIN did not say the money was peddled out in bribes, but did say he could name 13 or 14 in Congress who have acted suspiciously. So could everybody who have watched the progress of Congress in the last three years. They acted suspiciously as if being influenced. What is the difference, so far as Von Bernstorff is concerned, whether they acted in response to indirect payment of money handed to them as a bribe or because of organized pressure brought to bear through propaganda? Whatever was done was in the interest of Germany and not of the United States. It would be worth while to let the light in on what went on back of the scenes during the expenditure of that $50,000 and the other sums "on former occasions."

[From the New York Commercial, Sept. 28.]

In an impassioned speech HEFLIN demanded that the Rules Committee ask for a general investigation so that he might learn—

1. Where the money came from that produced literature supporting the antidraft bill of Representative MASON. 2. Where the money came from that produced literature supporting the Britten resolution to exempt German-Americans from military service abroad. 3. What Congressmen are planning to line up with the nonpartisan league that elected BAER, and which was said to oppose the war. 4. Who was in the organization "LA FOLLETTE is championing that will leave the President without an army." 5. Why NORTON insists on turning the proposed slush-fund investigation against him, HEFLIN.

Mr. NORTON was present at the committee meeting while HEFLIN was making his speech. Saying he understood several Congressmen wanted him expelled because he mentioned suspicious Members, HEFLIN turned to NORTON and dared him to vote for his expulsion. "I will have something to say about you before the investigation comes, if it is created," HEFLIN declared, facing NORTON.

[From the New York Times, Sept. 22.]

Following the announcement of the Bernstorff cable message Senators and Representatives to-day expressed opinion indicating they were not greatly surprised by the exposure of the former ambassador's attempts to influence Congress, and plans for an immediate investigation were set on foot. In the House, where Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama, made a speech on the subject, several Members, including Representative FLOOD, of Virginia, chairman of the Committee on Foreign Relations, discussed the advisability of a congressional investigation, going so far in private conversation as to favor even an inspection of bank accounts. Vice President MARSHALL made a clear-cut statement of his views toward German propaganda.

[From the New York Herald, Sept. 24.]

According to the present arrangements, which of necessity are in only general form, all persons who have been identified in any way with the efforts to influence Congress to a pro-German stand will be called as witnesses. There are hundreds of these persons representatives of a half a dozen organizations with headquarters in different sections of the country. They have come to Washington to see the Members themselves, they have sent thousands of letters and telegrams, they have shipped in petitions gathered in the districts of Members whose votes were sought, they have even threatened to wage active campaigns against the reelection of those Senators and Representatives who have refused to do their bidding. All the Members of Congress who have expressed opinions are unanimous in asserting that the investigation is essential to clear their skirts of any suspicion in connection with the von Bernstorff activity. They feel that the statements made on the floor of the House by Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama—that 13 or 14 Members had acted suspiciously—are sufficient to make an investigation necessary.

[From the Kansas City Star, Sept. 28.]

Congress will make a mistake if it diverts investigation from Mr. HEFLIN'S charges to Mr. HEFLIN himself. There may be honest but misguided men who are helping the German cause from the Congress of the United States. There may be. But in view of the revelations of German expenditures in this country such men can not object when there comes a demand that their conduct be investigated. Certainly there are only a few Members of Congress whose conduct comes under suspicion. But no feeling of clannishness on the part of Congressmen ought to prevent a full inquiry. There have been Congressmen who have gone wrong in the past.

[From the Richmond Times-Dispatch, Sept. 28.]

Mr. HEFLIN has not accused any Member of the House of taking German money or being subsidized by American agents of the German Government. But he has declared, upon his responsibility as a Member of Congress, that he can produce the names of twelve or more Congressmen whose course before the war, and to some extent since the war, leads him to believe that German influences guided their official acts. Mr. HEFLIN is no novice in legislative affairs. Nor is he an irresponsible shouter of names or demagogic waver of flags. He knew he would be immediately challenged to substantiate any charge which reflected upon the integrity or loyalty of a fellow Congressman. So we await with assurance for the names which he is to submit to the investigating committee.

I requested unanimous consent three times for the purpose of naming the suspicious Members, but the request was not granted. I asked to be permitted to make a motion to grant me time to name these Members, but the Speaker would not permit me to do so.

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) Ledger, Sept. 28, 1917.]

Now that Congressman HEFLIN, of Alabama, has demanded the appointment of a House committee before whom he can denounce the Members of Congress who he believes have acted disloyally, has openly named a number of Members whose conduct he thinks has been suspicious, and has declared he will name others whom he regards as disloyal to the Government in its conduct of the war, an investigation is in order.

Nobody in Alabama doubts Mr. HEFLIN'S loyalty to the administration. He has been an active supporter of the Government in its conduct of the war. Whether or not his enthusiasm has impaired his judgment in making charges against Members of Congress is no longer a question for consideration. He has openly called names of Members of the body whom he believes to be disloyal to the Government in its efforts for the national defense and the national safety, and declared that he desires an opportunity to investigate the loyalty of others.

That puts a different aspect upon the case, which is now no longer a matter of idle rumor. The loyalty and the character of the Members of Congress have been openly called into question by a fellow Member whose arraignment is very serious. The names of some of those Congressmen have been announced in public as suspicious characters, and Mr. HEFLIN declares he will involve others by name.

That places these men on the defensive. They are attacked by name virtually with charges of having some knowledge of the use of German money against their own country. The charges are sure to create more or less suspicion in the public mind against Congress as a body unless they are shown to be without foundation.

It is to be supposed that the Members of Congress, whose names have been publicly announced by a fellow Member as being under suspicion, will demand a prompt and complete investigation as a matter of justice to themselves. Certainly they have every reason to take such action and it will be expected by the public. Indeed, the men whose names have been mentioned in this connection can not afford to let the matter drop there. Their character and their reputation as public officials chosen to a high trust are involved, and the American people who are behind their Government in this war will not be satisfied with anything but a thorough probe into the whole business.

If these Members of Congress or any others whom Congressman HEFLIN may include in his charges are guilty of disloyalty to their country, as Mr. HEFLIN declares he has reason to believe, they deserve worse punishment than expulsion in disgrace from the public service.

If, on the other hand, they are innocent of wrongdoing, and are merely the victims of groundless rumors, they should insist upon vindication through a searching investigation. In any event, they can not afford to drop the matter where it now stands, and neither can Congress as a body.

[From the Chicago Journal, Sept. 22, 1917.]

"As on former occasions." When the Gore and McLemore resolutions were up in the House and Senate, for example, trying to haul down the American flag and make the seas over to the Kaiser. When the cowardly and traitorous resolutions were introduced to put an embargo on the export of munitions and military supplies. When the clique that trembles at the name of Germany was showing its valor by demanding instant war with Mexico. Kaiser-cuddling in Congress did not end with Bernstorff's departure. The efforts of a little group of willful men to keep the President from arming our merchant ships, the long fight against the food-control bill, the periodical attempts to hamstring the war by putting it in the hands of a congressional debating society, the sniveling protests against "sending our soldiers to bleed in a foreign land"—Bernstorff couldn't have bettered these samples of kaiserism if he had been present with twice $50,000. Surely the faithful disciples of Potsdam need as much "influence" now as they did last January. Who is attending to this matter since Bernstorff went away?

"As on former occasions"—yea, throughout the world. Wherever Prussianism has come, it has been an unmixed curse. It has tried to corrupt and control every country in which it has gained a foothold. It has pinned its faith to bribery, deceit, and terrorism.

[From the Opelika News, Sept. 26, 1917.]

Mr. HEFLIN said: "Mr. Speaker, I did say in my speech that there were some men in Congress whose conduct, according to my judgment, had been suspicious. It has, and you can not take that impression out of my mind; they made that impression by their own conduct, and I am not going to get up here and tell you now that I have no such opinion in this matter, because I have. If the House desires me to name the men who have, according to my judgment, done disloyal acts, I will name them.

"I am going to stand by the Commander in Chief of our Army and Navy. I am going to be faithful to the boys who are going to fight and die for our rights and liberties, and I do not propose that any Members shall carry on a propaganda here which appears to me to be against my country without denouncing it and branding it as I think it ought to be denounced and branded."

[From the New York Globe, Sept. 5, 1917.]

Col. Roosevelt says, Chatham, N. Y., September 5: "Above all, any man, and especially Senator or Congressman or editor, who seeks to exempt Americans of German descent from service in the Army against Germany is a traitor pure and simple; he should be proceeded against under the law if possible, and if that is not possible the law should be amended so as to make his offense a crime."

[From the Birmingham (Ala.) News, Sept. 28, 1917.]

President Wilson's patriotism does not blow hot and cold. He will not allow himself to be put in the class of those who, through expediency or in fear that anybody's feelings might be wounded, would sidetrack an investigation into the charges made by Congressman THOMAS HEFLIN, of Alabama. An Associated Press report from Washington states that the President was indignant when told that two Washington newspapers had published a statement to the effect that he had expressed regret that Mr. HEFLIN had made the speech in the House. That canard, whether published through studied design to misrepresent the President or through carelessness of some reporter, is answered by the Executive himself:

"From the outset Mr. HEFLIN has earned the friendship and esteem of the President by reason of his intense Americanism and unfaltering support of every American measure."

This statement from the President will be gratifying to the friends of Congressman HEFLIN, whose worst fault, if it may be called a fault, is that he is candid to the point of fearlessness. However unparliamentary, however improper—nay, however groundless—may have been his surmise that 13 or 14 Members of the House had created, in his own mind, a doubt of their loyalty to the United States, Congressman HEFLIN alone has not been assailed by that doubt. All through those months antedating the war, and even after that declaration, there were congressional speeches attacking the methods of the administration; speeches with double meanings, delicate turning and twisting of sentences that might have been attributed to Germanic influences. Through all that melée of strange tongues TOM HEFLIN, of Alabama, was at the forefront of the fighting in defense of clean, outspoken, thoroughgoing Americanism. When the "brain storm" struck Congress HEFLIN thundered some of the wavering ones and the spineless ones into a condition of some exhaustion. He wades into the crowd that would have Congress declare its feebleness and ineptitude to defend American citizens traveling on the high seas. The specter of the Kaiser did not frighten TOM HEFLIN.

If that specter still lingers in the corridors of the Capitol; if there are any lurkers back of curtains trying to influence Members of Congress; if there is any secret propaganda not revealed to the clear light of day, let us, not like Hamlet, run the curtain through with a sword, but let the hideous thing be drawn out from its hiding where the American people may see its visage.

If all our Congressmen were as thoroughgoing and true blue as HEFLIN, there would be no suspicions. There would not have been any delay in perfecting the Army and Navy machines.

[From the Omaha Nebraskan, Oct. 4, 1917.]

It has been generally believed by observing men that hundreds of thousands of dollars have been spent during the past four years by the German lobby operating notoriously at our National Capital. Enormous sums were spent in paying for telegrams addressed to Senators and Representatives in Congress, urging them, in effect, to vote with the Kaiser instead of the President upon determining issues.

When Mr. HEFLIN, of Alabama, said that he could name 13 or 14 Members "who had acted suspiciously," he probably did not mean to charge them with having accepted bribes. Then every Kaiser booster joined in denunciation of HEFLIN. For the reason that the American people are 100 per cent American, they know that Mr. HEFLIN'S heart is right and his purpose firm, and he has their sympathy and their support.

But if by the words "acting suspiciously," Mr. HEFLIN meant that certain Members had shown a disposition to pull the Kaiser's chestnuts out of the fire, then every newspaper reader in every hamlet of America could readily name a number of men who have acted suspiciously.

The lines were clearly drawn on the McLemore resolution. That resolution was intended to surrender for America the doctrine of the freedom of the seas. At the time it was pending American newspapers printed cablegrams from Berlin saying that the German Government was depending upon the American Congress to repudiate the President, who was standing firmly by the freedom-of-the-seas doctrine. At that time the German lobby was operating in Washington. The issue was clearly drawn between the Kaiser and the President, and with this issue drawn these men voted with the Kaiser. There are many reasons for believing that the vote was given in the hope of winning the support of German partisans. In view of these well-understood facts, it required considerable impudence on the part of some of the Members of the House to join in the demonstration against Mr. HEFLIN.

It is significant that nearly every one of the men who took a leading part in the anti-Heflin demonstration has showed on various occasions a disposition to prefer the Kaiser above the President. The man who made the motion that called HEFLIN to account has not displayed any great enthusiasm for America's cause. One of the men who moved across the aisle in threatening attitude was a leader of the Kaiser's forces during the fight for the McLemore resolution. He was then clearly catering to the German vote in Wisconsin. His companion was a man who had made sneering references to Americanism. The man who inquired, when the committee had reported, whether the committee had considered a proposition to expel Mr. HEFLIN, was a Member who fathered a resolution relieving men of German birth and descent from the responsibilities of fighting America's battles. Indeed, every Kaiser booster in the House took occasion to join in the abuse of the 100 per cent American from Alabama.

[From the Brooklyn Daily Eagle, New York, Oct. 7, 1917.]

HEFLIN is always "regular" in his democracy, and the same can be said of his Americanism. He follows his leader, who is Woodrow Wilson. He voted to declare war, and since then he has quit being a little Navy man and has voted for all the war measures. Whatever anybody may say about HEFLIN, he can not be accused of trying to embarrass the administration in prosecuting the war against Germany. HEFLIN is out to lick Germany just as earnestly as any man in Congress, and much more so than a lot of them.

They tried this week to make HEFLIN an issue instead of the $50,000 Bernstorff slush fund. Everybody in the House knew very well it would have been impossible to keep HEFLIN to the front as the issue once an investigation got under way.

[From the Buffalo Express, Sept. 29, 1917.]

Not content with this, however, some of them have continued to represent the German interests and oppose the United States at every point since war was declared, and Germany has become officially and in fact the Nation's enemy. They have gone still further and have proposed measures to serve the German interests against the cause of the United States.

Certain organizations frantically opposed conscription and even went to the point of counseling resistance to the law after it was enacted. Promptly a Representative—MASON, of Illinois—introduced a bill to repeal the selective-draft law.

A certain organization, long active in furthering German propaganda work, urged that at least citizens of the German race should be exempted from the draft. Promptly a Representative—BRITTEN, of Illinois—introduced a bill to exempt men of German blood from the draft.

[From the Chicago Herald, Sept. 29, 1917.]

But if the House does inadvisedly insist on starting such procedure, Messrs. BILLY MASON, BRITTEN, LA FOLLETTE, and the others whose attitude has affronted the patriotism of the Nation needn't think they are going to be able to use the verdict as a general acquittal all along the line.

The principal facts that stand against these gentlemen do not depend on the loosely wagging tongue of anybody. They are the recorded acts of the men themselves. The man who keeps on insisting that the draft law be repealed, the man who wants our soldiers to fight the enemy on American soil, the man who doesn't want our German-American citizens to have to do their duty in war like other citizens, the man who has been fighting the war ever since the war started—these and various known obstructionists are not going to be vindicated, restored to public confidence, improved in prestige and influence by mere failure to prove they took any money.

The irritation of Members is natural, but the vast majority, which has patriotically passed the great war measures, ought to beware lest in its desire to "get" HEFLIN and provide the body as a whole with a superfluous vindication it give men who sorely need vindication of other charges a further chance to try to confuse and mislead.

[From the Baltimore Evening Sun, Sept. 28, 1917.]

Whether "TOM" HEFLIN will be able to convince his colleagues on Capitol Hill that a lot of them have acted very "suspiciously" is highly doubtful, but at least the American people need no convincing.

[From the Fitchburg Sentinel, Sept. 15, 1917.]

A man is known by the company he keeps, and if Members of Congress preferred to take their stand with the Germans through all the attacks on American rights and American honor, they can not expect to be above suspicion. As a matter of fact, Congressman HEFLIN was merely the spokesman for a great many people, who have been unable to comprehend the attitude of extreme opposition to the war which has been manifested by a small minority in Congress.

[From the Scranton Times, Sept. 29, 1917.]

What HEFLIN suspects is suspected by a good many zealous Americans.

On general principles there are a few Congressmen and Senators who ought not be sitting in their places. They have been fighting the Government, decrying its efforts at defending its citizens from Germany, and placing obstacles in the way of the national defense. They have done this in a manner as to increase the burdens of prosecuting the war and protecting American lives and American interests.

HEFLIN'S hotheadedness, because of the attitude of the opponents of the Government, will be forgiven him.

[From the Chicago Post, Oct. 2, 1917.]

BRITTEN'S resolution to break up the new armies by permitting those of German blood to stay away from France slumbers peacefully in its pigeonhole.

Slumber rests, too, upon MASON'S attempt to repeal the selected-service law. Both these are German-helping Congressmen.

[From the Portland (Oreg.) Telegram, Sept. 24, 1917.]

There has been plenty of evidence of pro-German sympathy in Congress. It has no place there, no more than it would have in the administrative branch of the Government. To say the least, it has wearied the patience of American patriotism; and public sentiment is entirely ready to approve Mr. HEFLIN'S suggested housecleaning.

[From the Charleston (S. C.) News, Sept. 29, 1917.]

The country thinks that Congress ought to feel at least as much concern over Senator LA FOLLETTE'S grave transgression against the Nation as it obviously feels over Representative HEFLIN'S minor transgression against the dignity of its Members.

[From the Schenectady Union Star, Sept. 27, 1917.]

When Mr. HEFLIN stated that there were 10 or 12 Members of Congress "under suspicion" he only stated what has been the current public opinion for two years. Why cavil at it? "By their fruits ye shall know them."

[From the Chicago Post, Sept. 28, 1917.]

He may have done as BRITTEN charges and voted against our naval program in the peaceful days of the past, but he certainly has not done as BRITTEN and MASON are doing in introducing bills to disrupt the National Army in the present days of actual war.

[From the Erie (Pa.) Dispatch, Oct. 1, 1917.]

Many Congressmen have indeed, as Mr. HEFLIN indelicately remarked, "acted suspiciously." That is to say, many Members of both Houses have acted repeatedly in the interests of Germany.

[From the Green Bay (Wis.) Gazette, Sept. 22, 1917.]

There was a veritable fight between straightforward Americanism and this German organization, maintained and financed by the Kaiser, at the time the McLemore and Gore resolutions were voted upon by Congress. The latter raised heaven and earth to buy, bully, or persuade Congress to adopt these resolutions warning Americans off trans-Atlantic ships.

[From the New York Sun, Oct. 6, 1917.]

A little group of pacifist Representatives have chosen to insist that HEFLIN reflected upon the honor of the House and should be disciplined. Whatever he may have said in the heat of debate, however, reflected less upon the honor of the House than some of the deliberate utterances and legislative demands of those now demanding that he be punished. The House and the Nation suffer less from remarks attributing "suspicious actions" to Members than they do by the serious introduction of bills prohibiting the sending of American troops abroad except upon the consent of the soldiers.

[From the Chicago Herald, Sept. 27, 1917.]

Congressman HEFLIN'S charges might have had a better chance if he hadn't indiscreetly mixed them up with congressional poker playing.

[From the Baltimore American, Sept. 29, 1917.]

Any man who supported the German propaganda in any wise is unworthy to have a seat in Congress. Continuing to do so, he aims a knife at the back of every man who has stepped forward to fight for his country.

[From the York (Pa.) Gazette, Sept. 26, 1917.]

It seems to us that instead of investigating Mr. HEFLIN, who but voiced the sentiments of a large number of American citizens, it might be well to thoroughly investigate the conduct of quite a few Representatives who since the European war began have acted far less patriotically than has Mr. HEFLIN. That there are a number of Senators and Representatives who acted suspiciously is the opinion not only of Mr. HEFLIN but of many thousands of his compatriots. It is their conduct rather than that of Mr. HEFLIN which cast a reflection upon Congress, and did so even after war had been declared.

We agree with Mr. HEFLIN that a number of Senators and Representatives did act suspiciously, so suspiciously, in fact, that most true and loyal Americans had grave doubts as to whether these men were more loyal to Germany than to their own Nation.

On the other hand, Congressman HEFLIN has consistently been a loyal American. He has advocated and voted for all measures necessary to uphold our honor and to increase and perfect our ability to carry the war to a successful conclusion.

[From the Chicago Tribune, Sept. 26, 1917.]

But their indignation may be taken with certain reservations. It is very well for them to accuse Mr. HEFLIN of loose talk, but some of these very men have hitherto given vent to the wildest kind of charges. They have alleged that Wall Street subsidized the press to promote war; they have accused Government officials with having fostered the break with Germany in order to save American investments in entente securities.

But they can not establish their innocence of unpatriotic conduct. For this reason it is difficult to feel any sympathy for them. They have, as a matter of fact, laid themselves open to suspicion, even though that suspicion is unjustified.

[From the Baltimore Sun, Sept. 29, 1917.]

It is not Representative HEFLIN, of Alabama, who will be under fire if there should be any investigation arising out of the newspaper interview in which he is charged with reflecting upon the loyalty and integrity of some of his fellow Congressmen. The men at the congressional bar and at the bar of public opinion would be the Members of that "little group of willful men" in the House and Senate who have been for months persistently and consistently attempting to impede our Government in its preparations for war, and whose pernicious example and seditious suggestions have stimulated domestic discord and encouraged foreign plots and conspiracies. In the light of the recent revelations of the heavily financed campaign directed from the German Embassy in Washington—a campaign which included in its seductive influence all sorts and conditions of men, which sought to enlist the highest judicial representatives in its propaganda, as well as the agents of outlaw labor organizations, like the Industrial Workers of the World—it is absurd for Members of Congress to affect surprise and indignation at the possibility that the trail of the serpent may lead in their direction also.

Whether Mr. HEFLIN was indiscreet or not, whether he can prove anything or not, he has merely said what the newspapers of the country have been saying for months, and what the vast majority of the American people believe, to wit, that certain Members of Congress have laid themselves open to suspicion.

The important thing about this incident is that it should not be permitted to assume the character of a persecution of Mr. HEFLIN. The point now at issue is much more vital than the question of whether or not he has made an unwarranted charge. It is whether the House of Representatives will give aid and comfort to the men whose course has been giving aid and comfort to the enemies of the country; whether it will put itself even in an apparent position of sympathy with those who have been strangely arrayed on the side of the forces mobilized by the German Embassy, who have been openly working for precisely the same objects for which the German secret service has been working behind the scenes. Mr. HEFLIN is the only man in either branch of Congress who has had the courage to say what the country in general has been thinking. Is he to be rebuked because he has had the manhood to indict the men who have been hindering and harassing their country, who have been practically aiding and abetting the insidious efforts of German spies and conspirators to embarrass the administration and create a reactionary antiwar sentiment?

Such a verdict against Americanism and in favor of the lukewarm and the disaffected would add fresh fuel to the flames of sedition which we have been trying to stamp out in various parts of the United States.

If anybody is to be censured it is surely not Mr. HEFLIN.

Protection of Soldier Land Claimants—What Congress Has Done to Protect Our Fighting Men in Their Rights as Land Claimants.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. F. W. MONDELL,

OF WYOMING,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Saturday, October 6, 1917.

Mr. MONDELL. Mr. Speaker, our soldiers, sailors, and marines who are land claimants or entrymen can go to the war with the assurance that Congress has protected them in their rights and claims and granted them valuable privileges. No Congress in our history has so fully provided for the soldier land claimants or entrymen as the Congress that is about to adjourn. The soldier who was a settler upon the public lands with a view of making homestead entry, or who had made application for an entry, or who had actually made entry, is relieved of the necessity of residence or cultivation of his homestead during the time of his service, and receives credit for the time of his service as though he actually resided on and cultivated the land. If such a soldier should die in the service, all requirements as to residence and cultivation are waived, and the widow or children or legal representatives are entitled to patent.

The soldier desert-land entryman is relieved of the necessity of the annual expenditure of $1 per acre in improvements during the period of his service and six months thereafter, but he is expected to notify the local land office that he desires to be so relieved.

The soldier mineral claimant is relieved of the necessity of annual assessment work upon his claim during the period of his service and six months thereafter, but he is expected to file in the local land office a statement as a notice of his desire to hold his mining claim under the act in question.

To further protect settlers, applicants, or entrymen under the various land laws, who may for any reason desire to make affidavits pertaining to their claims, it is provided that any affidavit required by law or practice of the Land Office may be made by the soldier before his commanding officer, wherever he may be. This provision is highly important, because entrymen may desire to prosecute or defend cases arising prior to the beginning of their service. Settlers who were occupying lands or filed contests with a view of entry, but had not entered at the time of their enlistment, would naturally desire to make entry in order to secure the benefit of constructive residence. These various provisions are believed to be adequate to quite fully protect all classes of soldier settlers, applicants, or entrymen; but if there should be found any classes not fully provided for, they will undoubtedly be provided for early in the session which meets in December.

There came to the House late Friday afternoon from the Senate a bill, which had just passed that body, entitled "A bill protecting persons in the military or naval service from the forfeiture provisions of the land laws." A request for its immediate enactment without reference to the committee was waived pending an investigation as to whether or not it seriously conflicted with legislation already enacted. A careful examination of the bill by members of the Public Lands Committee of the House developed the fact that the bill as drawn, clearly through inadvertence, only protected entries initiated "during the present war." Of course, if such a bill had passed, it would have immediately raised a doubt as to whether it did not limit the protection and privileges which had already been granted to mining, homestead, and desert entrymen by limiting the stay of the running of the law to entries made since the first part of April. The bill also contained a provision requiring each claimant, applicant, or entryman who desired to secure its benefits to file in the local land office a statement of his muster into service, a description of his claim, and so forth. The probability is, had this provision been adopted, all of the homestead entrymen relieved from the necessity of residence and granted the benefit of credit for constructive residence under the act of July 28, 1917, would have been compelled to furnish the notice thus provided for, which it would be manifestly difficult for them to do in many instances.

Other portions of the bill were believed to be unnecessary or contained provisions which had already been enacted into law; as, for instance, the provision for the making of affidavits before commanding officers. It was believed, however, that the first paragraph of the bill would afford relief in a limited class of cases that may not be fully provided for under the laws above referred to, and it was therefore considered wise to attempt to secure the passage of this paragraph so amended as to make the relief apply to entries made before as well as since the beginning of the war. Objection was made, however, to the calling up of the bill by unanimous consent, and it therefore went over. The probability is, however, that the classes of cases not fully provided for by the statutes I have referred to are very few. Every land claim initiated prior to the beginning of a man's service is either relieved from the necessity of labor, improvement, or residence or protected by the provision under which the settler, claimant, or entryman may make any necessary affidavit before his commanding officer. It would seem, therefore, that Congress had very excellently provided for its soldier settlers and land claimants.

True Patriotism Demands Service.

EXTENSION OF REMARKS

OF

HON. JOHN M. BAER,

OF NORTH DAKOTA,

IN THE HOUSE OF REPRESENTATIVES,

Thursday, October 4, 1917.

Mr. BAER. Mr. Speaker, this morning as I walked up Pennsylvania Avenue my attention was attracted by a beautiful poster. It was an inspiring picture of Uncle Sam, with a stern expression on his face, his clenched fist raised, fired with a determination to win. He was backed up by hundreds of thousands of soldiers, and in the distance was seen the Statue of Liberty. This poster is an advertisement for the sale of the second issue of liberty bonds. Underneath the picture are the words of Secretary McAdoo:

Shall we be more tender with our dollars than with the lives of our sons?

This is the principal issue that I advocated in my campaign and also since my election to Congress. I have said that if we conscript men we should conscript dollars. It is perhaps for this reason that the big business interests, through a certain few controlled newspapers, have attempted to brand me as disloyal. Big business has always tried to blacken the character of any man who stands for the rights of the people, and at this time, when our country is at war, he naturally resorts to the cries of "disloyalty" and "lack of patriotism."

A great deal of misrepresentation has been used in regard to my campaign by reactionary forces, and by big business through their subsidized newspapers in the Northwest. These misstatements have been quoted by the Eastern press until some people believe that I conducted an antiwar campaign, and that the members of the Nonpartisan League are disloyal.

This impression that I have opposed the war is the result of the maliciously untruthful campaign waged by my opponents. It is due to the fact that the candidates who opposed me made it a false issue. They misquoted and garbled my speeches and then disagreed with the distorted statements wrongfully attributed to me.

I want to quote from the stenographic report of my speech made at Devils Lake, N. Dak., on June 5, 1917. Reports made of later speeches during my campaign contained the same statements and context up to July 10, which was election day. The following quotations contain all the remarks which I made during my campaign in regard to the war. As distinguished a man as Col. Roosevelt has made the statement that I said, "Americanism is not an issue." I want to say once and for all that I never expressed this sentiment or anything similar to it. Perhaps the following words, taken from my campaign speeches, gave rise to this free interpretation. Throughout my campaign I laid great stress on economic conditions, marketing conditions, and the useless middle man.

What I did say regarding Americanism:

Answering the charge that I am not an American, I want to say that my folks bought their land in this country in 1742. My ancestors fought in every war the United States has waged up to the Civil War. My father was wounded twice in the Civil War, and I lost a brother in the Spanish-American war. Consequently I do not believe that it is necessary for me to prove that I am an American.

I further said in my speeches in regard to war:

I can not finish this address without mentioning the most critical problem that the Government has to face; that is, the war. But the war is a fact. War is not an issue. If my father were going to get into a lawsuit and the opposition had an attorney like Divet, I would use every honorable means to keep him out of the suit; but if he were dragged into it, I would then help him in every way I could to win it. So it is with the war. We are in it, and we must stand back of the Nation and back of the President.

Mr. Speaker, I count as my choicest inheritance the spirit of patriotism and loyalty which has been bequeathed to me through a long line of ancestors in America. The fact that I am loyal and patriotic accounts for my unalterable opposition to the accumulation by individuals or corporations of enormous war profits.

No people are more loyal than the people of North Dakota. We are determined that the unselfish patriots who offer their lives in the trenches of Europe shall not return with maimed and broken bodies to pay the money cost of this war. We indorse the "pay-as-you-go" plan, as far as it is possible. We believe in the highest degree of patriotism, but we do not believe in a patriotism spelled with a "P-A-Y." It shall be my earnest endeavor during my term in Congress to see that this "pay" is taken out of patriotism.

True patriotism demands service. We may not say to our young men, "Go! Lay down your lives on the altar of liberty and democracy!" and to our financiers and great corporations and industries, "Keep your gold; pile up your profits; turn the lifeblood of our young men into ill-gotten wealth for your own aggrandizement!"

The expenses of the war for the first year alone—authorized and projected—amount to $20,000,000,000, and are increasing at a terrific rate. If the war continued only two years the interest on the sum expended on war appropriations will amount to nearly twice the total annual expenditures of the Government in times of peace. Unless new and extraordinary means for providing current revenue are contrived and applied, means which will go far beyond the inadequate war-taxation measures planned by the present Congress, the crushing burden of debt will endanger the very foundations of our Government, the credit and honor of the American people will be emperiled. Our toiling masses will be condemned to years—even generations—of heartbreaking struggle to meet the obligations imposed and held by a creditor class. Thus the seeds of discontent will be sown; and what a man—or a nation—soweth, that shall he also reap.

I therefore urge as a means of raising the necessary war revenue that excess war profits and excess wealth be conscripted, so far as it is possible to conscript it without unduly hampering the industrial operations which are necessary to the support of our civilian population and the maintenance of our Army and Navy at the point of highest efficiency.

We know that our Government has met determined and strenuous opposition to any plan that has for its object the equalizing of the burden of war by price fixing or conscription of wealth or excess profits. I have never been one of the long-haired, soap-box, street-corner orators, who rants and raves against wealthy men as a class and attempts to engender a sentiment of class hatred among the poor as opposed to the wealthy. On the contrary, I have an abiding respect for the man whose good judgment, clear vision, and industry has enabled him to amass a comfortable competence to support himself and his family.

Nevertheless, we can not dispute the fact that wealth fights against all taxation and is able to employ the most efficient men and means to conduct the fight.
